When at last, emigration from Russia seemed the only mode of obtaining safety for millions of Jews, the most powerful agencies were called into existence, in order to help Jews to emigrate to America. Any persons who might prefer to go to Palestine were left out of all consideration, and, lost this more passive conduct towards them be an insufficient preventive, a trusted agent of the Universal Israelitish Alliance, inserted in all the papers a statement proving to evidence that there is no prospect before intending Jewish immigrants to Palestine but starvation. No doubt these tactics turned the faces of a good many refugees to the West rather than the East; but the fact that several of the Jewish delegates formed themselves into a committee in Jaffa, of which a resident Jew of position consented to act as chairman, and that this committee made known in the papers, that they would be prepared to give competent advice to intending colonists, caused nevertheless, a stream of emigration to flow towards Palestine.

FIRST ARRIVALS IN PALESTINE.

About the end of April the first families arrived. About the middle of May, when returning on a Russian steamer from Port Said to Jaffa, I came in contact with forty or fifty people on their way to Palestine. In the conversations I held with most of them on board the steamer, I ascertained the following facts:—The emigrants were of two classes: heads of families, and young men from eighteen to thirty years of age. Of the former, a few well-to-do people have left their families with them, wishing first to see how matters would fare with them. A small number were supplied with money enough to look on awhile; and then, either to buy an estate; or, if this do not succeed, to return somewhat poorer than they had left their native country, but yet with sufficient means to make a fresh start in the land, in which they were thoroughly competent to carry on business. The majority were poor, though very respectable. Their idea was that the Jaffa Committee could not only advise the rich how to lay out their money to best advantage, but was also in a position to hand over to them small estates for cultivation, the purchasing money to be paid in annual instalments.

THE MISSIONARY'S WARNING.

Knowing as I said that there was no such provision made in Jaffa, I warned these poor people that their hopes would be disappointed; but, as I knew too, that they had burned their bridges behind them"—for their available money, as they showed me, would not have taken them home again, even if they had wanted to return to Russia as once without landing in Palestine. I tried to comfort them with the assurance that God, who had evidently brought them here, would not forsake them in the land of their fathers. They were all, rich and poor, not only willing, but anxious to discuss their position, the reasons of their sufferings, and the prospects of their national future.

OPINIONS OF THE EMIGRANTS.

It is impossible, at this distance of time (six weeks having elapsed since then) to reproduce in a connected form even part of the conversations, which occupied many hours, but from the notes put down at the time, I am able to state the impression I then received concerning the views and the position of these people. To my question, which I put to a score of people separately, and in all possible variations—Why have you come here? why have you not gone to America? I received the following answer:—

"We are Russians. When we were little, we were told that all the misfortunes resting upon the Jews in Russia, are owing to our not becoming Russians in language, education and thought. Well, our fathers, at very great sacrifices, sent us to Russian schools, and we have become Russians. What can we do in America? Here, in Turkey, everybody can retain his own language, and we shall live together very much as at home. In America, we should be obliged to become Americans, but we could not do that; we are too old. Some of our friends who are more courageous than we, have gone to America; but they have taken a vow upon themselves that they and their children will not indulge in any exclusively Jewish customs. They want to live according to the laws of America out and out, so that, for instance, they have made a point of it not to have a 'Schochet' (i. e., one who knows how to kill animals according to the legal prescriptions) in their midst, but in everything to fraternize with their American neighbors. Happy he who can be so resolute, but we could not possibly do it."

Others said: "To go to America is much more expensive; and even if I wanted to demean myself by getting assistance from the Brody Committee, I should still have the disadvantage of knowing that if away from Russia I do not succeed, it will be much more expensive and difficult to return to Russia than to return from Turkey." Again, others said: "Now they are praising America to us, and we know Jews can freely settle there; but who can vouch for it that in our children's time there will not be in America, too, the same cry raised against us as now in Russia, 'You are strangers here, move on!'"

CAUSES OF THE RUSSIAN PERSECUTIONS.

When I asked them, seriously, what do you suppose is the real reason of your being persecuted in Russia?—the answers were as widely different as those to my first question. Some thought it was all the fault of the priests, who, when they teach the Gospel in the villages, seem to have nothing more important to inculcate than hatred to the Jews. Others were of opinion that the Nihilists, wishing to overturn the whole country, wanted the peasantry to get used to lawless doings, and they know they would not find them more ready to make illegal attacks than when they were to be directed against the Jews, who, though possessing many Russian friends, had necessarily many enemies among those who were defeated by their competition, or who dreaded them as their creditors. Others, again, felt sure that the Government secretly favored these outbreaks against the Jews, because they thought they would thereby divert the attention of the dissatisfied peasantry from their real complaints, and would set them at rest at the expense of people who, like the Jews, could not defend themselves. All, however, whatever their opinions as to the immediate cause of their misfortunes might be, were ready to follow me when I tried to direct their minds to the remoter causes of

GOD'S DEALINGS WITH ISRAEL.

When trying to draw them out on this subject, I found in them a depth of religious feeling in the best sense of the word, which caused my heart to go out towards them, and made me long to impart to them the knowledge of the Savior, who alone can make us to see how all things work together for our good, if we love God.

They all entertained, in one way or another, the same conviction that God punishes them for their sins; and when I asked them what sins they referred to, I always found that they meant the worldliness of their life. "We thought," they said, "that all happiness consists of living in fine houses, and seeing our wives and our children gaudily dressed; and now God has shown us that all these things have no value whatever. In Palestine we hope to live as common country people, without fashions and luxury, and we shall learn to appreciate the happiness of eating our bread in peace."

When people are in this condition of mind, referring all that occurs to them to the over-ruling power of God, it is not difficult to talk to them on religious questions; and, of course, I used the opportunity of explaining to them that all the sufferings of the Jews [illegible] this very last resort, owing to their

HAVING REJECTED THE MESSIAH.

Objects one, almost crying: "Whatever have I done that I should suffer, because two thousand years ago...." Here he abruptly finished. Says another: "Don't mention to me the Christian religion as a remedy. I asked a neighbor of mine, a Russian, with whom I have been in school and in business together—'Why do you so far hate me as in a manner to consent to all the wrong done to me?' and all he had to answer was, 'How can I help the fact that you are a Jew, and I a Christian?'"

The second class of emigrants I met on board that steamer were unmarried men. They were chiefly the sons of well-to-do and respectable parents, who had had up to the age of sixteen a fair education in a grammar-school, and then had been sent either to some merchants' or some lawyer's office as clerks. Some had lost their places, simply because their employers would not keep a Jew in the business, and others because the places of business in which they had been employed had had to be given up through the general disturbance of trade.

IN SEARCH OF AN AGRICULTURAL EDUCATION.

"Why have you come here to Palestine?" Answer: "We have heard there is in Jaffa an agricultural academy, and we thought we should get there an education which would fit us for work in the Jewish colonies which are to be established."

Whoever knows anything about the agricultural colony of the Universal Israelitish Alliance near Jaffa, could see at once that these young men would be as much disappointed as those fathers of families who had come without ready money to buy land, and hoped the Jaffa Committee would grant them loans. I saw there was a great distress before all those people, but thought it best not to discourage them beforehand. But an instinct told them that I would be ready to befriend them, and they all asked me where they could meet me. As I had not time to stay in Jaffa, but wanted to get up to Jerusalem, on the day of our arriving in Jaffa, I gave them Moritz Hall's address, with the instruction that if they had anything of pressing importance to communicate to me, they should do it through him.

I left them with the full conviction, which was strengthened in me during the day, as I thought of all I had seen and heard, that God had sent these people here, to bless their souls through

OUR CHRISTIAN INSTRUMENTALITY.

Tuesday night I arrived here, (May 16); but while I was slowly rolling towards Jerusalem those poor immigrants had ample time to realize the greatness of their misfortune. For people without money, young or old, there was absolutely no provision, and in the course of their very first day's stay, they found one after another their way to Moritz Hall, on whom I enjoined the absolute necessity of doing for them all that might be in our power. Moritz Hall did his best in advising people what to try, but he was not at once prepared as to any material help to be extended to them. At the end of the following day, after he had had time to review the whole circumstances, he was so strongly impressed with the urgency of the work to be done, that he came up here to have a consultation with Mr. Kelk and myself as to what might be done to relieve the distress of people who turned to us because they had nobody in this world that would or could help them. We agreed to appeal to Baron Ustinoff in Jaffa, for the loan of some tents, which were to be pitched in the garden of the Mission-house; and these as well as part of the Mission-house and the large timber shed, should give shelter to as many as could find room; we sent, moreover, some money down to save the actually starving.

INMATES OF THE JAFFA MISSION-HOUSE.

A day after Moritz Hall's return about thirty persons were received within his premises, and from that day to now his house has been a continued source of blessing to many poor sufferers. And apart from those who find shelter there, a great many immigrants go in and out there in order to obtain comfort and advice. In the evenings when Mr. Hall is at home, discussions naturally arise as to the religious condition of the Jews, and I can bear testimony that Mr. Hall's simple statements of his own personal experience have often proved a real spiritual blessing to all who meet him.

After these numerous new inmates of the Mission-house in Jaffa had been settled there for a few days, I received the news that a number of my ship-acquaintances had set out to come to Jerusalem, to be taught more fully the truth as it is in Jesus. There was no mistake about the way in which they [illegible] to me. [illegible] that they found that the world had left them, they were obliged to leave the world, and to seek

COMFORT IN CHRIST'S RELIGION.

I know there are some people who foolishly sneer at conversion occasioned through great and clamorous bodily needs, but to me such a sneer is a very light matter, when I find in the sublimest of all parables that the prodigal son arose only to return to his father, when there were no more husks to be had; and yet what a glorious, forgiving reception he had! Shall we, instead of imitating the all-forgiving father, imitate the elder son who did not sympathize with the returned prodigal? God forbid! Rather let us thank God that he has established a mission here which proclaims far and wide: "Come ye, all that labor and are heavy-laden; when no one cares to take you up, we shall take you up, yea, the love of Christ constraineth us to take you up."

Whilst we were trying to instruct these new comers, letters reached us from many more who were in Jaffa and desired to come up here, as they expressed it — to join the Protestants. Some of these letters were most touching, as when one man who specially felt the guilt and vanity of his former life in Russia, gives to his Hebrew letters, as motto, the words of Jeremiah (Jr. 30): "And when thou art spoiled, what wilt thou do? Though thou clothest thyself with crimson, though thou deckest thee with ornaments of gold, though thou rentest thy face with painting, in vain shalt thou make thyself fair; thy lovers will despise thee, they will seek thy life." I answered some of the letters, advising delay, as I did not see clearly what ought to be done with such people, by whose acceptance we should take a burden upon ourselves, which we are not able to bear. But every day brought new applications, and specially urgent were parents who had children, whom they wished to give into our schools. At last, after prayer for God's guidance, it was determined that I should run down to Jaffa and settle all the preliminaries possible in direct

PERSONAL INTERCOURSE WITH THE APPLICANTS.

Arriving there one Tuesday night late, I was able to spend two full days, during which it was my privilege to be constantly in contact with Jewish refugees, many of whom I had not seen before. Where I perceived that beyond the pinch of hunger there was no other power which brought the people to me, I assisted them as far as my means allowed; but where there really was evidence of desire to begin a new life, I consented to their reception into one of our institutions. I was obliged to listen to many sorrowful tales of loss and suffering, some of them so harassing that I should not care to repeat them, but I felt it to be a high privilege to be able to comfort in some way people who had been laid so low. And what we ought especially to be thankful for is that our mission has been here sufficiently long established for its agents to be as a matter of course looked upon as the relievers of all kinds of distress; not necessarily by money, but by sympathetic and disinterested counsel.

A WIDE DOOR OPENED.

We do not for a moment so far misunderstand the feelings of those who come to us in their distress as to think that they want necessarily to become Christians; but we do think that when those who are enemies for the Gospel's sake, nevertheless come to us with a confidence greater than they show to their own co-religionists, God has opened a wide door for us; and we have a right to hope that, if we enter in and commend the spirit of the Gospel by our walk and conversation, an abundant blessing will rest upon our labors. God has done a great thing for us in bringing these people to our shores, and a great responsibility rests upon us.

It is easy to say there is nothing remarkable about these few hundred helpless people being thrown into this country; you have the same thing and in a much greater extension in Brody and in London, Manchester, New York, and other places. But I venture to say, there is no comparison between any of these places and Jaffa or Jerusalem; notwithstanding the smallness of the number here, the immigrants into Palestine are a charge entrusted to the Jewish Mission here in a way which does not obtain in any of the other places. For in all those places, either the Jews or well-known philanthropists of all confessions make it their object to benefit these poor wanderers; so that the missionary who happens to be near has scarcely a chance of helping independently; such help as he may be able to afford is lost among the general offerings of the public, and the Jews who receive the gifts scarcely realize that they are in any way indebted to the Jewish Mission. [illegible] position — the position of the Jewish Mission in Palestine towards the Jewish refugees from Russia.

PRESENT POSITION OF THE JEWISH MISSION.

It is not our doing much less our merits, that we are the only body or agency that is called upon to take up the cause of these poor sufferers. The task falls to us by the natural fitness of things, as we may say; but what does that mean but that God has appointed us to do this work? Is it too much to apply to ourselves the words of the message of Mordecai (Esther iv. 14) to Queen Esther: "Who knoweth whether thou art come...for such a time as this?"

Yes, I verily believe that this is the time for which all our weary labors hitherto have been a direct preparation. It required all these years, it required all those arduous labors of varied character, it required all this expenditure of money and acquisition of property to constitute the Jewish Missions in this country a friendly agency to which the arriving immigrants might look up with a sure confidence. Why do the Jews here not take up the cause of these immigrants? If the dispensers of the "Haluka" spent the year's income on those starving sufferers, would there not be forthcoming plenty of money from all the world to reimburse them? And again I ask, why do not those European Jews here who are so anxious to entice away any Jewish inquirers from our institutions, why do they not appeal on behalf of these sufferers?

Is it not as if the thing had come unawares upon them. Long before the immigrants arrived here, the cry went forth in the Jewish papers, let no poor Jews go to Jaffa, — they will most surely fall

A PREY TO THE MISSIONARIES.

Why, nevertheless, have they done nothing to relieve the sufferers — they who have both Jews and Christians with immense money-chests to appeal to?

Why not? whether they admit it or not, I see it clearly: God has stayed their hands, that he may bless the souls of these sufferers through us.

Jerusalem has before now been a model to all Christian churches; why should it seem an incredible thing that God should have chosen Jerusalem once more to be the pattern Church, in that it extends the true hand of peace to Israel, as represented by those who now return to the land of their fathers—driven evidently by the hand of God. According to all human calculations, they ought to be far away in the West. But God led them here "by a way they know not," and he had prepared us here to receive them and to bless them.

Nobody disputes with us the task of incorporating these new-comers into this country. The Jews themselves, as stated before, look on; other philanthropists to take the matter up, there are none.

AN IMPORTANT QUESTION.

What then, ought we to do who have not thrust ourselves into this particular work, upon whom it has been laid by a mysterious and gracious Providence? We ought to take these poor people in hand, in the spirit of Christian love, study their wants, and ascertain the possibilities of this country to satisfy their wants, and not to the common benefit of both.

I have no doubt we shall be told, these are secular matters which the clergy and missionaries, who are supposed to live in the clouds, and to know nothing of terrestrial concerns, had better leave alone. But suppose, for argument's sake, that we are not quite so ignorant of this world's affairs as to be able to promote the settlement of these new-comers in different parts of the country, so that they should not be an injury, but rather a blessing to the country, what then? Can you not perceive a glorious vista of this land being covered with the glorious light of the Gospel?

If, under our auspices, and by our native Christian help, small clusters of Jews could be settled throughout the country; how long, think ye, would it be, before we might have small Jewish Christian communities through the length and breadth of the land?

To those wise people who cannot see beyond the secondary causes of things, it may appear that all our excitement will soon be proved to be absurd, because the Pasha has received orders not to allow immigrants to land in Jaffa. But allow me to tell you that apart from the fact that there are already new immigrants enough in this country to give enormous scope to our labors for years, I would say the Pasha of Jerusalem might as well try to turn back the hand of time as stop the return of the Jews. Once when Cyrus, king of Persia, issued the decree for the Jews to return to the land of their fathers, their enemies in this land could not prevent them, however hard they tried; and now that a greater than Cyrus has evidently bid them return, no power on earth can stop them, and no power on earth ought to stop us from receiving them as those whose souls we are to bless.

I am not speaking to you as a visionary; I am sober enough to see all the difficulties that beset this work that we desire to do, but with eyes open to all the troubles and enemies that bar our way, I say unto you, in the full assurance of faith:—

Fear not, for I am with you; be not dismayed, for I am your God: I will strengthen you; yea, I will help you; yea, I will uphold you with the right hand of my righteousness. Behold, all they that were incensed against you shall be ashamed and confounded: they shall be as nothing; and they that strive with you shall perish. For I the Lord your God will hold your right hand, saying unto you, Fear not; I will help you. Fear not, for they that be with us are stronger and more than they that be against us. — *H. TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a strong belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Prelude—1. Is the Mystic Babylon of the Apocalypse an Asiatic or a European city? 2. Are the Mystic waters of Rev. xvii. 1, 15, European or Asiatic? 3. Where is "that great city" of Rev. xvii. 18, located, in Europe or in Asia? 4. Were John's views Asiatic or European?—Ten-tribed kingdom continued — Which Kingdom held the sceptre of David? Did the sceptre depart from Judah at the overthrow of Zedekiah? Ezek. xxi. 26, 27 — Show in what sense Judah continued in being till the first Advent—In what sense has Gen. xlix. 10, been accomplished?

Prelude.—Is the mystic Babylon of the Apocalypse an Asiatic or a European city? The literal Babylon was Asiatic. So is the literal Euphrates. But the mystic Babylon is universally conceded to be European in its location. Its scenery is by no means Asiatic. In one vision Babylon is situated upon many waters—Rev. xvii. 1, and in vs. 9 she is said to sit upon seven mountains. That verse should read: The seven heads are seven mountains where the woman sitteth upon them (the waters). Mystic Babylon was situated on waters, surrounding seven mountains—mountain islands in the bosom of a sea or great river. Such is not the scenery of ancient Babylon. But it is the scenery of the Tiberian Rome, the seat of mystic Babylon. We answer, mystic Babylon is a European city. 2. Are the mystic waters of Rev. xvii. 1, 15, European or Asiatic? If mystic Babylon is a European city, the waters upon which she sits must be European also. They symbolize the nations which sustained the harlot,—mystic Babylon; but the Latin nations sustained the harlot: therefore, the mystic waters are European. There is nothing Asiatic about them, either in quality or location. 3. Where is "that great city" of Rev. xvii. 18, located? in Europe or in Asia? It is a literal city, since it is the interpretation of a symbol ("the woman"). No other than Rome, which at that time, by its mystic rider, ruled over the Latin kingdoms. Was not Rome situated on many waters? (Tiber). There is nothing Asiatic (strictly) about the vision. 4. Were these visions of mystic Babylon Asiatic or European? We say most emphatically European? Their scenery is principally European, city, mountains, and waters; all European. This position, we presume, will not be questioned. The harlot, the beast on which she sat, the waters, mountains. These have their location in Europe. Each vial has its special location: 1. The first upon the earth (mystic earth?) were men mystic? covered with mystic sores? 2. "Upon the sea" (mystic sea?) and every mystic soul died of mystic blood. 3. Mystic rivers and mystic fountains of mystic waters. They shed mystic blood, and thou hast given them mystic blood to drink mystically. 4. On the mystic sun, and mystic men were mystically scorched with its mystic fire. And the mystic men mystically blasphemed, because of their mystic pains and mystic sores. 5. Fifth angel (mystic?) poured out his cup upon the mystic seat (?) of the mystic beast (correct) kingdom (mystic?) was full of mystic darkness. And they (the mystic men) gnawed their mystic tongues for mystic pain. And blasphemed the God of heaven because of their mystic pains and their mystic sores. 6. And the sixth metaphorical angel poured out metaphorically his metaphorical vial upon the great metaphorical river Euphrates; and the metaphorical water thereof was metaphorically dried up, that the metaphorical way of the metaphorical kings of the metaphorical east might be metaphorically prepared. Such an interpretation, on its hinges turning, "Grates harsh thunder."

There is something wrong about it. The Apocalypse, it is true, has in it many symbols, but it is not all symbols. The explanation of a symbol must be literal, or there would be an endless symbolic series. This law should never be violated if we are seeking after correct interpretation. We should never call a word figurative unless the sense forces the departure. Let this be distinctly understood, that Papal Rome is the Apocalyptic Babylon. Why, then did John call it Babylon? Because it resembled Babylon; and also for the reason, that, to have called it Rome, would have provoked bloody persecutions, since Rome was regarded and called, "the eternal city." Its being under the control of an apostate hierarchy does not destroy its literality.

Let us, for a moment, glance at the angels with their vials and their mission-work. 1. The angels are what they are called, literal messengers, since they symbolize themselves. They have in their hands vials or cups. The executive judgment work of each angel, is confined to a definite locality on the earth; the first is confined to the land inhabited by the worshipers of the beast and his image (European); the second, to the sea; the third, to the rivers and fountains; the fourth, to the sun, as to scorch the wicked; the fifth, to the seat of the beast. These five vials are, in their effects, European—have nothing to do with the great East. But few will question this position as to their location. Of these five vials and their work, the terms, "earth," "sea," "rivers and fountains," the "sun," and the "seat of the beast" are literal. The plagues set upon those physical objects, since the people, "men," living soul," "saints" are distinct. With these thoughts before the reader, let him follow the sixth angel. The command was, "go your ways." Where did this angel go? This we learn from the names of the objects stated in the description, "And the sixth angel poured out his vial (cup) upon the great river Euphrates; and the water thereof dried up, (for what purpose?) that the way of the kings of the east might be prepared." These eastern kings have no mission in Europe; but they have a work in the land of Israel. This vial alone prepares the east for the universal plague of the seventh vial, which is poured into the air which all breathe. We were not aware that the "wrath" of God is a "metaphorical fluid!" God has often shown his power over rivers, but we were not aware that his anger was a metaphorical fluid. Habakkuk says, "Was the Lord displeased against the rivers? (metaphorical rivers?) (was) thine anger against the rivers? (was) thy wrath against the sea, that thou didst ride upon thy horses (and) thy chariots of salvation? The scenes of Rev. xvi., and xvii., are very distinct in their localities. A person is called a Jew or a Turk, when he acts like a Jew or a Turk. Mystic agents act on literal territory.

We repeat, If the Euphrates of Rev. xvi. 12 is symbolic, we have a symbol without any interpretation, which is a violation of symbolic laws. Rev. ix. 14 does not solve the difficulty; for it must first be shown that it is in that passage a symbol. The four angels are active agents, the Euphrates is neutral. How can the same power be active and neutral at the same time? The one has a fixed location by nature, as an obstruction; the other has been restrained by that obstruction. Each has an Asiatic locality; not European. Let the reader bear in mind:—1. That the first five vials have in effect European locations. 2. If the sixth vial is not eastern, there is none to prepare the east for the terrible struggle under the seventh vial.

The ten-tribed kingdom continued.—It is admitted that the sceptre remained with Judah till the death of Solomon; that in the revolt of the ten tribes the sceptre departed from Judah; and consequently, the kingdom and the promises followed the ten tribes. This position is taken by Mr. Pool, and is thus expressed:—Of David it is said 2 Sam. vii. 16, "And thine (David's) house and thy kingdom shall be established for ever before thee: thy throne shall be established for ever." Of Solomon it was said, "He shall build an house for my name; and shall be my son, and I (will) be his father. And I will establish the throne of his kingdom over Israel forever." 1 Chron. xxii. 10. "Then the Lord said to Solomon, Forasmuch as this is done of thee, and thou hast not kept my covenant and my statutes, which I have commanded thee, I will surely rend the kingdom from thee, and will give it to thy servant (Jeroboam). Notwithstanding in thy days I will not do it for David thy father's sake: (but) I will rend it out of the hand of thy son. Howbeit I will not rend away all the kingdom; but will give one tribe to thy son, for David my servant's sake, and for Jerusalem's sake which I have chosen." 1 Kings xi. 11, 12, 13. "And he said to Jeroboam, Take thee ten pieces: for thus saith the Lord, the God of Israel, Behold, I will rend the kingdom out of the hand of Solomon, and will give ten tribes to thee: But I will take the kingdom out of his son's hand, and will give it unto thee, (even) ten tribes."

On these passages Mr. Pool thus remarks, "The ten-tribed nation, therefore, is the kingdom, and Judah lost all claim to the honors and rewards of the kingdom now transferred to other hands. I need hardly say that this remarkable transfer of the kingdom, throne and dignity to the ten tribes, secured to them all those special promises and blessings that God had previously made to Abraham and to his seed." "The sceptre of Judah remained in the house of David; and in the family of David it was transferred from the East to the 'Isles of the West,' where it will remain until the time of the 'peaceful' union of the two houses so long divided, that is the 'rest' promised in the latter days." Again he says, "Judah, or the Jews, never had the sceptre of dominion for one day, since the days of Zedekiah, no, not for an hour." Mr. Pool's account of Jeremiah we subjoin:—"The prophet Jeremiah was specially intrusted by the Lord with a royal commission to take the daughters of king Zedekiah in charge with the king's household. The king's sons had been killed, and his own eyes put out. There was a small remnant left. By an act of disobedience, the royal household was taken away to Egypt, (Jer. xliii. 6), 'so they came into the land of Egypt,' but they were commanded to leave immediately. 'For I will punish them that dwell in the land of Egypt.' They were commanded to go to the north and west to Tarshish. Isa. lxvi. 19.—'And I will set a sign among them, and I will send those that escape of them unto the nations, (to) Tarshish, Pul, and Lud, that draw the bow, (to) Tubal and Javan, (to) the isles afar off, that have not heard my fame, neither have seen my glory; and they shall declare my glory among the Gentiles." We quote Mr. Pool, since he is a very able writer on Anglo-Israel; having made that one of his principal topics of investigation for, (it is said) forty years.

Again, Mr. Pool says, "How long Jeremiah and the king's (Zedekiah's) daughters, and Baruch and their attendants, or household, remained in Egypt, I don't know. It is certain they were there. How long they were in Spain (Tarshish), I don't know, there was a large colony of their people there, how long they remained there, we may not know, but we do know, that, just seven years after they left Mount Zion, we find them landing on the Irish coast. It is more than probable that some monument, or slab, or marble will be found to fill up this missing link of seven years." It would have been very satisfactory had Mr. Pool given us the source of such positive "we do know." If that one point (Jeremiah's landing on the Irish coast just seven years after he, with Zedekiah's daughter and Baruch left Mount Zion) be an undisputed historic fact, it will not be any stretch of credulity to admit the remaining part of the narration; viz.: 1. The chronology of their royal landing, B. C. 580 or 581. 2. Their coming under the ship owners of Dan. 3. The revolutions they made in Ireland. 4. The coronation stone. 5. The college of the prophets. 6. The marriage of the king of Ulster (B. C. 580) with Tephi, a daughter of Zedekiah. 7. The conversion and education of Ireland. 8. The establishment of the house of David over the ten tribes in the 'Isles of the West.'

These subjects will come under review when examining the Jewish Phase of the Eastern Question. At present let us follow the developments of the British Phase. Two rival schools of prophetic interpretations have arisen out of two constructions of Jacob's last words to Judah—Gen. xlix. 10—"The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come; and unto him (shall) the gathering of the people (be)."

1. One school holds the view, that David's kingdom, when rent, under Rehoboam, followed the sceptre of the ten-tribed kingdom and Jeroboam, and, consequently the Abrahamic promises; (2) that, in the overthrow of Zedekiah, the sceptre of Judah, in the family of David, was transferred from the East to the Isles of the West, where it will remain till the union of Israel and Judah under the Messiah.

2. The other school holds that the sceptre continued with Judah at Jerusalem till the first Advent of the Messiah; that at the fall of Jerusalem by the Romans, Judah's tribal nationality was taken away and remains away till Messiah its great king, whose is the sceptre, returns and rules over united Israel and Judah.

No two problems are more difficult of solution, or more interesting in their elements of proof, and yet the results of the opposite conclusions are so vital, that too much investigation to arrive at the true interpretation is not possible. Allowing these interpretations to rest for the present — let us follow the history of the ten-tribed kingdom of Israel through their separate existence, till they go into captivity. This will finish our historic chain to the broken link. This we simply outline.

The Queen's Royal Descent from King David the Psalmist.

A. B. GRIMALDI, M. A.

[We give the following as a literary curiosity. We have no very decided views on the so-called Anglo-Israel question. The tract was sent us from England by Brother H. Heyes some months ago. As the question of Anglo-Israel has able advocates, as well as able opponents, we have decided to give this table a place, and submit it to our readers for what it may be worth. It will be worth the space it occupies as showing something what views are afloat in the world in this exciting age.—ED.]

The possible descent of Queen Victoria from King David was first entered upon in the present day by Rev. F. R. A. Glover, A. M. ("England the Remnant of Judah," London, 1861). He did not, however, attempt to give the genealogy link by link, nor enter into the proofs in detail. Since then the whole subject of Her Majesty's Jewish ancestry has been further examined by various students and writers on our Israelitish origin. Mr. J. C. Stephens has compiled a "Genealogical Chart, showing the connection between the House of David and the Royal Family of Britain." Liverpool, 1877. This gives the descent from Abraham to Zedekiah in full, as found in Matthew. It then gives twelve generations only between Heremon, B. C. 580, and Victoria, A. D. 1819, thus, of course, omitting a great number of links. The descent of our Royal Family from the royal line of Judah is, however, no new discovery. The Saxon kings traced themselves back to Odin, who was traced back to this descent from David, as may be seen in a very ancient MS. in the Herald's College, London; and in Sharon Turner "History of the Anglo-Saxons," vol. i. The full and complete genealogy of Victoria from David does not appear to have been ever printed; and it has, therefore, been thought that it would be useful, as well as interesting, to put it on record, both for reference and testimony. In its compilation reliable works of reference have been used—such as Anderson's Royal Genealogies, London 1732; Keating's History of Ireland, Dublin, 1723; Lavoisne Genealogical and Historical Atlas, London, 1844, as well as those mentioned above, and others. Perfect accuracy is hardly to be expected in such an attempt; but it is believed that the genealogy is as correct as our present knowledge of this obscure and intricate subject will permit.

In the following genealogy those who reigned have K prefixed to their names. The dates after private names refer to their birth and death; those after sovereign's names, to their accession and death. Wherever known, the wives have been mentioned. Besides those mentioned in Genesis, some have been obtained from Polano ("The Talmud," London, 1877). b. and d. stand for born and died.

149. Duke Edward of Kent 1767–1820, Princess Victoria of Leiningen.
150. Q Victoria b 1819, or 1838, Prince Albert of Saxe-Coburg.

We issue this to serve the grand and valuable object of supplying a necessary link in proving the identity of the British Nation with the Lost Ten Tribes of Israel. But we could not be identical with Israel unless Queen Victoria was in a line with David, it being written, "Ought ye not to know that the Lord God of Israel gave the kingdom over Israel to David forever; to him, and to his sons, by a covenant of salt?" 2 Chron. xiii. 5; xxi. 7. We have always been able to trace David's seed to Queen Tephi, of Ireland, who was the daughter of Zedekiah; but the difficulty has been to supply a chart of the line from Queen Tephi to King Fergus, of Scotland. This we now supply, and it is in itself a matter vital to the very best interests of the British Empire.

Editor Restitution:

We again commenced an examination of the false systems of theology on the 1st inst., and continued our meetings for two weeks, principally speaking upon "Life through Christ and him only." As a natural consequence this brought out the opposition and a combined demonstration against our views was made by Methodists, Presbyterians and Campbellites, consisting in a number of discourses on the immortality of the soul and the spiritual reign of Christ, one minister affirming that our efforts were similar to the kick of a fly and could not upset the doctrines of orthodox churches, yet praise God the truth has had its desired effect and although Brother Sherrell and myself have been represented as religious monstrosities, and the truths of God held up in public ridicule, yet one more put on Christ by baptism, and one, too, who is said to think for himself, and is now an earnest worker in the cause of truth, and some more we hope will follow his good example soon. Our brethren here all look upon THE RESTITUTION as being our best paper, and gladly welcome its weekly visit. Our church house we hope will soon be ready, as we are no longer welcome in the so-called orthodox houses. Brother and Sister L. D. Potter, of McMinnville, Oregon, have come among us to live. Others are coming soon as they say to be with the brethren. May God help you in your noble work is our prayer.

Editor Restitution:

DEAR BROTHER:—Herewith I enclose two dollars for my subscription for 1883. Will send more as soon as I can. I am a poor man and have had quite a hard time from the spring of '82 until the present. Last summer had a great deal of sickness in my family, and in September last I laid my sweet, darling babe to rest, aged one year, two months and three days; it was hard to part with her but it was the Lord's will; she seemed to be too pure to stay with us any longer, the enemy has laid her low, but thanks be to God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ, I shall with patience wait the appointed time of our Lord, and will meet her again a beautiful child of God. I am constantly waiting and looking for the soon return of our departed Lord. The Lord afflicted us sorely, but his mercy endureth forever.

We are all in moderately good health. I have also had a sick brother to old and aged, he and family, and taking Brother Paul's word for a guide (as I always do). "He that provideth not for his own, especially for his own household is worse than an infidel; but the Lord will prosper those who put their trust in him." I am still laboring in the cause of my Master, speaking twice a month, and hope to do so as long as the Lord letteth me live, or have any being. I would say to any of our brothers and sisters in Kansas, or elsewhere, if they should desire to hear me, if they will assist me to go to such places so desired, I will do so cheerfully, for I love to meet with those that really love the Lord. I now go 30 miles away on horseback to preach a risen Savior to poor perishing mortals, and the establishment of God's kingdom again upon the earth. Hoping and praying you will still bear with me in patience for this year's money, and asking the prayers of all the brothers and sisters in Christ, I ever remain your brother in Christ, the Lord sustaining me, though I be an Indian. Yet we are all of one blood and one God and Father. Now may the Lord sustain you in your work and labor, is my humble prayer.

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, May 10, 1883.

WILL probably attend the conference at Mendon, Mich.

OUR appointment for Pierceton on the second Sunday in June is hereby withdrawn on account of the Antioch meeting.

A DESTRUCTIVE tornado swept across eastern Kansas and western Missouri on Sunday evening, resulting in the destruction of a great deal of property and the loss of a number of lives.

WE omitted our Oriental Sketches last week and this, and supply the place with letters from Mrs. Davis. We have sent what money we had on hand in a draft on London, as we have reason to fear that some money sent has been lost. We send sixteen dollars this week in this way.

WE give two selections this week—one from the Bible Banner, and one from Dr. McCulloh's Analytical Investigations concerning the credibility of the Scriptures and of the religious system inculcated in them—both having a bearing on the nature of our adorable Redeemer. If we say anything for ourself on this theme it will be after we give two or three more selections from McCulloh's works. We think about as little of formulated creeds on this inexplicable doctrine of divine revelation as the Doctor, and rest our own faith on the express declarations of God's word without substraction, addition or interpolation.

The Church of God at Antioch, Marshall Co., Indiana, appoints its annual June meeting to commence on Friday, June 8, at 4 p. m., to continue over the following Sunday. Meeting on Saturday at 10 a. m. The place of meeting is 5 miles south of Plymouth and 3 miles north of Argos. A cordial invitation to brethren and sisters to attend.

BY ORDER OF THE CHURCH.

THE following short selections are from our European exchanges of the latest date. The first is from the Bible Standard for May. The line of the contemplated canal is not fully indicated. The article — Explorations in Egypt—is from the Glasgow Messenger for May. It contains some additional facts regarding discoveries in the land of the Nile supplementary to facts given in former numbers of THE RESTITUTION. As all these matters illustrate historical and prophetical Scripture we shall try to keep our readers fully posted. We are living in a sublime period of the world's history.

PROPOSED SHIP-CANAL IN PALESTINE.

"It is clear that, great as is the might of the British Empire, it is not mighty enough to maintain the Ottoman Empire much longer. The Ottoman Empire is rapidly dying. The Sultan refuses to carry out any reform, to make even any material change in his system of government; and disorder, anarchy, and disaffection are rife in every one of his provinces. Armenia is ready to welcome the Russians. Syria is believed to be ripe for revolt. Arabia is known to be intensely hostile." This occurs in an article in the Daily News, and shows how near, in the estimation of the secular Press, is that much-to-be-desired event. It is of interest to us as indicating how rapidly we are approaching that period when "the times of the Gentiles shall be fulfilled."

We below call attention to a scheme now in the air for making a ship-canal from the Mediterranean, via the Jordan, Jerusalem, and the Dead Sea, to the Eastern arm of the Red Sea. To us the scheme seems eminently practical. Its effect on Palestine, if realized, would be immense, making Jerusalem one of the principal sea-ports of the East,—a depot for goods intended for the whole of Syria, Arabia, etc. Its bearing upon Jewish restoration can be seen at a glance.

A correspondent writes from Ashton-under-Lyne, as follows:—"A new and interesting project for a great waterway to the East as an alternative to the Suez Canal, was mooted today by the London Chamber of Shipping. Mr. Conry, a well-known shipowner of London and Belfast, hinted that a great scheme has recently been under the consideration of practical and enterprising men for a great waterway to be made by flooding the valley of the Jordan, and utilising the basin of the Dead Sea. The latter lies 700 feet below the ordinary sea level, and the only engineering works required would be a canal 26 miles long at each end, whilst the cost would be vastly less than that of constructing a second canal through the Isthmus of Suez."—Manchester Courier, Feb. 16.

Our correspondent adds:—"How few of those who have read the above have realized the fact that the project formed for mercantile purposes by our British merchants, is the outcome of a prophecy in Ezekiel xlvii., and which Scripture plainly says is to take place before the restoration of Israel and Judah to their own land."

EXPLORATIONS IN EGYPT.

A popular writer once expressed the wish that it were in our power to sweep away the sand that has accumulated through centuries over the ancient cities and plains of Egypt, so as to be able to read the history that lies buried beneath. A kindred desire, of much less ambitious extent, has led, the other day, to the starting, under the auspices of a special Exploration Fund, of excavations at Tel-el-Machuta, half-way between Ismaila and Tel-el-Kebir. The first few turns of the spade seem to have yielded results of some importance and interest. It was supposed before starting that the mound in question (Tel-el-Machuta) was the ancient Raam(s)es. It is proved, however, by an inscription dug up, "to be at once the Pithom and the Succoth of the Bible. Pithom was the sacred name descriptive of the temple; and Succoth (Tuku) the civil appellation. We read of Pithom as one of the cities built by the Israelites during the oppression (Exod. i., ii.), and Succoth was their first station in the march of the Exodus. Exod. xii. 37, xiii. 20. The discovery not only places Pithom Succoth on the map, but in doing so gives us at last a fixed point in the route of the Israelites out of Egypt."

"The importance of the identification of this Pithom Succoth as the veritable halting-place in the Exodus march, in place of its being the city of Ramses, whence the start took place, cannot be exaggerated."

The Jewish World, in urging its readers to take a practical interest in the further prosecution of the inquiry, says:—

"The latest discoveries made by M. Naville, and communicated to the Exploration Fund, are extremely interesting, and confirm fully the identification of Pithom. He has dug out the store house, which consisted of rectangular chambers, built with very thick brick walls, with no access but from the top,' and he has no doubt that these chambers represent the store house of Pithom,' one of the 'Arc Miskenot,' which the children of Israel built for the Pharaoh of the oppression —a most remarkable discovery, all will admit. In addition, M. Naville has come across a hawk in red granite, bearing in his claws a cartouche of Ramses II., the Pharaoh of the Bible, for whom the Israelites were compelled to build the 'store city,' which occupied the site of what is now the mound El-Maschuta. The excavations have further resulted in bringing to light an inscribed statute of the reign of the Pharaoh Osorkon II., a sovereign of the twenty-second dynasty whose monuments are extremely rare. This dynasty was of oriental origin, and is one of the most interesting to readers of the Bible and students of Jewish history. It included the Pharaoh whose daughter King Solomon married; the Pharaoh who sheltered Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, who caused Israel to sin,' when he fled to Egypt and conspired against Rehoboam; Shishak, King of Egypt, who successfully invaded Palestine; and Zerah the Ethiopian, whom Asa, King of Judah, defeated and drove out of the land. It must not be forgotten that but a few yards of ground have been turned over by the excavators; and yet the result has been the 'discovery of Pithom and the whole elucidation,' as Mr. Reginald S. Poole says, 'of the geography of the town.' What might not be anticipated from a systematic exploration of the land of Goschen, full as it is of promising sites and historic ruins, were the means forthcoming to enable the Egypt Exploration Fund to prosecute the work as vigorously as it should be done."

Who Are the Dynamiters?

For the time powerful explosives in the hands of ruffians threaten the lives of sovereigns and prime ministers, and the existence of public buildings. There is general alarm in high quarters, and extreme precautions are adopted. The matter presents a moral and religious side. Infidelity and Romanism furnish the cowardly and brutal operators in dynamite, which seems to be the most powerful and most easily handled of the dangerous compounds. Men who have been instructed in, and who believe the Bible, are not among the conspirators. Infidel and Romish journals attempt to justify these cowardly assaults upon life and property. Finally atheistic science comes to the front to arouse the miscreants who threaten rulers and statesmen with fearful injuries or a terrible death. Prince Krapotkine, a leader of the conspirators receives the sympathy of men of science, and they petition for his release from imprisonment because he is a scientist.—Christian Intelligencer.

JERUSALEM, April 16, 1883.

Dear Brother U.:

Your kind letter of March 10th is just received with the enclosed draft, I am sorry to add that the letter alluded to of Jan. 2nd has not been received. I went directly to the Consul and he is sure that no such letter has been received at the Consulate. He says, however, that two mails have been lost, one was burned and one was given in charge of a fellah at Jaffa to bring to Jerusalem, and the man with the mail disappeared. The fellah has been found and imprisoned, but the mail bag has not come to light; this was the Turkish post; the Austrian is safe, but we cannot control the routes and our letters will come as it happens. But do not worry about it, I said the Lord so ordered the matter; and I did not allow it to trouble me, as I am sure there are no accidents. Well, let it go, I only hope some one will get it who needs it; I know a long time ago that God did not send me here to starve. Everybody is kind to me; the Jews are so kind, I think they would share their last loaf with me. I work hard, but that is just what the Lord sees that I need and he gives me plenty, and I am sure that I like it. I am not much consequence any way, and that suits me as I like quiet. I desire to be in a condition to bear all things, and not to be worried by anything, neither praise nor blame. Mrs. Low Wallace is very friendly to me. I have just written her a long letter. She is much interested in Americans in Palestine.

I learned yesterday that twenty thousand Jews are coming here from Arabia; they are coming every week and it is really marvellous how they are sustained here; they come, go about their business and no one knows any more about it. There is plenty for all. Provisions never seem to look here; a thousand pilgrims may come and no one knows it by any scarcity, nor do provisions rise in price on that account; it is remarkable.

I have been out in the fields gathering flowers this afternoon. There are beautiful flowers everywhere, by the roadside, in the valleys, on the mountains, all over the rocks, on the walls, and oh how beautiful they are! We ask each other, if it is so now, what will it be in the restoration.

Mr. and Mrs. Merrill have just returned from a visit to Moab beyond the Jordan. Mrs. M. said you have no idea of Palestine until you have crossed the Jordan. "I tell you, Mrs. Davis, you have no conception of the beauty and fertility of the land of Moab; it is simply glorious." She said "we were quite lost one night and could not find our camps and were obliged to sleep in a thorn patch, but we were very comfortable indeed, and I assure you we felt quite safe. In the morning the bedouin women came to visit us and were quite amused at seeing my ruffles, they closely inspected every article of my clothing, and when I mounted my horse they were quite astonished that I could ride on a side saddle. The custom of the Arabs is to ride astride the same as the men do. The nature of the Arab women is naturally kind and hospitable." Whenever I walk out alone and pass a group of Arab women, or Turkish in fact, they always insist upon my coming to sit with them and share their lunch, and I must confess that I rather like their company.

Mr. Friedlander, agent for the London Jews Society, has left today for Europe to collect funds for colonizing the Russian Jews; he has been very successful in his work thus far. Mr. F. is a proselyte.

I shall make the bouquets as soon as possible, and send. It is much work to prepare the flowers and then to arrange the cards, but pressing the flowers is by far the most tedious, I have set up many nights to accomplish this work as they must be pressed immediately after being gathered. But I shall leave the price entirely to your judgment.

Next week is the Jewish Passover, and I have already been generously supplied with passover cakes.

I enclose a small Turkish coin for your brother; it is the only one I can get hold of today. Nearly all coin used here is French and Russian; the coin enclosed is Turkish and its value 10 paras. I will send a better one soon. I have many letters and cards to mail today. I think a check is the best means of sending, but if a letter is registered it is safe. I fear other letters have been lost. God bless and keep you dear brother is my prayer.

A. E. DAVIS.

INHERENT NATURE OF CHRIST AND THEORIES OF THE ATONEMENT. No. 1.

Whether the apostles themselves possessed any knowledge concerning the inherent nature of Jesus Christ, or of the theory by which the salvation of mankind was accomplished, I altogether doubt, for why should they forbear to communicate it when their great business was to convince and convert the world? Or if they were forbidden to announce it, what must we think of the presumption of theologians who have undertaken to expound these subjects as being matters essential to the Christian faith. However, whether the apostles had this knowledge or not, they have made no communication to mankind on these particulars, and in preaching the gospel whether to the Jews or to the heathen, they never offered any other consideration to them than that the Old Testament prophets had announced a variety of predictions concerning the Messiah, which had all been fulfilled in the life, doctrine, death, and resurrection of Jesus of Nazareth. Any other argument used by them was in appealing to the miracles and other supernatural evidences that they were enabled to perform by an invocation to Jehovah in the name of Jesus of Nazareth.

But notwithstanding the New Testament writers have given us no instruction whether as concerns the inherent nature of the Lord Jesus Christ, nor of the theory by which he accomplished the salvation of mankind, theologians have undertaken to expound these matters with all formality, and have so far prevailed in enforcing them, that the great mass of Christians actually believe that an unhesitating assent to these theological expositions, are matters in which their salvation is most deeply involved. The extensive prevalence of such belief, therefore, seems to require that in addition to what we have shown that the apostles inculcated nothing on such subjects, that we should furthermore exhibit the amount of anomalies, and inconsistencies of prevailing theological speculations, so that in discerning their irreconcilability with the Scriptures, we may the more willingly regard them as being entirely presumptuous: That the reader may with as little prejudice as possible enter upon this investigation, I call his attention to Christ's own words, "No one knoweth who the Son is but the Father," a remark made by him, Luke x. 22, and which I interpret in the most absolute manner.

To this rigid conclusion I have been led by a very full examination of the different controversies among theologians on this subject, in which I find nothing but contradictions and utterly inexplicable anomalies. But as some of my readers probably have never thoroughly studied the subject, they may not be prepared to adopt my conclusion as to its utter incomprehensibility. To convince them therefore of this fact, it may be necessary that I should establish the correctness of my deduction by showing them the entire insufficiency of any prevailing theological exposition. That there are any passages in the New Testament writings that formally or explicitly instruct us as to the inherent nature of Jesus Christ, or as concerns the theory upon which the salvation of mankind was accomplished by him, no theologian can pretend to assert, be his opinions on those subjects what they may. But notwithstanding this remarkable omission which could only have proceeded from the determination of God not to make mankind any revelation on these particulars, theologians have undertaken to penetrate into his counsels, and through inferences deduced from various passages of Scripture, they have made conclusions which they have urged with the utmost dogmatism upon the Christian world, as matters of belief essential to their salvation. Of how little value these inferences of theologians are, is however strongly exhibited to us in the utterly opposite conclusions to which they have arrived. Thus with respect to the inherent nature of the Lord Jesus Christ, there are three different opinions. 1. That of the Trinitarians, who assert he was co-essential, co-eternal, co-equal with Jehovah, and that together with the Holy Spirit, they constitute a Trinity which, though of three persons, are but one God.

2. The Arians affirm that Jesus Christ is the highest of all created spirits or intelligences, but inferior to Jehovah as a son is to his father. They deny the personality of the Holy Spirit, and consequently reject the doctrine of the Tri-unity.

3. The Humanitarians or Socinians, consider Jesus Christ to have been a mere man, the Son of Joseph and Mary.

It signifies nothing that the large majority of intellectual, learned, and devout Christians have adopted the Trinitarian hypothesis. I fully admit the fact, but truth does not depend upon majorities, and if we look at individuals who have rejected the doctrine of the Trinity, we shall find among them some of the brightest names in the history of the world, whether we estimate them by their genius, learning, or piety. It is scarcely necessary to mention Locke, Sir Isaac Newton, Milton, Dr. Samuel Clarke, Lardner, Priestley, etc. One would suppose that the radical differences that thus exist among the intellectual, the learned, and the devout, concerning this subject, would have opened the eyes of mankind as to its incomprehensibility. On the contrary however, the fact of an opposition to the prevailing assumption has merely excited the indignation of the majority, and induced them to regard such persons as the enemies of God, whom it was justifiable to treat with reproaches, persecutions, and in darker ages to put them to death. That the Anti-Trinitarians have not acted in a similar manner, is specially referrible to their want of power; for in the fourth century when the Arian controversy was at its height, they persecuted the Trinitarians whenever they had the opportunity. But though the Christian world has not yet learned to appreciate the fact, that the inherent nature of Jesus Christ, and the principle by which the salvation of mankind was effected through him, are utterly incomprehensible matters, as not having been revealed to us in the Scriptures, yet surely it is to be hoped they will not continue in their misapprehension of these subjects if they be fairly exhibited to them.

Encouraged by this hope, as well as to bear my humble testimony on the subject, I will attempt to bring it to the full comprehension of my readers, by showing the utter irreconcilabilities and anomalies that are involved in every human speculation on these doctrines, whether according to the theories of the Trinitarians, Arians, or Socinians. Theologians, at least those of modern times, seem to have investigated the question of the inherent nature of Jesus Christ upon a kind of syllogistic basis. They have inferred in the first place, that he must either be God, or less than God, or a mere man; for they cannot imagine any other conditions of being. Having laid down this basis, they have examined the Scriptures, and having classified the several texts bearing on the subject, they have then come to a conclusion from them, that the doctrine and teaching of the Scriptures implies either that he was God, or less than God, or a mere man, according to the alternatives offered in the premise assumed.

After having adopted one or the other conclusion as being the most plausible, they have then either disregarded other texts anomalous to, or opposing their inference, or they explain them away so as to suit their opinion, and then arraying together whatever sustains their belief, they publish them to the world, embodying such an apparent array of texts and arguments in their favor, that those whose opinions are either made up or inclined towards any particular one of the three hypotheses, consider these summaries to be altogether unanswerable. Instead of being any demonstration of the subject, such expositions are merely compends of what may be advanced in favor of any particular opinion. Whatever notion therefore men may have, on the subject, and whatever amount of Scripture texts they may adduce in favor of their several opinions, their belief is merely inferential, from the undeniable fact that the New Testament writers have not made any explicit statement on the subject.

As the opinion therefore, be it which of three it may, is only an inference, we can only test the strength of such inference by other inferential reasoning that bears upon the subject. If as an inference it is considered that the Scripture teaches any particular doctrine, the inference if it be good must explain every apparent anomaly or inconsistency involved in such inference. If it cannot explain it, then the inference is not good, as not explaining what is anomalous or contradictory. Men ought not to allow themselves to be deceived with any fallacy in this case as implying that the anomalies or inconsistences of theological inferences are to be protected by the incomprehensibility of the subject itself. That a subject may be incomprehensible is very possible, and if it is so, then it should be left in its incomprehensibility. But surely no one can be illogical enough to allow a person to give an inferential construction to an incomprehensible subject, and then when requested to explain any anomaly or inconsistency involved in such inference, to plead that as the subject belongs to the incomprehensible nature or purposes of the Almighty, it is presumptuous for men to undertake to scrutinize such matters any farther than he has been pleased to reveal himself.* This they assume to be precisely to the extent of their peculiar inference, and thus the infinite and incomprehensible nature of the Almighty is used merely as a shield to protect any presumptuous exposition which theology sees fit to put upon the unrevealed purposes of the Creator of the universe.*—From McCulloh's Credibility of the Scriptures.

*Such reasoning as this, constitutes a fallacy which is not distinctly laid down in our treatises on logic. It is indeed in a certain degree "begging of the question," but it is more especially that subtle sophism which the lawyers term "negative pregnant with an affirmative," i. e., while it asserts a denial, it at the same time makes an affirmation. An incautious reasoner entrapped by this sophism, will find it extremely difficult to extricate himself. It is of such frequent use in the defence of theological speculations that I have thought it advisable to warn the reader on the subject.

Spring.

When the buds begin to swell;
When the streams lead thro' the dell;
When the swallows dip and fly,
Wheeling, circling thro' the sky;
When the Violet bids the Rose
Waken from its long repose;

When the goats in sunshine dance;
When the long, bright hours advance;
When the robin by the door
Sings as he'er he sang before;
Then, when heart, and flower, and wing
Leap and laugh—then comes the spring.

Bad thoughts, if cherished, blight virtue, destroy purity, and undermine the stablest foundations of character. They are like rot in timber; like rust in iron. They eat into the man. And when the process has gone on for a while and there comes the stress of an outward temptation, down they go into a mass of ruins! Ships go out to sea, all bright with fresh paint, their sails all spread and streamers flying, and never come back, never reach port. Why? They met a storm and went down, because they were rotten. Under the paint was decay! Just so bad thoughts, vile, impure thoughts and imaginations, rot the manly oak of character, rust the iron of principle, slacken all the stays of virtue, and leave the man, the woman, to the violence of temptation, with no interior of reserve power to stand the shock. Bad thoughts fed and fattened are the bottom vice of society.

Natural History.—Corn and Coffee.

Columbus, in his first voyage, in 1492, discovered corn in use by the Indians of Cuba, and afterwards by those of Hayti. Among the trophies of the new world that this great navigator laid at the feet of his sovereigns, on returning from this remarkable voyage to the unknown country, were a few ears of maize, or "Indian corn." Neglected were they amongst the mass of rich plunder — gold, gems, and strange copper-skined captives—that greeted the eyes of Ferdinand and Isabella; but the golden ears were of far more value to the world than all the treasure that subsequently flowed into their coffers from new Spain.

The spread of the wonderful grain was rapid, and that which had hitherto constituted the chief food of the American Indian was spread all over Europe, Asia and Africa.

Until the present year, I had hardly given a thought to the origin of this plant, when last April I had it brought home to me most forcibly. In a blind, unquestioning way, I had always admired the great fields of corn that the farms of New England are sometimes covered with, but had never asked whether it was the product of our own or another zone. It was in the home of the corn, on the uplands of Mexico, that it flashed upon me that this noble friend was a child of the tropics!

Then I wondered that I had not before noticed its broad, clinging leaves, its tall, tassel-crowned form and luxuriant growth, all of which proclaimed it as a native of a warmer clime. In Mexico, or in the equally elevated plains of Peru, corn had its birth; here it finds the union of hot "growing" days with cool moist nights.

A thousand years before New England acquired a name, the Indians of Mexico cultivated this precious cereal. Even at the present day it is their sole support.

It is but a few months since I returned from a long ride of a thousand miles, on horseback, through the hills of southern Mexico, where the Indian villages were entirely hidden in vast fields of corn. The great stalks, with their waving tassels, like the feathered crests of warriors of old, towered to the height of fifteen feet, far above our heads as we sat in our saddles.

It was among those hills that I saw the products of two widely different countries most curiously blended—corn and coffee, the leaves of the one interlacing the branches of the other.

First found in the heated forests of Abyssinia, beneath the triple sun of Africa, coffee was not known to the world beyond till about four hundred years ago. Thence a learned mufti brought it out of its seclusion of centuries; and introduced it to his companion dervishes. It spread to Mecca about 1500, and Constantinople fifty years later, though the followers of Mahomet were forbidden to use it for a long time. A hundred years later it reached London, but twenty years more elapsed before it came into use in France. The Dutch, too, introduced it into Java, in 1680, and as a rare plant into the botanical gardens of Amsterdam. The new world obtained its supply from a single plant, which a French naval officer carried to Martinique, in the West Indies, in 1720, depriving himself of water, when parched with thirst, that the tender shoot might survive. From this one tree, it is said, all the American tropical colonies obtained their seed, which has multiplied to such an extent that Brazil, the West Indies, and Mexico supply us with as much as Java and Ceylon. These are at present the great coffee countries, the product of Mocha, though most delicious, being small in quantity.

This, then, is the history of the wanderings of the coffee-plant from the far Orient till it met the maize, and this daughter of the East joined hands with the plumed chieftain of the West.

The point at which I discovered them thus united was four thousand feet above the sea, in a lovely garden shaded by bananas and filled with singing birds. It is at this elevation that the coffee best thrives, for here it gets shade and moisture—which the lowlands cannot invariably supply—and a temperature changing but slightly from year to year. When a grove is started in the primitive forest many of the large trees are left standing to give the required shade; and when commenced on the lowlands where there are no trees, broad-leafed plants like the banana, are planted.

The tree naturally attains a height of about twenty feet, but in the plantations is pruned down to eight or ten, forming, with its straight, horizontal branches, a beautiful, dome-shaped mass of green. The leaves are broad and glossy green, sometimes concealing the "berries," or fruit, which cluster along the slender twigs and branches. The coffee is shaped like a small bean, and two of these beans are found side by side, adhering by their flat surfaces, inclosed in a pulp covered by an outside skin, forming a berry the size of a cherry. This is at first green, but ripens into a bright red when it is gathered.

A coffee-plantation in these upland valleys is one of the most beautiful things out of doors. Wide, straight paths are opened through it, above which are the dark-green coffee-trees gleaming with berries, or filling the air with perfumed gales from clouds of snowy blossoms.—Youth's Companion.

The French expedition to Tonquin has produced in China a hostility to the French name, so decided that for the protection of merchants there it is deemed prudent to retain several French ironclads near Shanghai and Hong Kong; therefore only a portion of the squadron in Chinese waters will proceed to Tonquin. It is expected that Captain Korgaradec, French envoy to Annam, will be appointed Lieutenant-Governor of Tonquin when a protectorate is established. It is stated that the French Minister to Pekin, who was ordered to return home, has been instructed to remain at Pekin until further orders.

To the Friends of "The Restitution."

The cost of publishing THE RESTITUTION for the year just closed exceeded the receipts over $380. To repay this deficiency and secure means to publish the paper another year, we must raise, outside the regular subscription, at least $500. To secure that amount, the Board of Directors have requested me to appeal to each subscriber to contribute at least one dollar extra. This is not asked as a donation, but brethren are requested to send names of persons to whom they wish the paper sent, with their contributions and the paper will be sent to such persons in payment for the amounts sent by each.

There are a large number of brethren and sisters in different localities who are unable to pay for the paper, and who would be very glad of the privilege of reading it. These are known to Brother Chaplin, the Editor. I would suggest that brethren who have no one to whom they specially desire to send the paper, send their contributions to THE RESTITUTION office with a request that the paper be sent to some worthy Christian who will appreciate it, but who is unable to pay for it. In this way brethren will be able to gladden the hearts of many poor but honest good Christians, and at the same time help to furnish the means to keep the paper going.

The fund will be known as "Free Will Offerings." Let each reader of THE RESTITUTION make a small sacrifice, and contribute at least one dollar, always remembering that the many persons to whom the paper will be thus sent will thank and bless you, and your Heavenly Father will reward you.

R. S. PRETORIUS, President.

FORGIVE AND FORGET.

Forget! for why remember
The wrongs of yesterday!
Perchance kind words were spoken
To heal the breach to-day!
And let the past forever be
A bleak leaf in your memory.

Forget the old year's failing.
The new will have its share,
Each one will find that haply
He has enough to bear;
Without the memory of the wrong
That to the old year doth belong.

"Let bygones be bygones,"—for why
Should thoughts that engender strife
Be nourished in our bosom—
That but embitter life,
And fill this world, that else was fair,
With scenes of sorrow, strife and care.

Forgive: for why should we withhold
The blessing that we need,
Or let an erring brother
In vain for mercy plead!
Oh! cold must be the hearts and rare,
That could reject the suppliant's prayer!

Forgive: let old affections
Be stirred within the heart,
Pre-dincing kindly feelings
That light and warmth impart,
And make our onward course less sad,
By making home fireside more glad.

Forgive: for time's swift pinions
Are bearing me along;
And few may be our mom-nts
To do or suffer wrong:
Then let us while the power is given,
Forgive as we would be forgiven!

"THE LOGOS." John i. 1-14.

The Simplicity and Reality of this Truth.

"The logos" appears in the usual form of personification; but "the life," the light, the kosmos, appear in the like form, and thus fifteen times it occurs in this context; and a thousand times doubtless, in the New Testament, and still more in the Old.

I. "The logos" is from lego, I speak, say, etc. O logos is what is spoken; "The Lord spake all these words (logoi pl. legon pardoiplo) saying," the ten words (logoi pl, ten commandments)." Ex. xx. 1. xxxiv. 27, 28. He sent his word (logos) and healed them.—Psalm cvii. 20. This logos is so used over 1000 times in the Greek O. T.—Tromlis' Concordance. Thus its synonym is used in Hebrew, Greek, Latin and English over 1000 with no shadow of mystery. Nay more, it so occurs 200 times in the New Testament.

The Jews "made the logos of God of none effect by their tradition." Mk. vii. 13; Luke iv. 19; xxiv. 19, 28.

Thy O logos is truth." John xvii. 17. St. Paul's O logos was not with enticing logois (words) of man's wisdom." 1 Cor. ii. 4.

"Preach the word"—literally, Herald the logos. 2 Tim. iv. 1, 2. But enough, (this may be) to lift this term above imagination, into the light of God, and on the plane of the real faith in the ancient worthies, and a sound mind in us.

II. John came, as written the logoon (gen. pl. of logos) of Tesiah, legontos, (saying) a voice crying, etc. Luke iii. 4. John was "the voice," but "the word (of promise) made flesh" was Jesus. "God said, Let there be light—light was." Gen. i. 3. So of "the Sun of Righteousness." Amen.

The word of promise—logos evangelias—to Abraham secured Isaac, and thence the same word through Israel ensured Jesus, God's only begotten Son, in the fullness of time, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem. Gal. iv. 4; Rom. ix. 9; Luke i. 26-35. Here is the occasion, the propriety and cause, distinctly given, for calling Jesus "the Son of God." Adam was his son made of the dust, Luke iii. 38, but Jesus was "the begotten Son of God" and born of Mary—the seed of the woman—of David—Abraham, and so the Son of Man."

III. We call the Bible "the word of God," and such it is, revealing him and his works and ways, but not a Divine Being—in advance of Jesus, as assumed. But how did it come from God? Through five agues (alone) and 1500 years. But as Jesus was the crowning theme of the logos of promise and prophecy, he is himself, par-excellence, "called the word" as he is "the resurrection and the life," John xi. 25, and the word of the life, manifested as Jesus, "seen, heard and handled." 1 John i. 3.

The word (O logos) of the life, demonstrates its grammatical value as a phrase—not a being; just as "this (bread) is my body—this cup is my blood," Mat. xxvi. 26-29; John vi. 52-58, old yet qualified by verse 63, "The Spirit quickeneth—the flesh (bread as taken for his body broken) profiteth nothing." "The words I speak unto you are spirit and life"—life-creating anew.

IV. Thus saith the wisdom (o sophia) of God, Luke xi. 49. I wisdom dwell with prudence; and this is personated some thirty times. However it was "the wisdom of God," but not another divine pre-existence.

V. But was there not something before Jesus? Yes indeed, God was! He spake the word, the logos, and creation came. Psa. xxxiii. 6-9. Nay more; of him, through him, and to him, are all things; through the 4000 years of type and personal manifestation, as time and event led on to our Lord Jesus, in the fullness of time! Nay, still more. The logos evangelias, Rom. ix. 6, the word of promise and prophecy were of God, in all their unfolding stages, through the fathers, the law and the prophets, and pre-eminently in the one hundred items of "the eternal purpose," purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord, before the world, but were accomplished in his first advent. All these were there to demonstrate his divine Sonship, as revealed, touching time, order and event.

VI. The Christian calling,—the church of the first born—also was chosen in him to eternal life, before the world began; but he hath in due times manifested his word (the logos) through preaching, and so our calling into divine sonship has come on the line that Jesus did. Eph. i. 4; Titus i. 3; Rom. viii. 30; Heb. ii 5, etc. As the children were partakers of flesh and blood, he took part of the same—it was essential.

VII. "As God is true our preaching [O logos] way not yea and nay. For the Son of God, Jesus Christ, was not yea and nay; for all the promises of God in him are yea, and in him amen, to the glory of God. 2 Cor. i. 20. He had not been pre-existent, nor was he to be post-existent, as Christendom has assumed to make him.

Thus O logos—the word of the eternal life—which was with the Father was manifested, fulfilled, to us in Jesus, on time! 1 John i. 1, 2.

It was "by the logos, word, of truth, by the power of God and the armor of righteousness," that St. Paul commended himself to every man's conscience in the sight of God.

Please note: God's standard of testimony is "two or three witnesses," but here are seven classes of them; and these are sustained by over a thousand others. Nay, other terms—epos, eros, and rema—may be interchanged more or less with logos, and so make its import literal and unmistakably certain.

Then how has "the logos" been taken to teach a pre-existent personal Christ?

With reverence and in pity for humanity the answer may refer to the prevailing worship of the Host—the consecrated wafer, taken as the real presence—the person of Christ in the Lord's Supper service. Both alike, however diverse in theory, disparage and question the record that God has given of his Son.

All should know that all the precious promises and prophecies were in the logos, the word. It was "the prophetioon logon, to which we do well to take heed, as a light, till the day dawn." Those which have been, or are yet to be, fulfilled in and by Jesus, the Son of God, at his second coming and kingdom are embraced.

The logos of "the seed"—Jesus—was to faith of old, as the logos of the kingdom to come, is now to us, a verbal bond; "yea and amen" to become the crowning glory of the Lord, that shall fill the whole earth. Neither a foretold event or person, has ever occurred or existed but so as to fulfil the word in historical reality. See Pentecost, Acts ii.

A pre-existent Savior, like a post-existent sacrifice in the mass, is a delusion to "catch away the word" and to divert us from the way, the truth, and the life, Jesus and the resurrection! His name is the only name given for salvation, to man or creation. No theory of the logos can compete or compare with this one name; Jesus, the personal, and Christ the official name. This rock, on which faith builds, is without a crevice or a seam. "The rock of ages." "Open thou our eyes" to see the mountains of pre-existent and post-existent sand, and build only on this!

As there is no flaw in the logos of promise there will be no failure in its performance. The Lord Jesus fills and so seals the vision and prophesy. Dan. ix. 24. Jesus in promise, Jesus in his first coming to teach and suffer; and his second coming and kingdom, is the sum, the all and in all, of divine bestowment.

Please observe, beloved, that testimony to primal truth, however overlooked, is not controversy; but godly edifying, and always in order. 1 Cor. xiv. 20; 1 Tim. i. 4.

To the Brethren in Michigan.

The Grand Rapids and Indiana Railroad will carry delegates to our Annual Conference at Mendon, from all points between Sturgis and the northern terminus for one and one third fare for the round trip. All who desire to avail themselves of this offer should apply for tickets to Elder E. Hoyt, Grand Rapids, Mich., as the tickets must be procured in advance. Each organized church should elect delegates. Brethren not connected with any organized church will be considered delegates.

OUR LORD JESUS CHRIST—WAS HE DIVINE?

The world has seen many great men—good and wise men, who commanded respect, and in some cases received the adoration of nations for centuries after their deaths; yet, whatever of romance and mystery we find thrown around them after their disappearance from earth, a very little sober, careful criticism shows, beyond all possible question, that they were, with all their greatness and glory and influence, only men like ourselves—erring, sinning, mortal men. And after such a brief investigation of their history, no one would ever have the slightest question as to their simple, complete humanity.

This is true of all, with one exception—Jesus of Nazareth. Take the history we have of his words and works, divesting it of all discernible halo of imagination and myth, and the fact remains that men of all ages, from his own time to the present, men of clear intellect and careful thought, his followers and those who have paid very little attention indeed to his commands, have somehow been convinced that he was more than man, and though mighty efforts have been made to destroy this belief, yet somehow it happens that more people believe it to-day than ever before. Though advanced scholarship has tried to prove that he was only a man, and "higher criticism" has tried hard to show that everything in the Record calculated to prove him more than this, is an accretion of a later date; yet many—to say the least—of the best scholars see no way to avoid the old conclusion that he was something more. Though sceptics and infidels have made this a great point of attack, yet from sceptics themselves have been wrung admissions of his exalted nature, which sound strangely like the writings of Christians.

At first thought, however, there is something very remarkable in the fact that the "super-human" idea of Jesus has got such a hold on the minds of men. We can easily explain how a childish, credulous age, might deify a man after death, forgetting the weak and bad in him, and remembering only the great and good which he showed; but how does it happen that the idea should thus become attached to one in historic times, and a critical age, and keep pace with the march of intellectual and material progress? Why has not this idea (if false) been exploded long ago, and forgotten like scores of other senseless fictions?

The fact remains that the idea is not yet exploded, but after surviving more than eighteen hundred years, bids fair to last a long time yet. Which fact shows that this question is still an open one; so far as men are concerned, and very evidently, from its very nature, an important one, with its tendency still to be decided for his divinity. We find that the question, "Who art thou?" has been one of the great questions which have come down to us through the ages, commencing even when he was on the earth; and probably there has been more thought and labor spent in regard to the nature of this one Person, than in respect to all the world of men and heroes besides. So it is no idle and profitless question if we study again the history of this wonderful One, seeking there an answer to the old question, "Who art thou?"

Even among those who have accepted the Savior of the world, there is a wide diversity of belief as to his nature. He is variously considered to be (1) a simple man, who was born, and died like other men; (2) a man who was specially gifted by God, and "exalted" after his resurrection to pre-eminent dignity; (3) man, as to the flesh, but begotten by supernatural power, and thence obtaining some close relationship with God; (4) obtaining his right to the title of "Son" only through his "resurrection from the dead;" (5) a pre-existent, created being, but only superior to others from the special favor of God; (6) "begotten" and not "created," at some time in eternity, and coming here of his own choice, being "made flesh"; (7) eternally "begotten," and consequently eternally existing; (8) one "person" of the "triune God," (9) God himself, in human form. Here we have the whole range of possible conceptions concerning him, and surely they are not all correct.

Without argument, we may safely assume that the history—his own words and works, represent him to be more than man in some sense, yet, in answering the question, "Was he divine?" it is not necessary to assume, or labor to prove, that he was God himself. These are the two extremes; the truth may lay somewhere between, he being what no man ever was, or will be, and yet "a Son."

Again, we may safely assume that nothing in his appearance—or the general circumstances of his life, would go far to show that he was more than other men in nature. If we consider the question at all, we must consider it from his own words and works, from the finale of his stay here, and from the words of those whom he sent out into the world. There is no other way to settle this matter. Philosophy will not do it; reason cannot. And if we find, even after we have become satisfied that Jesus was the Son of God—as no other man ever was—that questions of how and why are still unanswered, that is no reason why we should reject the well established fact. For, though he taught that he was the Son of God, he also said that "no man knoweth who the Son is, but the Father." Abstract reasoning, therefore, on "the nature of Christ," is unprofitable and useless.

We must also be careful not to claim more than he did. He did not claim to be God, or a part of God. He never identified himself with God except as a Son in work and purpose, and we should not. We inquire only, was he divine—one in essence with God—in a sense as we are not? And this will in a measure involve the questions of his pre-existence, his resurrection, and his final destiny. We shall examine first his own words; if they only point to simple humanity, that will be sufficient. If they claim something more, and the teaching and writings of the apostles are only confirmatory, we must either deny the Record, or admit his divinity.

He told men that he "came from God"—that he "came down from heaven," not to do his own will, but the "will of him that sent me." "No man hath ascended into heaven, but he that came down from heaven;" "What if ye shall see the Son of man ascend up where he was before," are his own words. He speaks in another place of him whom the Father hath sanctified and sent into the world." These words could not be truthfully spoken by a mere man, and if they were intended to be understood as they read, they prove that he came into this world as one who was once outside of it.

Again, he claimed special relation with God himself. Although calling himself many times the "Son of man," he also spoke of himself as the "Son of God," and that not in a general sense, as we shall see. "My Father" is a phrase of constant occurrence. He prayed to "My Father," he told his disciples to say, "Our Father." He often spoke to them of "your Father," he spoke to Mary after his resurrection as "My Father and your Father;" but he never addressed him, in prayer, or otherwise, or spoke to others of him, as "Our Father." This is a remarkable fact, and if carefully considered, will be seen to have great significance. Although he recognized the Fatherhood of God for all, himself as well as others, there was evidently some close relation which no one might share with him. Though using the same word "Father," in regard to the same Being, there is in this quiet, unbroken reserve, an invisible, impassable barrier between him and other men, which might well deter us, in our mortality, from putting ourselves at his side.

That he meant by this something more than the common Fatherhood of God, we have the most positive proof; for when he said, as a reason for healing the lame man on the Sabbath day, "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work," the Jews sought the more to kill him, because he not only had broken the Sabbath, but had said that God was his own (see Revised Version) Father, making himself (by this claim) equal with God. They understood perfectly well that he used the words Father and Son in no sense common to mankind, they expressed their feelings by trying to kill him, and he never corrected their interpretation of his words. They certainly understood that he claimed thereby a special relationship with God which he did not concede to them, and they felt justified in seeking his life for what, if untrue, was surely blasphemy. And he allowed them to believe he meant all he said.

Nay, more, when they raised the question why he, who was not yet fifty years old, should speak so familiarly of the great Abraham, their reverred ancestor, and the "friend of God," we have the astounding statement which must have come upon them like a thunderbolt from a clear sky, "Before Abraham was, I am." There was no mistaking his meaning, and a second time at least, and for the same reason he only escaped violence by quietly disappearing from them in the crowd. And though he must have known how they understood him, he gave no sign that they mistook him.

When he told the Jews that he "came from heaven," they very naturally said among themselves, "Is not this Jesus, the Son of Mary and Joseph, whose father and mother we know? How is it then that he saith, I came down from heaven?" A most natural question, and one very difficult to answer, if he were only a man. Further on he tells them, "If God were your Father, ye would love me, for I proceeded forth, and came from God."

On another occasion he startles them with the words, "I and my Father are one," and again they attempted to kill him. In answer to his remonstrance, they showed plainly that they understood him to mean something more than they claimed for themselves, by answering, "For a good work we stone thee not, but because thou, being a man, makest thyself God." To show that they did not suppose he claimed to be the God—or God himself—notice that a consistent translation would read either, "thou, being man (i. e. human), makest thyself God (i. e. divine), or "thou, being a man, makest thyself a God." And to show further that he did not suppose they so understood him, he says, after referring to the language of their Scriptures respecting themselves, "say ye of him whom the Father hath sanctified and sent into the world, Thou blasphemist, because I said I am the Son of God?"

To Philip, who said to him, "Show us the Father, and it sufficeth us," he answered: "Have I been so long a time with you, and yet hast thou not known me, Philip? He that hath seen me hath seen the Father, and how sayest thou, then, Show us the Father? Believest thou not that I am in the Father, and the Father in me? The words that I speak unto you, I speak not of myself; but the Father that dwelleth in me. He doeth the works." Jno. xiv. 9, 10. He does not say, "I am the Father," but that the Father was in him, implying not indeed identity of person, yet intimate relations to God which he conceded to no one else.

His disciples were mystified and troubled by this manner of speech, and evidently to relieve their minds, he said to them, "I came forth from the Father, and am come into the world again, I leave the world, and go to the Father." The explanation was sufficient, for they quickly answered, "Now thou speakest plainly, and speakest no parable (margin).... by this we believe that thou camest forth from God."

In the expression "only-begotten Son" used by him with reference to himself, we have strong proof that he regarded his "Sonship" as something which he did not hold in common with other men, God "so loved the world" that he gave his "only-begotten Son" to die for the world, and how does this show extraordinary love unless he sustained to God a relation closer than any one of the ten thousand martyrs who gave their lives just as freely as he did.

In the prayer he offered just before his death, he shows plainly the same assumption of superiority over other men. "And now, O Father, glorify thou me with thy own self, (more accurately in thine own presence) with the glory which I had with thee (in thy presence) before the world was." Again he says, "they [the disciples] have known surely that I came out from thee." And again, "for thou lovedest me before the foundation of the world."

Still we are not left to suppose that he was God himself, for he says expressly "My Father is greater than I," and this idea is made more prominent by his giving it as a reason why his disciples should rejoice over his departure, something as the son of a king might speak, who, absent from the capital, had given his friends proof of his power and wealth, so that they would prefer to have him remain with them forever, and who, longing for the greater glories of his father's court, should tell them on his departure, "Rejoice with me, for I go to my Father, who, notwithstanding all that I am to you, is still more to me, for in glory and power, he is greater than I."

Strictly in accord with his words, we find the record of his mighty works. Though evidently looking to God for wisdom, direction and strength, as he well might if the Father were greater than he, yet as was also becoming to one who could say, "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work," "I and my Father are one," he heals the sick, gives sight to the blind, makes the lame walk, curses the barren fig-tree, stills the tempest, walks the rolling waves, raises the dead, and utters promises of glory and threatenings of doom, which no mere man has any right to utter, all in his own name. And this is all perfectly consistent with the claim that he is the "only begotten Son," that he and his Father are "one", perfectly consistent with his admission that his Father was greater than he: but totally inconsistent with the idea that he was a mere man, or God himself.

Again, more than once, those mysterious intelligences called "Demons," acknowledged that he was the Son of God, and begged for a longer respite, as they begged from no one else. He never corrected the implication that they deemed him more than man.

But greater than all his mere "works," after a life of such mighty deeds, coupled all through with such astounding claims of kinship with God, we see — not failure and death and forgetfulness at the close but — him "declared to be the Son of God, with power, by the resurrection from the dead." This was absolutely necessary to complete the testimony of his life. Without this he would have stood as one whose life was almost a constant claim of divinity, but whose death was absolute proof of his mere humanity. With it, he is placed where we have very little reason to dispute anything whatever, which he may say in regard to himself.

If we pass to the declarations of the Apostles in their letters to the churches, we find his claims fully conceded, and his divinity asserted in stronger terms, if possible, than he himself uses. I will only quote the most important passages.

"His Son, whom he hath appointed heir of all things, by whom also he made the world: who, being the brightness of his glory, and the express image of his Person," etc. Heb. i. 2, 3. "The mystery of God, even Christ, in whom are all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge hidden." Col. ii. 2, 3 (New Revision). "The Son of his love.... who is the image of the invisible God, the first-born of all creation: for, in him were all things created, in the heaven and upon the earth, things visible and things invisible, whether thrones or dominions or principalities or powers: all things have been created through him and unto him, and he is before all things, and in him all things consist." Col. i. 13-17 (New Revision). "In him (Christ) dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead (divinity) bodily." Col. ii. 9. "In the beginning was the word, and the word was with God, and the word was God." (Not the God, but God, or divine, translated literally, "The word was with the God, and the word was God.") "The same was in the beginning with God. All things were made by (or through) him, and without him was not anything made that was made.... he was in the world, and the world was made by him, and the world knew him not.... And the word became flesh, and dwelt among us, and we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father." John i. 1, 2, 3, 10, 14. This term, "Word" does not mean an abstract idea, but a person, for we read further, that "John bare witness of him, and cried, saying, This is he of whom I spake. He that cometh after me, is preferred before, for he was before me:" — another testimony to his pre-existent glory. "To us there is but one God, the Father, of whom (as the Great First Cause) are all things, and we in him (margin, "for," New Revision, "unto"—as the goal of being), and one Lord Jesus Christ by whom (or through, as Organizer, Creator,) are all things, and we by him." 1 Cor. viii. 6. Here again we have an implication of essential divinity, though not of absolute identity with God himself.

In Rev. iii. 14 he is called "the beginning of the creation of God," which may also be understood as the origin of the creation.

"Let this mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus, who, being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God; but made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant," etc. Phil. ii. 5-7.

We find all this, and much more less direct, all bearing on the question of his divinity: all going to show that, while he need not be considered as God himself, there is nevertheless an immeasurable gulf between him and other men.

Now no one would have supposed from the appearance of Jesus, in (a merely natural) incident, that he was more than man. His birth, life and death have no token of divinity, taken apart from his own claims. So we are thus up to the testimony of the record that God hath given of his Son. And telling this, as we have done—though here and there may be found a passage which seems to point to either extreme of opinion—i. e., that he was simply man, or that it was God himself — we find:—

1. His startling and unique claims of kinship with God, of intimate knowledge of God, of being sent from God, of coming down from heaven, of being sent by the Father into the world, of having glory in the Father's presence before the world was, all combine, constituting the strongest possible claim to Divinity.

2. The admissions of demoniacs whenever brought into his presence, showing the acknowledgment of his claims by the powers of darkness.

3. The plain, matter of fact interpretation put upon his words by the Jews, and his prompt acceptance of the issue they made—that he was guilty of blasphemy and deserving of death—provided his claims were not true; all showing that we do not now misunderstand his words.

4. The questioning of his disciples in regard to these claims, their stumbling over them, and the explicit manner in which he states these claims at last, causing them, at least for a time, to lose all doubt in the matter: as proof that this interpretation of his words was not caused by the spite and prejudices of his foes.

5. The fact that these claims were made anew, almost under the very shadow of the cross, at a time when self-assurance would have been most certain to forsake any one whose hopes were not built on the Rock; as a proof that he knew what his own language meant, and how people were sure to understand it, as a proof that it was no youthful fancy, or transient purpose which inspired his words.

6. The uniform presence of God's power in his mighty works, and his crowning testimony in raising him from the dead, and exalting him to the right hand of power; as proof that God had set his seal on all that he had claimed.

7. And the filling up of the picture by the unvarying testimony of the apostles and New Testament writers, in the same directions, and in more explicit terms, leaves no room for honest, scholarly criticism to hide the great Central Fact of the whole record—that Jesus of Nazareth was the Christ the Son of the God—and that in no sense that can ever be applied to man or angel.

So the infidel or rationalising Christian who inquires how this can be, or just what relation he sustains to his Father; or who asks any of the numerous questions which are ever prompted by curiosity, and the correct answers to which could not affect the Fact; I can only say, I do not know.

The mystery of all conscious existence is beyond our reach—so high and deep that we may never attain unto it. And were we not so familiar with it in its myriad unfoldings, we might well doubt many things which pass unquestioned. Yet we know the mystery exists, and our ignorance of its secret does not make life a simple idea.

So I know certain facts in this matter. Jesus of Nazareth once lived and moved among men; he made the most astounding claims — claims which if untrue, should have brought upon him the swiftest judgments of Heaven; instead of such rebuke from God, he stood upon the earth as its King, and all things were at his command, even the wild tempest, and the troubled sea; in that supreme testing time of human sincerity, the hour of death, he stated nothing from what he had already said—nay, emphasized it by appealing to God himself as his witness; and last, but not least, the one great proof of his honesty and truth, which has always been wanting to impostors and enthusiasts, came with that earthquake shock which roused a sleeping, dying world, and shook the temples of Greece and Rome to their foundation, on that glorious morning when God raised him from the dead.

These I accept as facts; and, standing before them, and listening to the burning words of Paul and his brethren in the early church, I am left no alternative but to accept as true the claim he made, that he "came down from heaven."

And to all doubters as to the how and why, to all questioners in regard to the particular relation he sustains to the Father—how much divine and how much human, I can reply only in his own words—words which if remembered and acted upon, would have made many controversies unnecessary—"No man knoweth who the Son is, but the Father." And there we must all leave it. If his claims were true, they are important, for alongside of them are other claims which are just as startling, and are of the deepest personal interest to us all—especially the claim that he has undertaken the mighty burden of coming again to judge the world in righteousness, rewarding the good, punishing the wicked, and bringing—what men have sighed for so long—"The restitution of all things." The question which concerns us most deeply is, "Are we ready to meet him at his coming?"—Rev. E. P. Woodward, in Bible Banner.

IT MAY BE SOON.

It may be soon, yea, very soon,
It may be 'ere another day,
Jesus, our absent Lord may come,
And we from earth be caught away.

Away to meet him in the air,
Our waiting and our watching o'er,
"Caught up" our blessed Lord to see,
To dwell with him for evermore.

For evermore! new bright the hopes
Fix'd on the precious Word Divine,
Changed in a moment we shall be,
And in his glorious image shine:

Shine as the sun in all his strength,
Bright as the brightest rays at noon,
Radiant with glory and with bliss—
It may be soon, yea, very soon.

Editor Restitution:

I enclose a translation of several psalms which teach truths in regard to Sabbaths, and which seem to me intimately related to the thought of my last article. My object in thus grouping them together is to show their related truths and that thus they may serve to suggest a line of thought to be followed out by others who are able to digest strong food.

Yours in the faith,
CHAS. GARDNER.

PSALM VI.

1. Unto the end (the completed state) among hymns concerning the eighth, a psalm of David's,

2. O Lord, convict me not in thine anger, nor chasten me in thy wrath.

3. Have mercy on me O Lord, because my bones are racked.

4. And my life hath been harrassed exceedingly; and now, O Lord, how long?

5. Return, O Lord, deliver my life; save me for thy mercy's sake.

6. Because there is no one who remembereth thee in death, and in the grave (or sheol) who will confess unto thee?

7. I have labored in my sighing. Every night I wash my couch, with my tears I bedew my bed.

8. Mine eye hath been terrified with anger; I have waxed old among all mine enemies.

9. Stand off from me all ye who work transgression, because the Lord hath heard the voice of my lament.

10. The Lord hath heard my supplication, the Lord hath attended unto my prayer.

11. May all mine enemies have been put to shame and disturbed exceedingly. May they have repented and been put to shame very speedily.

PSALM XI. SEPTUA. (XII. C. V.)

1. Unto the end, concerning the eighth, a psalm of David's.

2. Save me, O Lord, because a holy one hath failed, because the truths have been belittled by reason of the sons of men.

3. Each one hath spoken vanity unto his neighbor; lips deceitful in heart are they, and in heart have they spoken.

4. Utterly destroy, O Lord, all the deceitful lips, and every tongue that magnifieth speech,

5. Those who have said we will magnify our tongue; our lips are ours; who is our Lord?

6. Because of the wretchedness of the suppliant (poor or beggars), and because of the sighing of the needy, now will I arise, saith a lord. I will put myself in a place of salvation; I will speak openly in it.

7. The Oracles of the Lord are pure oracles, silver that hath been tried in the fire, of approved value to the earth, a value that hath been seven times purified.

8. Thou, O Lord, wilt guard us and keep us on through from this generation even unto the age.

9. The irreverent walk about in a circle; according to thy exaltation hast thou provided in thy regard for the sons of men.

PSALM XXIII. SEPTUA. (XXIV. C. V.)

1. David's psalm for the first of a Sabbath (period)

The earth is the Lord's and the fulness of it, the inhabited and all who dwell in it.

2. He hath founded it upon seas and upon rivers hath he prepared it.

3. Who will ascend into the mountain of the Lord, and who will stand in his sacred place?

4. One innocent in hands and pure in heart, he who hath not received his life in vain, and hath not sworn deceitfully unto his neighbor,

5. This one will receive blessing from the Lord and mercy from God his Savior.

6. This is the generation of those who seek him, who seek the face of the God of Jacob. Interlude.

7. Lift up gates O ye your rulers, and may ye have been lifted up ye age-lasting gates, and the King of glory will come in.

8. Who is this King of glory? A Lord strong and able, a Lord able in war.

9. Lift up gates O ye your rulers, and may ye have been lifted up ye age-lasting gates, and the King of glory will come in.

10. Who is this King of glory? The Lord of hosts (or dunameis, the abilities), he is this King of glory.

PSALM XXXVII. SEPTUA. (C. V. XXXVIII.)

1. David's psalm for a reminder concerning a Sabbath.

2. O Lord convict me not in thine anger nor chasten me in thy wrath.

3. Because thine arrows have transfixed me, and thou hast laid thy hand heavily upon me.

4. There is no healing in my flesh before the face of thy wrath; there is no place for my bones before the face of my sins.

5. Because my transgressions are lifted up above my head; as it were a heavy burden have they weighed down upon me.

6. My wounds have become offensive to the smell and corrupt from before the face of my folly.

7. I have become wretched and utterly bowed down; all the day long I go my way with a sad countenance.

8. Because my life is full of mockings, and there is no healing in my flesh.

9. I have become afflicted and humbled exceedingly; I have bewailed (roared like a hungry lion) because of the sighing of my heart.

10. And in thy sight is all my longing desire, and my sighing hath not been hid from thee.

11. My heart hath been distressed, my strength hath utterly forsaken me, and the light of mine eyes is no longer with me.

12. My friends and my neighbors have drawn nigh and stand in my presence, and my nearest stand afar off.

13. And those who seek my life have been repelled with force; and those who seek to wrong me have spoken vanities and practiced deceit all the day long.

14. And I as though deaf did not hearken, and as though dumb I opened not (my) (his in the text) mouth.

15. And I have become like a man who doth not hear, and who hath no words of conviction in his mouth.

16. Because in thee have I hoped, O Lord; mayest thou have hearkened O Lord my God.

17. Because I have said, mine enemies shall never rejoice over me; and in my feet having slipped, they have boasted over me.

18. Because I am ready for scourges and my feeling of sorrow is before me constantly.

19. Because I will declare my transgression, and I am anxious about my sin.

20. But mine enemies live and have become strong over me, and those who hate me unjustly have become multiplied.

21. Those who return evil for good have slandered me when I was pursuing after righteousness.

22. Forsake me not utterly, O Lord my God, stand not away from me.

23. Attend unto my cry for help O Lord of my salvation.

PSALM XLVII. SEPTUA. (XLVIII. C. V.)

1. A psalm for the sons of Kore, for an ode, for a second (day) of a Sabbath (period).

2. Great is the Lord and greatly to be praised in a city of our God in his sacred mountain.

3. He who hath been rooted in the joy of all the earth; O thou anoint Zion with sides toward the north, O thou city of the great King.

4. God is known in her dignities whenever he defendeth her.

5. Because lo the kings have been gathered together; they have come unto the same place,

6. When they saw it was so they wondered, they were terrified, they were shaken.

7. Trembling seized hold upon them. There were there woes as of one who bringeth forth.

8. With a violent wind wilt thou break in pieces ships of Tharsis.

9. Even as we have heard so also have we seen in the city of the Lord of hosts, in a city of our God; God hath founded it for the age. Interlude.

10. We have comprehended thy mercy, O God, in the midst of thy royal people.

11. According to thy name, O God, so also be thy praise unto the ends of the earth, thy right hand full of righteousness.

12. May Mount Sion have rejoiced; may the daughters of Judah have been glad, by reason of thy verdicts, O Lord.

13. Encircle Sion, and encompass her; discourse in her towers;

14. Set your hearts on her ability and thoroughly acquaint yourselves with her dignities, that he may discourse them unto another generation.

15. For this One is our God for the age and for the age of the age; he will shepherd us for the ages.

PSALM XCI. SEPTUA. (XCII. C. V.)

1. A psalm for an ode for the day of the Sabbath.

2. It is good to confess unto the Lord and to exalt the strain unto thy name O thou Most High;

3. To declare thy mercy in the morning and thy truth at night;

4. On a psaltry with ten strings, on a cithara along with an ode.

5. Because thou hast caused me to rejoice in thy creation, O Lord, and in the works of thy hands I shall be glad.

6. How have thy works become magnified, O Lord, thy thoughts how very deep they were.

7. A heedless man will not comprehend them and the one devoid of true understanding will not understand.

8. When sinners have sprung up like grass as it were, and all those who work transgression have peeped forth that they might be utterly destroyed in the age of the age.

9. And that thou, O Lord, art Most High forever.

10. Because lo, thine enemies will perish, and all them who work the transgression will have been scattered.

11. And my horn will have been exalted, as it were the horn of a unicorn, and my old age in plenteous mercy.

12. And mine eye hath lived to see it on mine enemies, and my ear will hear it on the wicked who stand up against me.

13. The just one will flourish as it were a palm, as it were the cedar that hath waxed mighty on the Libanus.

14. Those who have been planted in the house of the Lord in the courts of our God will have bloomed out.

15. Then will they have waxed great in a rich old age, and will enjoy

16. Declaring that my God is an upright Lord and that there is no injustice in him.

PSALM XCII. SEPTUA. (XCIII. C. V.)

1. For the day of the pro-Sabbath when the earth hath become newly inhabited, David's praise for an ode.

The Lord hath become king; he hath put on that which becometh him well; the Lord hath put on ability and girded himself. Yea indeed he hath fixed firm the inhabited, that will not have been shaken.

2. From that time is thy throne made ready; from the age art thou.

3. The rivers lift up, O Lord, the rivers lift up their voices,

4. By reason of the voices of many waters. Wonderful are the billows of the sea; wonderful among high ones is the Lord.

5. Thy testimonies have become very trustworty. Sanctification befitteth thy house, O Lord, unto length of days.

PSALM XCIII. SEPTUA. (XCIV. C. V.)

1. A psalm of David's for a fourth Sabbath.

God, a Lord who requiteth, the God who requiteth hath spoken openly.

2. Mayest thou have been exalted, thou who judgest the earth. Repay the scornful.

3. How long, O Lord, until when will sinners boast?

4. Will they murmur and prate iniquity, will all those who work the transgression prate?

5. Thy royal people, O Lord, have they humiliated, and thine inheritance ill-treated.

6. Widow and orphan have they slain and the proselyte have they murdered.

7. And they have said, the Lord will not see, nor will the God of Jacob understand.

8. Understand ye thoughtless among the royal people, and ye stupid when ye have gotten sense.

9. The One who planted the ear doth he not hear? The One who formed the eye doth he not notice?

10. The one who chastiseth nations will he not convict? The one who teacheth man comprehension?

11. The Lord knoweth the reasonings of men that they are vain.

12. Happy is the man whom thou shalt have chastised, O Lord, and him whom thou shalt have taught from out thy law,

13. That it is for him to be meek in view of wicked days until such time as a pit shall have been dug for the sinner.

14. (Because the Lord will not thrust away his royal people, and his inheritance will he not utterly forsake,)

15. Until such time as righteousness shall have returned unto the way of judgment, and all they who have it be upright in heart.

16. Who will stand up for me against those who do wickedly, or who will stand beside and along with me against those who work the transgression?

17. Had not the Lord come to my cry for help, my life had well nigh sojourned in the grave, (to sheol).

18. If I said, my foot slippeth, thy mercy, O Lord come to my cry for help.

19. O Lord, according to the multitude of the woes in my heart, have thy assisting graces loved my life.

20. A throne of transgression shall not be joined to thine, nor he who deviseth worry toil against commandment.

21. They will hunt for the life of a just one as for a wild beast, and innocent blood will they shed in judicial condemnation.

22. And the Lord hath become a refuge for me, and my God the helper of my hope.

23. And he will repay their transgression unto them, and their wickedness; the Lord our God will cause them to vanish away.

PSALM XCVI. SEPTUA. (XCVII. C. V.)

1. David's, when his earth is being established.

The Lord hath become king. Let the earth be glad. May many islands have rejoiced.

2. A cloud and thick darkness are round about him, righteousness and a restoration of judgment to uprightness round about his throne.

3. Fire will go its way before him and will flame round about his enemies.

4. His lightnings have lightened the inhabited. The earth saw and trembled.

5. The mountains melted like wax before the face of the Lord, before the face of the Lord of all the earth.

6. Heaven hath declared his righteousness and all the royal peoples seen his glory;

7. May all those who worship graven images have been put to shame, those who boast themselves in their idols. Worship him all ye his angels.

8. Zion hath heard and rejoiced and the daughters of Judea were glad, because of thy verdicts, O Lord.

9. Because thou art Lord, the Most High over all the earth; thou hast become exalted high above all the gods.

10. Ye who love the Lord, hate wickedness. The Lord will guard the lives of his holy ones; out of the hand of sinners will he deliver them.

11. Light hath arisen for the just one, and for the upright in heart joy.

12. Rejoice ye just ones in the Lord, and confess in remembrance of his sanctification.

HEAVENLY ARCHITECTURE.

"Ye are God's building." 1 Cor. iii. 9.

From the earliest ages, ever since Jacob erected the pillar at Bethel to commemorate his covenant with God, men have erected buildings and monuments for purposes of worship. The Druid erected his rude circles and piles of stones, and the Egyptian his mighty pyramids. The Buddhist pagoda, the temples of Greek and Hindoo pagans, Moslem mosques, Jewish temples and Christian cathedrals are alike erected for purposes of worship, and in acknowledgment of a Supreme Being.

Israel of old erected a glorious temple under the guidance of the Divine Architect. In its erection the choicest materials that earth could produce were brought together. Flawless marble and precious stones; cedars from the mountains of Lebanon; gold of Ophir; silver and jewels from the Orient; hangings of Tyrian purple, and brazen ornaments, fashioned by Tyre's most skillful workmen, all combined to make this a fit place for the worship and manifestation of the Most High in the Holy of Holies.

"Howbeit, the Most High dwelleth not in temples made with hands." The temple of Solomon, with its architectural beauties; its gold and jewels; its mercy seat and most holy place; its troops of priests and Levites, and the Great High Priest was only a type of that "spiritual temple" built of lively stones"; referred to in the words of our text; and most harmoniously does the antitype correspond with its shadow. To recur to our text, "Ye are God's building." These words are addressed to the Church of Christ, and by reading the immediate context we find that the materials composing this building are the individual members of the church, who are gathered from the quarries, forests, and mines of mankind; hewed, carved and polished, according to the plans and specifications of the Divine Architect, to be "builded together for an habitation of God through the Spirit."

In the erection of a building one of the first prerequisites is to have it located on good ground; and to make firm the foundations, lest the noble superstructure come down a crumbling mass of ruins. The house built upon the sand could not withstand the winds and flood, but that which is founded on the rock will come safely through the trial of tempest and flood.

The great typical temple was built upon Mount Zion, and its massive foundation stones are today a marvel to the traveler.

Upon what is the spiritual temple builded?

Turn with me to Matt. xvi. 13-18, where we read, "And Simon Peter answered and said, thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God. And Jesus answered and said unto him: . . . Upon this rock I will build my church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it." From this we see that the rock upon which the Savior proposed to build his church, or the spiritual temple, was this declaration of Peter, "thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God"; and upon this rock it has been builded. Some builders have elaborated the statement into all the intricacies of the multitude of things concerning the kingdom of God and name of Jesus Christ, and others have kept close to the words of the declaration; but all who have attempted to build elsewhere than on this glorious truth, have simply built upon the sand.

What are the foundations of the spiritual temple?

Turn with me to Isa. xxviii. 16, where we read, "Behold, I lay in Zion for a foundation, a stone, a tried stone, a precious corner stone, a sure foundation." By turning to 1 Peter ii. 6, we find that this chief foundation corner stone is none other than Jesus of Nazareth. He is the stone which the builders set at nought, but which has become the chief stone of the corner; and "other foundation can no man lay than that has been laid, which is Christ Jesus." There are, however, other foundation stones in this spiritual temple as we learn by referring to Eph. ii. 20, where we read that the temple is "built upon the foundation of the prophets and apostles, Jesus Christ himself being the Chief Corner Stone." Having thus determined upon what the foundations are laid, and the character of those foundations, the question arises, who are the builders of this spiritual temple?

For an answer, turn with me to 1 Cor. iii. 9, 10, where we read, "We are laborers together with God, . . . According to the grace of God which is given unto me, as a wise master builder, I have laid the foundation and another buildeth thereon, but let every man take heed how he buildeth thereupon." Paradoxical though it may appear, this would teach that the builders, and the material of the building are the same; but this is easily understood when we remember that the stones are "living stones." The Lord God Almighty is the Architect; Paul was a Master Builder, and we are all "laborers together with God."

What a noble field of labor is this! "Laborers together with God;" building upon the foundation of prophets and apostles. There is no room for sluggards in the camp of spiritual Israel. As the multitudes of Israel swarmed to the quarries, and forests of Lebanon to hew and to carve, to polish and get in readiness the material for the physical temple of God, so it is your duty, and my duty to work for the advancement of God's spiritual temple. Go then to the quarries, mines and forests of humanity, and dig out and prepare material suitable for this "holy temple of the Lord." Don't say that you are not a skillful workman. If you cannot carve and polish, you may hew and lift. If you cannot be a Hiram of Tyre, you may be a hewer of wood or drawer of water.

It is noticed that the materials for the physical temple were prepared away from the place where it was to be erected. Every stone was shaped and polished, and every beam hewed ready for its place before the work of building was commenced. — So with the spiritual temple. God is now gathering together the materials, "a people for his name." Through the ages the work has gone on. The precious Corner Stone has been prepared, and is now preserved in the Architect's dwelling place; the foundation stones massive and flawless have been tried and found true; the marble has been quarried, shaped and polished to the Divine model; cedars have been hewed, smoothed and carved; jewels have been brought to light, cut and trimmed until they sparkle with the divine light, flashing back the rays of the Sun of Righteousness; from the deepest and darkest places in the world of humanity the pure gold has been sought out, purged from dross, and passed through the refiner's fire. All these have been stamped with the Divine mark, and laid away in the storehouse of God,—ready to be placed each in its proper place when the work of construction shall begin.

From this we draw the lesson that when the Architect shall send his messengers (the angels) to gather the materials for his temple (his elect), they will be shaped ready for their places. There will be no question as to their fitness; no trembling before the judgment seat; no trimming and clipping at the site of the temple. "The Lord knoweth them that are his," and will know where to send his messengers to gather them, and when gathered they will fit each in his place without friction or collision.

From the deepest caves of ocean;
From the desert and the glen,
From the valley and the mountain,
Countless hosts shall rise again.

Another lesson that we may draw is that many stones which the would-be master builders of our day reject with scorn because they are not shaped after their own particular model, will be fashioned for a place of honor. So let us not reject and condemn others, but rather make our own calling and election sure; being polished to reflect the divine likeness, and have the new name and the name of the city of our God stamped upon us, by which we may be recognized as materials prepared and fitted for God's purposes. We cannot all expect to be foundation stones, fluted columns, carved capitals or sparkling gems, but the humblest saint who has a place within the wall of that spiritual temple will be essential to the completeness of the glorious whole.

Would you have a place of honor in this spiritual temple? This is reserved for the overcomers, as we read in Rev. iii. 12. "Him that overcometh will I make a pillar in the temple of my God, and he shall go no more out; and I will write upon him the name of my God, and the name of the city of my God, which is new Jerusalem." Would you be a pillar in this temple which shall be a habitation of God through the Spirit? Would you have this name written upon you, and the name of the Bride, the Lamb's wife, as pictured in the architectural splendor of the heavenly Jerusalem?—Strive to be an "overcomer;" for it is to those who in the conflicts of life; in the struggle with the world, the flesh and the devil; in the warfare against principalities and powers, and wicked spirits in the heavenlies, have come off conquerors that this honor shall be given.

The typical temple was erected as a place of worship, in which God manifested himself and dispensed blessings to Israel: and so the antitypical temple will be a "habitation of God through the spirit" and by means of it, and through its agency "all the nations of the earth will be blessed;" for in that day "judgment will he lay to the line, and righteousness to the plummet."

Address all Letters and Communications to THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of Kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Communications.

"TAKE HEED AND BEWARE OF COVETOUSNESS." Luke xii. 15.

These words from the lips of the Master show that warning against covetousness is a necessary part of Christian teaching. To hear about the evils, pains and horrors of such diseases as leprosy, small-pox, etc., goes far towards helping us to avoid them. In order, therefore, that we may continually cherish a wholesome aversion to covetousness, let us consider some of

ITS EVILS.

1. It is disobedience. The words horate and phulassesthe, in the imperative mood, rendered "take heed and beware," signify "to guard against, watch, avoid, shun." Hence, the covetous disobey this command. Nor can they justify that disobedience by donating a portion or even the whole of their covetous gains to religious or benevolent institutions, for it has been long ago proclaimed as a great principle of religion that "to obey is better than sacrifice," and we are warned that "stubbornness is as iniquity and idolatry." 1 Sam. xv. 22, 23.

2. It leads to wrong methods of getting gain. Usury, extortion, forgery, theft, joining the popular though wrong church, or no church, for the sake of popularity; defrauding in trade, oppressing in wages, refusing to pay just debts, and many such sins have their foundation in covetousness.

3. It hardens the heart against the suffering poor, and stops the ears to a thousand calls of distress. Covetous persons avoid the subscription paper, the collection plate, the tale of calamity, the home of want. They are unlike Job who says, "I delivered the poor that cried, and the fatherless, and him that had none to help him. The blessing of him that was ready to perish came upon me: and I caused the widow's heart to sing for joy.....I was eyes to the blind, and feet was I to the lame. I was a father to the poor: and the cause which I knew not I searched out." Job. xxix. 12-16.

4. It fills the mind with worldly cares which, like thorns, "choke the word." While the gospel is being sounded in their ears, the covetous are thinking of money or "business." Like those who listened to Ezekiel with outward attention while, as the Lord revealed to the prophet, "their heart was going after their covetousness;" or like the grovelling and covetous-minded man who interrupted the Savior's discourse about the heroic, sublime and holy work in which the disciples were to engage, by exclaiming, "Master, speak to my brother, that he divide the inheritance with me." Eze. xxxiii. 31; Luke xii. 13. Instead of being onwrapt with what he heard, and crying out "Lord, here am I, send me, send me on that self-sacrificing, homo-leaving, and sacred mission!" he seems rather to have thought it "a time to receive money, and to receive garments, and oliveyards, and vineyards, and sheep, and oxen, and menservants, and maidservants." 2 Kings v. 26.

5. It deludes the heart, even of youth into choosing the pleasures of "uncertain riches" rather than those of life eternal. The rich young man "went away sorrowful: for he had great possessions." Matt. xix. 22. His love of wealth disqualified him from making the wise and noble choice of Moses who "esteemed the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures in Egypt." Heb. xi. 26. This vice is apt to increase with age, until its victim becomes a confirmed "miser," which means wretched.

6. It is expressly called "idolatry." Col. iii. 5. This is because it enshrines in the heart gold instead of God, and trusts in riches instead of his providence. This idolatry excludes the service of God, for "Ye cannot serve God and mammon." Matt. vi. 24. Idolaters "shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone, which is the second death." Rev. xxi. 8.

[illegible] of a kind of use [illegible] in destruction [illegible] from a small source a [illegible] mass on a nearly level surface, and gradually wears the track until it grows to be a river-bed of a large valley, and water-shed for miles of country that pours tributary streamlets into the main channel which becomes a mighty torrent, capable of desolating fields and villages in its raging. "They that will be (desire to be, R. V.) rich fall into temptation and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts which drown men in destruction and perdition. For the love of money is the root of all evil ('a root of all kinds of evil,' R. V.) which while some coveted after, they have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows. But thou, O man of God, flee these things: and follow after righteousness, godliness, faith, love, patience, meekness. Fight the good fight of the faith, lay of hold on the eternal life, whereunto thou art also called." 1 Tim. vi. 6-12.

Many warning examples are recorded as illustrating the evils of covetousness.

Achan was brought to a fearful death by covetousness. Before his execution he said, "I saw among the spoils a goodly Babylonish garment, and two hundred shekels of silver, and a wedge of gold of fifty shekels weight, then I coveted them and took them." Jos. vii. 21. Now, as then, the desire of having silver, gold and fine clothing brings thousands to ruin.

Balaam through covetousness hired himself out to give wicked advice that caused the death of twenty-three thousand people in one day; and afterwards he himself was slain among the enemies of the Lord. This is a notable warning to public teachers against becoming hirelings and "given to filthy lucre," Titus i. 7; 1 Peter v. 2; Jude 11.

Gehazi was made leprous to his death, on account of covetousness. Naaman, after the cure of his leprosy, gratefully offered Elisha a large sum of money, which the prophet refused. His servant Gehazi, however, ran after Naaman, and, by a cunning falsehood, obtained a considerable portion of the amount and hid it away for his own use. And, as a punishment for this the leprosy of Naaman came upon Gehazi; illustrating the proverb that "the getting of treasures by a lying tongue is a vanity tossed to and fro of them that seek death." Prov. xxi. 6.

Ahab, though a wealthy king, coveted a little piece of land near the royal palace, and thereby became implicated in the death of Naboth its owner. 1 Kings xxi.

The Pharisees, "who were covetous," actually "derided" the teachings of the Son of God. Luke xvi. 14. Many are the instances in which the gospel of the kingdom and its conditions and precepts are derided now by Pharisees, for no better reason than that it runs contrary to some of their favorite "covetous practices."

Judas, through covetousness, committed the crime which has brought his name into perpetual abhorence and infamy. His example alone ought to banish covetousness from the earth and make humanity "take heed and beware of" it more than of the most deadly plague.

Ananias and Sapphira, on account of covetousness, were stricken dead at the feet of the apostles. As the salutary effect of this prompt and signal punishment of lying and covetousness combined, "great fear came upon all the church, and upon as many as heard these things."

The rich fool is the special illustration which the Savior has given of covetousness. For it must be observed that on this occasion the great Teacher not only warns against covetousness, but illustrates the warning by an example, and, with various precepts points out the way of avoiding the sin. Luke xii. 13-40.

Why is the rich man called a "fool"? I think it is

(1.) Because he deliberately determined to bestow "all" his goods on selfish eating and drinking. Not a word has he to say about giving any to spread the knowledge of God's word, or to help the Levite, the stranger, the fatherless and the widow: it must all be kept and lavished on his own carnal case. He seemed to delight in calling them his fruits and his goods, whereas we are but stewards of the Lord's goods. It is "my corn" and "my wine," saith the Lord. Hos. ii. 8, 9. A supercargo taking all the precious merchandise entrusted to him and stowing it away in a ship that he knows to be sinking, would not be doing a more foolish thing than the rich and covetous farmer proposed.

(2.) Because he esteemed such selfish and gluttonous living as the best way that he could spend his time. What a swinish world this would be if every man were to make that use of the time and means which the Lord has given him!

(3.) Because he spoke as if certain of living "many years" in that way, whereas the wisest men "know not what shall be on the morrow."

Perhaps the farmer was regarded by some of his neighbors as a thrifty, prudent and driving man, worthy to be imitated; and yet covetousness was his ruin.

A physician may examine his patient's disease, and talk interestingly of its symptoms and history; but if at last he adds, "It is incurable," he brings heavy tidings. But I have something more cheering to say of this malady, for "Is there no balm in Gilead; is there no physician there?" Covetousness is not necessarily fatal. For its prevention and cure

1. Remember that it is forbidden, and that Adam and Eve by doing what was forbidden "brought death into the world, and all our woe."

2. Remember the many evils connected with it, and read the sad history of individuals in time of peace and nations in time of war who have fallen victims to it.

3. Consider the shortness and uncertainty of life, and how unreasonable it is to devote the little time that you have to acquiring property which you shall so soon relinquish. "This night" thy life may be "required of thee."

4. Remember that as a steward you are not to "waste your Master's goods" on your own appetite or avarice, but lay them out, use them, and invest them in every way you can to his glory and praise.

5. Envy not the prosperity of the wicked, for "a little that a righteous man hath is better than the riches of many wicked." Psa. xxxvii. 16; lxxiii. 3.

6. Have faith in God's promises to provide for you; "trusting not in uncertain riches but in the living God who giveth us richly all things to enjoy." 1 Tim. vi. 17. "He that trusteth in his riches shall fall." Prov. xi. 28. Riches certainly make unto themselves wings; they fly away as an eagle toward heaven." Prov. xxiii. 5.

7. On the Lord's promise build contentment, for the Scripture gives his promise as the just and sufficient ground of contentment, saying, "Be content with such things as ye have: for he hath said, I will never leave thee nor forsake thee." Heb. xiii. 5.

8. Ennoble your aims, and let the faculty of acquisitiveness be consecrated to "seeking the kingdom of God and his righteousness": and rejoice in prospect of the true riches awaiting you in the life to come. Luke xii. 31, 33.

9. Strive to "be rich in good works," and lay up "a treasure in the heavens that faileth not, where no thief approacheth, neither moth corrupteth."

10. Along with all the other means of prevention and cure, "take it to the Lord in prayer." Through Christ our great High Priest, let your petition before "the throne of grace" be, "Incline my heart to thy testimonies and not to covetousness." Psa. cxix. 36. The Psalmist himself had use for this prayer: it must, therefore, be far more needful to us, who live in the "perilous times" of "the last days" of which times covetousness is one of the leading characteristics, 2 Tim. iii. 1, 2.

GLORY NOT IN MAN.

Under the above caption an article appears in THE RESTITUTION of March 21st in which the writer after passing judgment on the grade of reward to which Dr. Thomas will be entitled hereafter, thus refers to him in his last paragraph. "Among his errors what he wrote about the resurrection that any other dust would do as well as the dust of the departed saint with which to make a new body and then God stamp the character of the dead saint thereon, was the greatest error of all, because herein is no resurrection." Some persons might say that Dr. Thomas had no express Bible testimony for such a conclusion; yet he very probably had as much as any one who might express the opposite view; either may be supposed by some to be conjecture, and conjecture should not be used to estrange believers; or to one's own advantage and the disadvantage of another.

But what is the radical meaning of the word "resurrection?" It is derived from the Latin surgo, to rise up, with the prefix "re" to rise up again; but the New Testament was not written in the Latin but in the Greek language; here we are met with another word; anastasis from anistemi to stand up again; and by implication, to rise up again, because rising is generally the effort which is completed by standing; rising up again is very expressive of all who are laid beneath; but standing up again, will include not only those but all whose natural forces have been dissipated to the winds as in the case of the martyrs who have suffered the fires of inquisition and other like agencies of destruction. We get our word stem, the erect or standing up part of a plant, from this word anistemi, omitting the prefix ana. So it would seem that standing up again is the more expressive term. And if all who are brought to life again have to be made the second time out of earth's dust, then some portion of mother earth will have to be used in the case of all those who so far as we can see, have not been resolved into mother earth at all.

The earth is our common mother in the present state, and if the decree is that it shall also be in the future state, where life in an incorruptible body is the great desideratum, and if it should be in the purpose of the Divine mind to give the saints life again whether of the same or any other portion of our common mother, or even otherwise, his promise of standing up again will be complied with. I cannot see from what Paul says in 15th chap., of Corinthians about "seed and the sowing" that he is alluding to the burial of the dead at all; for we do not put seeds in the earth that are divested of vitality; such a view does not fit the figure; he seems not to be arguing that point; but the dying and living question; as we plant seeds in the earth, so God planted man here in Adam "a living soul," and through him the human race has been sown on the earth, and like seeds sown which have to die, humanity also after this sowing has to die before the standing up again state can take place; thus arguing for the necessity of the mortal state to human nature before the immortal can occur.

He does not say, "it is sown a dead body;" but the reverse; "it is sown psuchikon soma, a natural, soulical, or living body;" to sow a dead body would be to sow that which has passed its soulical state; to conform to the figure then we see that it is the "natural body" stage and the necessity of death to it before resurrection is the point he is arguing; "for" speaking of seeds, "that which thou sowest is not quickened except it die," so then that which God sows must also die before quickening; therefore according to both the argument and the figure used it is not dying and then sowing; but the sowing is first; then dying, and then the quickening; and then "with what sort of body do they come? God giveth such a body as pleases him." If Paul, in what he says about sowing had alluded to the burial of the dead, and the practice of cremation were universal, we could readily see that there was no force in such a view; but the view of sowing a natural or living body harmonizes with the figure used and covers every contingency. Etymology will justify the term "standing up again" as the most proper expression for anastasis, that then is the proper promised adjunct to eternal life. Some may be raised again who may not be able to stand.

Are not the sower and the reaper the same? God and his angels are the reapers; to whom else can he allude as the sower of humanity? I cannot therefore see any force in the argument or apt illustration in the figure to assume that Paul was referring to the burial of the dead.

Permit me here to refer to another subject. I notice in the Christadelphian for January an article from Bro. Gunn giving a word of caution against Dr. J. H. Thomas, and referring to THE RESTITUTION as "vile," and the investigator as "vilor;" I think his remarks are uncharitable and I read them with regret. I do not know that I have seen all that Dr. T. has written, but what I have seen I highly commend, and hope he may prove himself worthy as a good soldier ever to the end.

Editor Restitution:

As I have not written anything for the paper for a long time I will make an attempt; and the first idea that I am going to introduce in this article is this. Manufacture, if you have not got one handy, a small box and make it tight with the exception of a little hole right in the top of it large enough to let in a piece of money as large as a twenty-five cent piece. Now I just want to say a few words to those of the like precious faith that chew and smoke tobacco. If you really and sincerely love the truth as it is in Christ Jesus better than you love tobacco, just put a stop to it at once, and the money that you have been paying out for the weed year after year, just put the same amount in the little box and you will be surprised at what it will amount to in the course of a year; and just put the amount in the little box and let it go towards the cause of the Truth instead of using tobacco.

I, for one, believe that such acts performed by believers of the truth that use the weed will go further towards the advancement of the cause of Christ, than it would for us to use it and encourage others to use it which we surely do if we use it; others see us smoking and chewing and spitting, and they think, well, it cannot be anything wrong to chew and smoke, such a one, he belongs to the Church of God, and he uses tobacco, and they are commended to set a good example before the world, therefore it must be right. How can you blame your children for using the weed when the head of the family sets the example. These are thoughts worth thinking about. Now Christ is the head of the church, and he sets no such example for his followers. I think if it is right to do such things and is necessary that Christ would have said so to his followers; but no: Paul declares to his son Timothy 3 chap. of 2 Tim. 16, 17 verses, he says, "All Scripture given by inspiration of God, is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness. That the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works." Let us remember that the trial of our faith is much more precious than gold that perishes. 1 Pet. i. 7. James says 1st chap. 12, blessed is the man that endureth temptation; for, when he is tried, he shall receive the crown of life. Let no man say, when he is tempted, I am tempted of God; for God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth he any man. But every man is tempted when he is drawn away of his own lust, and enticed, then when lust hath conceived it bringeth forth sin, when it is finished it bringeth forth death. Do not err my beloved brethren; wherefore lay apart all filthiness and superfluity of naughtiness, and receive with meekness the engrafted Word which is able to save us.

Thoughts of this kind occur in my mind. How would it look in the case of Christ Jesus our Lord, as an example, when he was urging men to come to him and believe the Gospel of the kingdom! Brethren just look at it in this light, and you can see at once it is a wrong and not a right.

I would say in regard to the box plan that my wife and self have fixed up one and commenced to put in our mite and as fast as we can get a few dollars together in that way it is going towards the support of the RESTITUTION, and the advancement of the truth. In regard to tobacco I have used it for a good many years, but by the assisting grace of God I will try and forever abstain from its use.

Pray for me, brethren, that I may overcome the world and the lusts thereof through grace, amen.

ORIENTAL SKETCHES.--Second Series. Number 13.

BETHANY.

What particularity struck me in all my visits to Bethany was its solitude. It looks as if it were shut out from the whole world. No town, village, or human habitation is visible from it. The wilderness appears in front through an opening in the rocky glen; and the steep side of Olivet rises close behind. When Jesus retired from Jerusalem to Bethany, no sound of the busy world followed him—no noisy crowd broke in upon his meditation. In the quiet home of Martha, or in some lonely recess of Bethany's secluded dell, he rested, and taught and prayed. How delighted I was one evening, when seated on a rocky bank beside the village, reading the story of Lazarus, to hear a passing villager say, "There is the tomb of Lazarus, and yondor is the house of Martha!" They may not be, most probably they are not, the real places; but this is Bethany, and the miracle wrought there still dwells in the memory of its inhabitants. And when the unvarying features of nature are there too—the cliffs, the secluded glen, the Mount of Olives—few will think of traditional "holy places." From the place where I sat I saw—as Martha and Mary had seen from their house-top—those blue mountains beyond Jordan, where Jesus was abiding when they sent unto him, saying, "Lord, behold, he whom thou lovest is sick." John x. 40; xi. 3. I saw the road "from Jerusalem to Jericho" winding past the village, and away down the rocky declivities into the wilderness. By that road Jesus was expected; and one can fancy with what earnest, longing eyes the sisters looked along it—ever and anon returning and looking, from the first dawn till waning twilight. And when at last he did come, and Martha heard the news, one can picture the touching scene, how she ran along that road, and with streaming eyes and quivering lips uttered the half-reproachful and still half-hopeful cry, if thou hadst been here my brother had not died."

Bethany is now, and apparently always was, a small, poor, mountain hamlet; with nothing to charm except its seclusion, and nothing to interest save its associations. It is a remarkable fact that Christ's great miracle has been to it as a new baptism, conferring a new name. It is now called El-Azariyeh, which may be interpreted, "The Place of Lazarus." The "palms" are all gone which gave it its old name Beth-any, "House of Dates;" but the orage around, and the terraced slopes above it are dotted yet with venerable figtrees, as if to show that its sister village, Beth-phage, "House of Figs," is not forgotten, though its site is lost. The houses of Bethany are of stone, massive and rude in style. Over them, on the top of a scarped rock, rises a fragment of heavy ancient masonry—perhaps a portion of an old watch-tower. The reputed tomb of Lazarus is a deep, narrow vault, apparently of no great antiquity.

CHRIST'S TRIUMPHAL ENTRY INTO JERUSALEM.

Our Lord reached Bethany from Jericho on the evening of Friday after sunset, or the morning of Saturday, the Jewish Sabbath, John xii. 1; and on the next day (verse 12), he made his triumphal entry into Jerusalem. It was the Passover week. The holy city was crowded, and the fame of Jesus, and of the miracle he had performed on Lazarus, brought multitudes to Bethany. He knew that the time was now come for the complete fulfilment of prophecy, and that Zion's King should that day in triumph enter Zion's gates (Zech. ix. 9). Knowing what was before him, it was natural he should take the easy caravan road round the southern shoulder of Olivet, and not the steep and difficult one over its summit. When setting forth there was nothing either in dress or mien to distinguish Jesus from others. Prophecy declared that he should be meek and lowly," and he was "meek and lowly." The little band of humble disciples gathered closely round his person, while the multitude thronged the path, and lined the rocky banks above it. Soon after leaving Bethany the road meets a ravine which furrows deeply the side of Olivet. From this point the top of Zion is seen; but the rest of the city is hid by an intervening ridge; and just opposite this point, on the other side of the ravine, I saw the site and remains of an ancient village. The road turns sharply to the right, descends obliquely to the bottom of the ravine, and then turning to the left, ascends and reaches the top of the opposite ridge a short distance above the site of the village. Is not this the place where Jesus said to the disciples, "Go into the village over against you?" These active footmen could cross the ravine direct in a minute or two, while the great procession would take some time in slowly winding round and round the road. The people of the village saw the procession; they knew its cause, for the fame of Jesus' miracles had reached them; they were thus prepared to give the ass to the disciples the moment they heard, "The Lord had need of him." And the disciples taking the ass, led it up to the road, and met Jesus. A temporary saddle was soon made of the loose outer robes of the people, as I have myself seen done a hundred times in Palestine. Some of the people now broke down branches from the palm trees, and waving them in triumph, threw them in the path. Others, still more enthusiastic, spread their garments in the way, as I have seen Mohammedan devotees do before a distinguished saint. Zechariah's prophecy was now fulfilled to the letter: "Rejoice greatly, O daughter of Zion; shout, O daughter of Jerusalem; behold, thy king cometh unto thee; he is just, and having salvation; lowly, and riding upon an ass." Ix. 9.

The procession advances. The crown of the ridge is gained, and Jerusalem in its full extent and beauty bursts upon the view. Moriah, crowned by the temple, rises proudly from the deep, dark Kidron; Zion rises higher yet away beyond it, showing to advantage the palace of Herod, and the lofty battlements of Hippicus and its sister towers; then the great city, and its gardens stretching far beyond. One look on their beloved and beauteous city, and one on their wonder-working king, Luke xix. 37, the multitudes raised their voices in a long shout of triumph, "Hosanna to the Son of David; blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord; hosanna in the highest." Matt. xxi. 9.

But how was Jesus affected by these joyous acclamations, and by that noble view? His omniscient eye looked beneath the exuberance of enthusiasm—in upon the evil heart of unbelief. It looked, too, from the gorgeous buildings of the city, away down the dark vista of time, and saw looming in the future, ruin, desolation, and woe. Therefore when he came near—when he came down, probably, to that point where the temple was directly facing him, and all the richness of its architecture could be seen,—"He wept over it:"—

"Why doth my Savior weep
At sight of Sion's towers?
Shows it not fair from yonder steep,
Her gorgeous crown of towers?
Mark well his holy pains,
'Tis not in pride or scorn,
That Israel's King with sorrow stains
His own triumphal morn.

'If thou hadst known, e'en thou,
At least in this thy day,
The message of thy peace! but now
'Tis passed for ave away!
Now foes shall trench the round,
And lay thee even with earth,
And dash thy children to the ground,
Thy glory and thy mirth.'

And doth the Savior weep
Over his people's sin?
Despair we will not let him keep
The souls he died to win!
Ye hearts that love the Lord,
To at this sight ye burn,
See that in thought, in deed, in word,
Ye hate what made him mourn."

The scene here closes, so far as Olivet is concerned. The mount is studded all over with traditional "holy places," but the only ones which tend to illustrate the sacred narrative, or throw light on the journeys, parables, prophecies, miracles of our Lord, are those to which I have conducted my reader.—J. L. Porter, A. M.

A severe earthquake in Persia partially destroyed the city of Tabreez on May 5th. The despatch states that the earthquake destroyed a great many houses, and caused the death of a large number of persons. Tabreez is the capital of the province of Azerbaijan, and is a tolerably built city inclosed by a brick wall about three and a half miles in circumference. The population numbers about 100,000, and a large trade is carried on between India, Russia, Constantinople and the Black Sea.

THE RESTITUTION.

E. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, May 28, 1883.

Some articles and contemplated selections must await future numbers.

Our next paper will bear date of June 6, as there are five Wednesdays in May.

We expect to attend the conference at Mendon, Mich., should nothing intervene to prevent. Shall probably arrange to take the train north from Fort Wayne on Friday at 3:15 p. m., arriving at Mendon at 8:20.

TYPOGRAPHICAL ERRORS.—In Prof. Gardner's translation in last number read in 4th v. 37th Psa., peace for "place;" in 3d v. 47th Psa., Mount for "anoint;" and in 14th v. of same, ye for "he;" and in 1st v. of 93d Psa., requiteth for "requireth."

THE RESURRECTION.

For ourself on the resurrection, we remark that we anticipate a resurrection of the dead, and by the dead we mean something that was once organized and had life. We also think it plainly enough taught that Christ, as one raised from the dead, is the sample first-fruits. In his case, most certainly, some other dust did not do as well. David anticipated complete satisfaction when he should be raised in the likeness of the divine Redeemer. On the passage, Isa. xxvi. 19, which reads, "Thy dead men shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise. Awake and sing, ye that dwell in dust: for thy dew is as the dew of herbs, and the earth shall cast out the dead," Lowth remarks, "The Hebrew runs thus, My dead body (or bodies shall arise; the noun is in the singular number, and the verb in the plural. So the singular is taken distributively for every dead body; just as it is, Psa. xii. 7. Thou shalt keep them, O Lord, thou shalt preserve him from this generation forever. Where the word him is taken for every one of them, as the sense is explained in the margin. These two sentences, thy dead men shall live, and my dead bodies shall arise, are equivalent; they are called the churches' dead (rather Israel's) in the former sentence as being members of that mystical body (the nation, v. 16) and God's or Christ's dead in the latter sentence, from the interest he hath in them, 'and because he hath promised to raise them up at the last day.'" John vi. 39. The real Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, in their resurrection life, will yet be seen in the kingdom of God. Lifeless matter that was never organized, and that, consequently, never died, has no promise of a resurrection. Indeed, the word resurrection is a term wholly inapplicable to any such process. The great resurrection change will make our vile body in fashion like unto Christ's glorious body. With us it is no incredible thing that God shall raise the dead.

We have no hard names for those who see cause to differ from us in our faith and hope.

ANTICIPATED EVENTS.

There are some entertaining millennarian views, who while they concede that prophecy has a fulfilment in the history of long-existing dynasties, and on a protracted scale of time where a day becomes the symbol of a year, still claim that these powers and times will also have a consummating fulfilment on the shorter and more literal interpretation of the times and seasons. Accordingly these interpreters anticipate that the Great Image will be completed with ten toes, of which five will belong to the Eastern foot, and five to the Western. And, when explaining the beast and its ten horns as symbols on this reduced scale of time, the conclusion of these expositors is, that there will be a close confederacy of these ten powers in the last form of their supremacy, and that in this unified alliance they will, in the last stage of their existence, antagonize the Lamb—the Lord of lords and King of kings. Now, as it is one leading object with us to keep our readers as fully posted as we can on the different views current in the world, we give the following from the last number of the London Christian Herald of date May 9, 1883. In Revelations xvii. 12-14, there seems to be a confederation of the ten kingdoms for a very short period after they have desolated the Roman harlot. We are in a transition period. Let us watch, pray, and be sober.

THE COMING TEN-KINGDOMED ALLIANCE.

The triple alliance of Germany, Austria and Italy is a straw showing the direction of the wind. The object is avowedly to promote the peace of Europe by a strong offensive and defensive alliance against the aggressiveness of France. The latter Power seems at present to be almost isolated, and therefore unlikely ever to venture on a war against Germany, as the latter would be assisted by Austria and Italy.

Nevertheless we know from Daniel and Revelation that a Ten-Kingdomed (not merely a triple) Alliance will soon be organised in Europe, to "prefigured by the ten-toed image and the ten-horned wild beast in Daniel ii. 35; vii. 24.

There must soon be a war between France on the one hand, and Germany on the other—resulting in the defeat of Germany and enlargement of France to the Rhine, and formation of Britain, France, Spain, Italy, Austria, Greece, Egypt, Syria, Turkey and Hungary into a Ten-kingdomed Alliance.

The emblematic representation of Cæsar's Roman Empire in the last days as a wild beast—one corporate body—with ten horns, which are stated to signify ten kings, plainly implies that these future ten rulers of its entire territorial area will be allied together in one confederacy, forming a diversity in unity. Ten horns on one body cannot be otherwise than organically and federally united, and must move concurrently in the same direction. Where one horn goes, the others must go. One will not be able to act independently of another, as is the case at the present time, when almost all those kingdoms are standing apart from each other; and as regards Britain, France, Spain, Italy, Austria, Turkey, etc., there is actually no formal alliance between any two of them.

The same federal union of the ten kings as component parts of one political corporation is symbolized by their being represented as the ten toes of a human image in Nebuchadnezzar's prophetic dream. They are all like branches on one trunk—limbs of one body, federated and integral.

Some extraordinary events must ere long come to pass in order to produce such an astounding result as an offensive and defensive alliance and confederacy of the ten nations of the Roman Empire. It is puzzling to conceive why they should ever resort to such a step, unless it be for mutual defense against some common foe, and where can there be found an antagonist sufficiently formidable to provoke the uprising against itself of such a ten-kingdomed confederacy, unless it be either North Germany or Russia, or both Powers combined, as they are the only Great Powers in Europe that are outside the Roman Empire, and which, therefore, will not form part of the confederacy.

The transformation of all the existing twenty-three countries of Cæsar's Roman Empire into exactly ten kingdoms does not necessarily invoke an alliance or confederacy being made between even any two of them. This transformation might be effected, and yet each of the ten might stand aloof from the others in isolated independence, just as at present Britain, France, Spain, Italy, Austria, etc., are independent of each other.

Hence the prediction that the latter-day ten kingdoms are to be compactly allied together so as to form a ten-kingdomed confederacy, is a further and distinct fact in addition to the prediction that their number is to be exactly ten. As the forty States of the American Union under their forty separate Governors form one United States, so in much the same manner the future Ten Kingdoms under their separate Ten Kings will form one united confederacy."

THE TIMES AND THE SEASONS.

There has been no work that we have read on the fulfilment of prophecy with which we have been more highly pleased than with—The Approaching End of the Age—by H. Grattan Guinness. On the times of the Gentiles he says in one place:—"Historically, the times of the Gentiles is a great dispensational week, of 2520 years, extending from the captivity ere, B. C. 770-698, to the era of closing judgments on the kingdom of the beast, the vial era of the Apocalypse, A. D. 1760-1923. It is the 'seven times' of Gentile dominion over Israel, included in the synd. of Nebuchadnezzar's image." On an other page he makes his final figures vary a little when he says: —"A very simple arithmetical calculation shows that 2520 years from this captivity ere brings us to the epoch A. D. 1751-5 till A. D. 1919-23." At the conclusion of his volume he says:—"The Feb., 1878-9 was the 2625th from the era of Nabonassar. It witnessed the death of the last Pope wielding temporal sovereignty, Pius IX.; the overthrow of Turkish power by Russia, and the establishment of a British protectorate over Turkey in Asia. We have long passed the termination of the 2520 years as reckoned from Nabonassar, and are within (in 1879) 45 years of their termination from Nebuchadnezzar, their latest commencing point." On this last view he says elsewhere:—"From the full captivity of Judah, and final overthrow of the throne of David, accomplished by Nebuchadnezzar, to the still future terminus ad quem of the prophetic period of 2520 years. B. C. 588 2520 A. D. 1923." John Cu[illegible], in his Chart of History, enumerates 24 measuring lines as terminating in 1888, and 45 lines as terminating in 1923. The past 40 years from 1843 have been years of warning. The message has been a theme of scorn and scoffing. We are now entering the 40 years of trouble, and the dreadful agencies are rapidly manifesting themselves. The present year so far has been wonderfully phenomical. Thus far we write to preface a piece that we clip from the World's Hope. We merely add that Clinton made the date of the nativity A. M. 4138 which would with 1862 equal 6000.

PALMYRA, Ont.

Bro. Paton:—

I had thought, but for want of time, to prepare an article on some co-incidences of harmony, (of all which you may be fully aware) between the chronologic soli-lunar cycles by Grattan Guinness, ("Approaching End of the Age,") the Great Pyramid cycle, and that of your own as contained in "Day Dawn." Instead, however, I will only notice a few points of interest.

Mr. Guinness, dating the 2,300 years—which is a perfect soli-lunar cycle—from the commission by Artaxerxes to Ezra, B. C. 457, shows it to terminate in 1844 A. D., which, in the law of correspondences between the ending of the Jewish and Christian dispensations, is the year you fix upon as corresponding with the birth of Christ. Mr. Guinness makes Christ's earthly life, including the 40 days after his resurrection, the unit of all his time measures. This he calls "A Messianic Cycle," being 33 solar years, 7 lunar months and 7 days, which is a soli-lunar cycle of a certain order.

Now 1844 A. D. is the 1,260th lunar year from the Hegira, July 16th, 622 A. D., ending March 20th, 1884, and exactly 2,300 solar years from the new moon of March 20th, B. C. 457, the commencement of the 70 weeks. The 1,260th solar year from the Hegira ended July 16th, 1882, the Great Pyramid year, in which, according to the Jewish World, the first Jewish colony, since the dispersion of that race, has been established in Palestine. (The length of the Great Pyramid's Grand Gallery is 1881.5).

Taking the "Messianic Cycle" and adding to 1844 we arrive at 1878, the year of the Berlin Treaty, placing Asia Minor, including Palestine, under British protection, and giving the Jew a legal right to return to his own land. 1878, be it observed, is also a marked year in the Great Pyramid. The grooves in the side-walls of the Grand Gallery, running its entire length, which are located half way between the floor and ceiling terminate at the "impending" of the south wall in 1878.

Again, the Grand Gallery's south wall impends or overhangs one degree or six Pyramid inches (six years). Six deducted from 1881 brings us to 1875, the end of the 6,000 years of human history, and the beginning of harvest. Then, again, from the north beginning of the Grand Gallery to the great step, which intercepts the floor line at the upper end, is 1813-14. Taking the same measure and starting from A. D. 70—destruction of Jerusalem—we arrive at 1883-4, which is 40 years from 1843-4, corresponding with the period that elapsed between the time that Moses visited his brethren and his return from the wilderness to deliver them.

Then, again, in the autumn of 1881 Pole Star, Alpha Draconis, (the Dragon) was on the meridian below the pole, just seven times lower than at the date of the Pyramid's building. "This final downwardness," says Dr. Seiss, "is strikingly suggestive of the Dragon's complete dethronement." And what is still more remarkable, whilst Draconis was on the meridian at this low point, Aries, the Ram, (symbolising the Lamb of God) appeared on the meridian above with the line passing directly through his horns. Did the "war in heaven" begin in the autumn of 1881? Rev. xii.

Further, from 1881-2, the ending of the Grand Gallery, to where the floor line of the Grand Gallery intersects the floor of the passage leading to the Ante-Chamber, is 14 years, showing a sort of overlapping or continuation of the Christian dispensation into the time of trouble, which the low, narrow passage leading from the Grand Gallery to the Ante-Chamber is supposed to symbolise.

I will only add that, according to Mr. Guinness, the "Times of the Gentiles" will end in 1910, or five years later than the date assigned by yourself.—S. Burtell.

PERILOUS TIMES ALREADY COME.

One of the characteristic and suggestive features of the times, and one which contains couched within itself the elements of future trouble on a gigantic scale, if not of international antagonism and partial disintegration of the British Empire, is the Irish Convention, which met at Philadelphia, U. S., on Wednesday last. No fewer than five hundred delegates were present, including many Roman Catholic priests. The President, a firebrand named Mooney, delivered an extravagant address full of malignity and bitterness towards England, and devotion to Mr. Parnell. The meeting was enthusiastic, and the fiercer the philippic against England the more tumultuous was the cheering.

It is rapidly becoming a question of prime magnitude, whether the United States Government should throw the ægis of its protection over conspirators against British Rule, and it may in the course of its development occasion some sharp recriminations between the two Governments. However, it is difficult to perceive the possibility of Home Rulers, Land League Sedit[illegible]ist, and cold-blooded Dynamitards, being allowed to continue their foul conspiracies on American soil without a word of admonition, perhaps of reproof, from England.—The Triple Alliance between Italy, Austria, and Germany is also another sign of the volcanic condition of the present days, and which may at almost a week's notice at any time fling rival armies upon each other with death-dealing purpose, and tend to the material modification and reconstruction of the Map of Europe. The peace of Europe depends very largely just now upon the prolongation of the lives of men already old, Von Moltke, Bismarck, the Emperor William, and others, the removal of whom by death, and the subsequent readjustments of monarchies and ministries, would in all probability furnish both an occasion and a pretext for a trial of strength between the chief military and commercial nations of the entire Eastern hemisphere. Everything, indeed, seems to be preparing for the predicted wars and revolutions which will eventuate in the Ten-kingdomed Confederacy, and which are considered likely to occur either this year or in 1884.

The Rev. Dr. Seiss truly says: "If ever there was a time when the devil was loose, active and potent in human affairs, that time is now, in the days in which we live. The devil's dominion is the enthronement of error, falsehood, deception, lies, and moral rottenness; and when was this dominion ever more patent than in these years of the existing generation? The devil is not yet bound! The people who claim to be the most enlightened, and occupy the very top waves of modern progress, do not hesitate to give out that it is with them a matter of serious doubt whether there is a God, a Providence, a soul to live after this life, anything eternal but matter, any Lord but Nature, any retribution but what natural laws administer in this world, any principles of morality but expediency, and scout all idea of a personal incarnation of Deity, of atonement by Divine sacrifice, of justification by faith in the merits of a substitute, of any coming again of Christ as King to judge the world and reign in righteousness.

THE APPEARANCE OF SOCIETY.

"We look abroad upon society in general, and what do we see? We see that reverence, that great balance-wheel in the economies of life, scarcely exists any more; oaths are nothing; good faith is scarce as grapes after the vintage; and all moral bonds are trampled down without compunction under the heels of greed, and lust, and defied selfishness. Falsities and treacheries confront us unblushingly at every point. People not only make falsehoods, speak falsehoods, print falsehoods, and believe falsehoods, but they eat them, and drink them, and wear them, and act them, and live them, and make them one of the great elements of their being. One-half, at least, of all that the eye can see, or the ear hear, or the hands touch, or the tongue taste, is bogus, counterfeit, pinchbeck, shoddy, or some trash or other of untruth. A man cannot move, or open his eyes without encountering falsehood and lies. In business, in politics, in social life, in professions, and even in what passes for religion, such untruthfulness reigns that he who would be true scarcely knows any more whom to trust, what to believe, how to move, or by what means to keep his footing, amid the ever-increasing flood of unreality and deception.

SATAN'S MACHINERY.

"The Devil, that old serpent, is not yet bound. He is loose. He ranges at large, with his ten thousand emissaries, all the more active and earnest in his Satanic schemes as he knows that his time is short. He has his news and conventicles in every city, town, and hamlet all over the world, labelled with all sorts of attractive and misleading names. Clubs, institutes, circles, societies, conventions, lyceums, and a thousand private coteries, under show of investigating science, improving knowledge, inquiring into truth, and cultivating the mind, free from the disturbing influences of sect, religion, tradition, and old-fogey notions,—these are among the common machinery through which he instils his deceits and subtle poisons. A broader philosophy, a more compliant Church, a more active humanity disdaining theological dogmas and positive creeds, a larger liberality to take every one for a child of God who refrains from denouncing the devilish atheisms and heresies of the times,—these are the flags he hangs out for the rallying of his unsuspecting dupes."—Dr. Seiss, in London Christian Herald.

"GONE TO THE FRONT."

In the city where these paragraphs are composed, an individual prominent in the community and an energetic member of the Canada Methodist body, was lately removed by death, and a sermon appropriate to the event was delivered in the church he used to attend, on the Sabbath following the interment. During its progress, as partially reported in the local journals, the wonted style of thought on such occasions issued from the pulpit, with the customary misrepresentations and contradictions about death and immortality also, that pain one familiar with the plain teaching of the sacred Word. The text was, "If a man die shall he live again?" (Job. xiv. 14.), a question never answered by the preacher, and which must have appeared to him a meaningless one, if, as the discourse boldly asserted, man, for certainty, never dies at all. Job understood what it was to die; it was to lose life — to cease to live— to go where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest. The Patriarch does not inquire,—Does a man survive the awful change called death? Verily he had more sense than to propound such a question, for when death comes, life, he well understood, necessarily goes. Hence he puts his interrogation like one unsophisticated and well informed,—when a man dies—parts with life—shall it ever be recovered by him? Is the extinguished lamp ever to be kindled again? The preacher insisted that the lamp is never blown out — that life never expires; and as a result Job's demand for information was neither appreciated nor answered, as Paul would have answered it, as Paul, in fact, has answered it in his epistles:—"If there be no resurrection of the dead, then is Christ not risen; and if Christ be not risen; then is our preaching vain, and your faith (that the dead shall be restored to life) is also vain." 1 Cor. xv. But that order of teaching and argumentation has long since become antiquated and effete. And no wonder, for if in reality man never dies, why magnify a resurrection,— an insignificant affair at best, according to the reigning theology,—when the being needed no essential restoration to conscious existence? The word is a sound without import; a promise without value; a myth that may be forgotten, like thousands of other fancies that have been consigned to the chasm of forgetfulness. Aloft in their times forgotten it has been so perfectly that in the majority of funeral orations, as in this one, judging by the report, even the word that brought joy to Apostles and their converts finds no room for its admission.

According to the synopsis, the speaker said, referring to the deceased, that "he had gone to the front'—gone from an active and energetic life." The phrase was unfortunate, for it is a military expression, meaning to go close to the enemy where fighting and its risks must be encountered. But the pastor had a meaning of his own, and we must indulge him in his style, however inappropriate the figure. Had he lived in an earlier period, when the thoughts of the Bible were held in loving esteem, he would have spoken of the deceased as "gathered to his fathers;" he would have said "our friend sleepeth;" but these are the ages of enlightenment, and the precious old Volume is on such matters utterly and shamefully ignored. Heathenism has taken its place, heathenism with its soul-immortality and passage through death to mansions in the skies, or a quarter infinitely less attractive. What a spectacle! That which was intended to antagonize and displace Pantheism, in its diverse phases, has succumbed to paganism and imbibed its pernicious dreams and dogmas!

Unquestionably he who dies departs from "an active and energetic life." The faithful in that moment "rest from their labors;" but this was not what the preacher meant to convey by the [illegible] we have quoted. For [illegible] assuming him to be a [illegible] child of God, was as high, as the dust of the earth is low. (Dan. xii. 2.); with Christ, not where bodiless vision is denied; vastly illumined, far from those who "know not anything"; awake, not in deep unconscious repose; possessing the heavenly heritage, not reclining in hope; already a victor over the last enemy, not awaiting the fulfilment of the promise, which will enable him as a revived being, — one snatched from the rayless chamber of the tomb by a mighty resurrecting fiat—to join in the ecstatic anthem, "O death, where is thy sting? O grave"—Hades—"where is thy victory?"

After the address, which was wide apart from Scripture, the "Dead March in Saul" was played on the organ, as if, one may view it so, in unintentional irony after a demonstration that the dead are not dead, though observation and Holy Writ affirm again and again that they are dead—imprisoned in the land of forgetfulness, for the time being.—W. G. Moscrieff.

Another Great Sun Spot.

As the age rapidly approaches its consummation, signs, and portents, terrestrial and celestial, will claim and receive increasing attention. But, apart altogether from the interest which devout students of prophecy take in such predicted intimations, the recent solar phenomenon presented features of such an extraordinary character, that the following description of it may prove not unwelcome to others than believers in Scripture eschatology. The great sun spot referred to was visible last month in the northern hemisphere of the sun. It consisted of two parts, the very dark interior portion—or umbra; and the exterior less dark part surrounding it—or penumbra. Looking at it, the beholder was, in reality, gazing down a quasi funnel-shaped depression in the photosphere of the sun, down which matter from the sun's surface rushed, or was sucked. The dark centre of the depression presented, in this case very approximately indeed, the form of an isosceles triangle, whereof the base measures 10,933 miles in length, and the triangle 12,804 miles high. As the area of a triangle equals base multiplied by half the height, therefore this huge hole occupies a space of 66,536,400 square miles. As the earth's mean diameter is only 7,917 miles; she could obviously fall easily through that portion of the triangle opening in the neighborhood of the base. The entire superficial area of our own world, land, water and all, only amounts to 196,836,000 square miles; or much less than half that involved in the disturbance now in progress on the sun.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

The Church of God at Antioch, Marshall Co., Indiana, appoints its annual June meeting to commence on Friday, June 8, at 4 p. m., to continue over the following Sunday. Meeting on Saturday at 10 a. m. The place of meeting is 5 miles south of Plymouth and 3 miles north of Argos. A cordial invitation to brethren and sisters to attend.

BY ORDER OF THE CHURCH.

The third Quarterly Conference of the second District of Arkansas, meets with the Church of God, worshipping at Green Brier, Faulkner Co., at 11 o'clock on Friday morning before the third Sunday in June, and continue over the following Sunday. Any one that has any business they wish brought before the conference, that can't attend, can have the same done by writing to the Secretary. We humbly trust, that all the brethren will come with a full purpose of heart, to do all they can for the soon coming Lord. Hoping that all of like precious faith will govern themselves accordingly.

JOHN W. TEAS, Sec'y.
Morrilton, Ark., P. O. Box 58.

The Quarterly Assembly of the Church of God will, if the Lord will, commence on Saturday before the 4th Sunday in May, in Bro. John J. Spaid's Grove, in Hampshire Co., Va., and continue over Sunday. All of the brethren in Christ are invited to attend.

The defeat of the false prophet of the Soudan is announced in a telegram from Cairo, dated May 8d. It states that a communication was received by the Khedive of Egypt from Colonel Hicks, reporting that on the 20th ult. he had an engagement with 5000 rebels. The battle, which lasted half an hour, resulted in the defeat of the rebels, with 500 killed, including the Lieutenant-General of El Mahdi, the False Prophet, and many wounded. The Egyptian loss was slight. Colonel Hicks praises the gallantry of the Egyptian troops. It is said that the victory of Colonel Hicks has cleared the Province of Sennaar of rebels, but the statement is not credited by persons well informed on Egyptian affairs.

[illegible] of the American Indian are shown to be in obviously harmonious conformity with the physical and cranial developments of this class of the human race. Its opening article is a brief account of the late Peter Cooper with likeness. Although this journal has worked a mine of wealth for forty years it evidently has not exhausted its riches.

Wilford's Microcosm. This Religio-Scientific monthly is an unique journal among the countless periodicals of this age, when many are running to and fro, and knowledge is so wonderfully on the increase. In weighing many old theories it casts them out of the scales with the word Tekel written as plainly upon them as it was in the hand-writing on the wall, as indicative of its estimation. We have marked one or two articles in this number for our own singularity in periodical and theological literature when we find room.

Biblical Expositor and People's Commentary. This is a new candidate for popular favor and support of both which we think it eminently deserving. Its object is to bring before the American public a clear and exhaustive explanation of such passages of the Old Testament as are now rendered obscure in our authorized version, and more especially of such portions as of late years have been assailed." To effect this the editor will give more accurate translations of the Hebrew text illustrated with critical, historical, and other notes calculated for the full elucidation of all he may present. The six numbers that have been published have all come to hand, and we commend the serial to the Bible student. We have given the address and terms in previous notices.

Selected Notes on Egypt.

Equatorial Egypt is attracting to itself British capital and energy, Several British officers are serving in the Soudan Army, engaged against the Mahdi, and at Soukin — a Red Sea port—active commercial enterprise has been commenced, and a line of railway is being promoted to link that port with Berber on the Nile. If carried out this will shorten the distance between the two capitals—Cairo and Khartoum —by nine days—a saving of no mean importance.

The Mahdi has met with a check,—and none too early, seeing Obeid and another town had just previously fallen into his hands. One of his lieutenants has been defeated, with heavy loss, by the Egyptian troops. It is certainly in the interests of humanity, that he should fail in his efforts to found a Slave Kingdom in Equatorial Egypt.

It would be strange if, in spite of Col. Hick's victory over the False Prophet, the English Government should make terms with him. The probability is that Hicks only encountered a lieutenant of the Mahdi, and that the Prophet himself was far distant, watching the advance of the other Egyptian column. The Mahdi has plenty of followers, and doubtless plenty of money; for in his capture of Obeid alone he acquired about two million, and quietly absorbed the garrison into his own army. His pretensions are enormous, as those of the last prophet, sent into the world to subject all countries to Islam.

The spring earthquakes along the line of the Andes, this year, seem to have been frequent, though not very destructive. In Chili and Peru several shocks have been noted, and others in Columbia and throughout the Isthmus as far north as Nicaragua, where, also, the volcano of Omotepe has been in eruption for the first time in history. On the Isthmus a special sign of disturbance has been the rapidity with which the rivers rise and fall. As the Panama Canal crosses the Chagres River, this fact becomes of interest to that enterprise. It does not appear, however, that other routes would be less free from such troubles, since the Atrato region, the scene of one rival project, has shown signs of severe volcanic action.

Two more destructive tornadoes occurred on Thursday, one of them in Texas, the other in Nebraska. The alarming frequency of these terrible storms and the wide tracts of country which have been unexpectedly swept by them this spring again make conspicuous the hopelessness of any attempt to foretell their coming. A tornado is about the most terrible expression of the power of [illegible] and no work of human [illegible] be able to stand against it [illegible] the tornado swept districts must take their chances like ships at sea. The solid ground under their feet is no protection against the fury of the powers of the air, unless they can take refuge beneath its surface.

I sing the hymn of [illegible] the battle of life,—
The hymn of the wounded, the beaten, who died overwhelmed in the strife;
Not the jubilant song of the victors, for whom the resounding acclaim
Of nations was lifted in chorus, whose brows were the chaplet of fame;
But the hymn of the low and the humble, the weary, the broken in heart,
Who sinned and who failed, acting bravely a silent and desperate part;
Whose youth bore no flower on its branches, whose hopes blighted in ashes away,
From whose hands slipped the prize they had grasped at, who stood at the dying of day,
With the mark of their life all around them, unfilled, unheeded, alone,
With death stooping down o'er their failure, and all but their faith overthrown.

While the voice of the world shouts its chorus, its pean for those who have won;
While the trumpet is sounding triumphant, and high to the breeze and the sun
Gay banners are waving, hands clapping, and laurying feet
Thronging after the laurel-crowned victors, I stand on the field of defeat
In the shadow, 'mongst those who have fallen, and wounded, and dying, and there
Chant a requiem low, place my hand on their pain-knotted brows, breathe a prayer,
Hold the hand that is helpless and whisper, "They only the victory win,
Who have fought the good fight and have vanquished the demon that tempts us within;
Who have held to their faith unseduced by the prize that the world holds on high;
Who have dared for a high cause to suffer, to plead, fight—if need be, to die."

Speak, History! who are life's victors? Unroll thy long annals and say—
Are they those whom the world called the victors, who won the success of a day?
The martyrs, or Nero? The Spartans who fell at Thermopylæ's tryst,
Or the Persians and Xerxes? His judges, or Socrates? Pilate, or Christ?

—Hall to the vanquished.

THE KINGDOM PARABLES.—No. 4.

Because of the immutability of his design, it occasionally occurs in Scripture, that God "calleth the things that are not, as though they were." This form of speech is, of course, peculiar to the prophetic writings.

God said to Abraham:—"A father of many nations I HAVE made thee," yet many years elapse before this was actually accomplished. Isaiah writes:—"Unto us a child is born," yet Christ was not begotten for several centuries after. Likewise Paul says, the Father "delivered us out of the power of darkness, and translated us into the kingdom of the Son of his love."

THE PROPHETIC TENSE.

The use of a present or past tense in a prophetic passage intensifies the prediction, and imports strong emphasis of certainty, and this is indeed why it so frequently is observed. What sad havoc would be made of prophecy were it to be insisted upon that its tenses must rigidly be adhered to in interpretation! That this procedure would utterly destroy a large portion of it is evident.

He "that hath the power of death—even the devil" certainly is the "god of this world" and "prince of the power of the air," and because of this adversary the saint is instructed to "put on the whole armor of God, that ye may be able to stand against the wiles of the devil. For our wrestling is not against flesh and blood, but against the principalities, against the powers, against the worldrulers of this darkness, against the spiritual hosts of wickedness in the heavenly places."

THE CHURCH MILITANT.

It is evident that if, during our pilgrimage, we are constantly in military armor, and wrestling against the power of darkness, our deliverance therefrom can only be when victory is declared, and the enemy is powerless against us. The old serpent was the primal cause of death, and hence he has still the "power of death;" and the sleeping saints are in his dominion of darkness till the resurrection takes place; and as proof that Satan does regard the dead as his property we need but cite the case of the dispute about the body of Moses, and support it by the Satanic antagonism against the first resurrection—symbolically portrayed in the twelfth of Revelation.

This being the case it stands to reason that, as to it being a present fact, we have not been "delivered from the power of darkness"—and what more decisive testimony is possible than when we recognize the fact that many converts, who "run well for a season," yield to temptation, are overcome by the power of darkness, and apostatize from the faith of Christ—and some of these are they who are seduced directly by the emissaries of Satan through Spiritualism.

There are three reasons why it is absolutely necessary that the saints should [illegible] this prophetic aspect. First, the saints, instead of having been delivered from the power of darkness, are fighting against it, with anticipation of ultimate triumph. Second, the saints are patiently waiting for the translation which Scripture [illegible] of this [illegible] will become "the [illegible] of our Lord and his Christ."

THE MUSTARD SEED PARABLE.

It is in the "kingdom of the son of his love" that God will fulfil the promises to Abraham:—"In thee and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed." It is with respect to the blessed activity of this royal seed that Christ gives us the following parable:—"The kingdom of heaven is like unto a grain of mustard seed which a man took and sowed in his field: which indeed is less than all seeds; but when it is grown, it is greater than the herbs, and becometh a tree, so that the birds of the heaven come and lodge in the branches thereof."

The saints, with Christ, constitute a unit seed which, in the millennium kingdom, will develop into a royalty capable of bestowing great blessing on subjective nations. The component elements of this seed have, during many centuries, been planted in the earth, but as a single seed it will not have germinated until the first resurrection—when all its elements are co-ordinated—and then it will appear as the greatest system of royalty the nations have ever seen, and its capacities for blessing mankind will surpass all prior systems of government.

So indeed there is a likeness between the development of a little seed into a large tree capable of protecting and harboring the feathered tribe; and the development of a "little flock" into the rulers of a kingdom, under whose benign jurisdiction myriads of people will be protected and blessed. It will be remembered that Nebuchadnezzar's royal jurisdiction was also symbolized by a tree in which creatures found shelter.

A judicious person has said that parables were not intended to "go on all fours," and this homly saying very tersely declares that an exact counterpart to every feature of the parable is not intended and should not be sought. Many an absurdity has been originated by overlooking this fact.

Our Lord again said, "The kingdom of heaven is which a woman took and hid in three measures of meal, till it was all leavened."

The leaven may fairly represent the righteous elements in the kingdom at the time of the coronation of the saints. The royal saints are made priests and kings for the age, that they may wisely rule and instruct the subjects; and it is through their efforts that the "knowledge of the Lord shall cover the earth as the waters do the sea." How appropriate then that they should be referred to as the leaven and the success of their mission and authority in bringing the whole earth into a righteous state be properly portrayed by the leavening of the whole meal.

Now were we to insist that, since it says "it was all leavened," every individual person in the kingdom must be righteous and finally saved, we would not only be forcing the parable too far, but also would unwarrantedly be making it dispute and conflict with other parables concerning the kingdom, the express purposes of which were to inform us that during the future age, and throughout the whole of the age, there does exist a certain number of evil persons.

This latter fact, however, may be true, and yet, because of the predominance of good, the age is truly entitled to the general character of righteousness. Hence it will be said to the porters of Jerusalem:—"Open ye the gates that the righteous nation which keepeth the truth may enter in." "Thy people shall all be righteous."

The following parable refers particularly to the moral phase in its individual bearing—"The kingdom of heaven is that was cast into the sea, and gathered of every kind; which, when it was filled, they drew up on the beach and they sat down and gathered the good into vessels, but the bad they cast away. So shall it be in the consummation of the age: the angels shall come forth and sever the wicked from among the righteous, and shall cast them into the furnace of fire; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth."

It is Christ's intention to establish a perfect system of government for the nations. The great mass of mankind have lived in total darkness, and in heathen superstition, and these, age after age, have fallen by death under the power of tombic darkness. Raised from death to the commencement of the millennium, they will be brought to a knowledge of truth, and their antitypes, after having been enlightened, determines their ultimate destiny. All the heathen being without law, and thence without imputation of sin, no [illegible] reckoned against [illegible] the bad, have the [illegible] of the new life from Christ.

Truly, the kingdom is like a net which gathered both good and bad; and God's messengers will surely make a distinction between the persons who have a virtuous and those who have a vicious character. Proper time is given in the age to come for the reform of the most depraved person, and efficient aid is extended to them for this purpose; but when the wisest agencies fail in producing reformation, mercy, justice, and love demand and command their extinction.

The bad fish are taken from the net and "cast away;" the wicked will be "cast into the furnace of fire." This is faithfully descriptive of God's judgment on the wicked at the close of the millennium, as also the parable of the tares so fully determines, and as the plain prophetic word so solemnly predicts. Neither parable nor prophecy fosters the vain delusion of universalism.

Forgiveness is a standard rule of action in the future age, and no more there than in the present world, will the Lord permit the retention of malice toward a repentant offender. The parable of represents this phase of the moral code of the age to come. "Therefore is the kingdom of heaven likened unto a certain king which would make reckoning with his servants." One servant owed him over ten million dollars, but the gracious monarch, moved by his entreaties, actually forgave this enormous debt, and released him from arrest. The liberated man, however, went from the presence of the king, and found a fellow servant who owed him about ten dollars, and because the minor debtor could not immediately pay, he choaked him, and had him sent to prison. Rumor of this outrageous conduct coming to the ear of the sovereign, he summons the unmerciful servant, reprimands him for his cruelty, and casts him into prison till the $10,000,000 debt should be paid—evidently an impossibility.

PHILANTHROPY IN THE KINGDOM.

All who are brought by the second resurrection into the life of the age to come, are, through the redemption of Christ released from accountability for all their evil acts of their lifetime in a former age. A Chinese may have committed murder; a Hindoo may have been a robber; a Hottentot may have been a slave dealer—but these acts are not reckoned as personal sins by the Redeemer who gives to them enlightenment in his kingdom. A general amnesty having thus by the king been declared, it becomes a principle in equity that in his kingdom the forgiving spirit must predominate—since to each so much has been forgiven. The subjects who will not be governed by this will prove themselves unworthy of divine favor, and will receive and merit the judgment of God.

The principles of charity and mercy underlie the formation of Christian character in this age. We pray, "Forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors," and it is not presumptuous to say that these moral attributes are a necessity to every one who, by probation in any age, will obtain immortality; and that it is essential in the makeup of the perfect individual in the millennium is undeniably true from the fact that this parable is descriptive of that age.

Editor Restitution:

I have just returned from Sumner and Wilson counties, where I held some very interesting meetings. I met Brother John Russel and family. He once lived in Illinois, and was baptized by Brother Hatch. They are fully in the faith. They are rejoicing in the prospect there is in the west; for the gospel is spreading slowly, but surely. I immersed two of Brother Russel's children, a son and daughter, being his two youngest children. My dear young friends, go do as these young people have done.

Where are others there who will soon follow. There seems to be a hungering and thirsting after the truth, and men are crying "Come over and help us." The Macedonian cry is coming from every corner. But I have a heavier load than I can bear. Brethren are not realizing that it is their duty to hold up our hands while the battle goes on between truth and error. Cannot some of our rested-up ministers come west—if there are any—and take my place, while I go to hard labor and catch up in business. I am not complaining, but may God enable the Church to wake up and help to preach to a perishing world.

I got one more subscriber for THE RESTITUTION. This makes three from the Dunkers who have subscribed for the paper, and more are learning the truth. I preach Saturday night and Sunday from two to three times, go home on Monday and labor hard to get out of debt so I can preach. Oh for a faith that will not shrink, especially when we are just in the evening of the last day, and the Millennial Morn will soon dawn. When I look around and see brethren that cannot take THE RESTITUTION, but take two or three political papers, and cannot pay anything to those who preach, but smoke and chew tobacco, and go to little school house shows, I am compelled to say, Will Jesus find faith on the earth when he comes? Now I ask you, brethren, How much preaching can such Christians do? I speak as unto wise men. Judge ye what I say. Brethren pray for me, that I may not give up the struggle till Jesus comes, which is my prayer for Christ's sake.

Editor Restitution:

Please permit me (through your columns) to thank some unknown friend for sending us THE RESTITUTION which we read with much interest, especially those articles written by Prof. J. P. Weethee. He is an esteemed friend of ours, and a Christian who works with zeal, although badly persecuted by some who cannot and will not believe as he does. Mrs. Davis' letters are also very anxiously looked for, as we are very much interested in the old city Jerusalem and all its surroundings. Would love to see that beautiful garden and those ancient trees, described in one of her letters.

Yours Respectfully,

L. W. FULTON.

DISTRICT NO. 2, North Ark.

Editor Restitution:

I have been on a two weeks trip preaching the things concerning the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ. I found many ready to receive the truth. Received three into the Church of God on my trip; also I found a few that were very prejudiced. I found one preaching brother who said that he was immortal and was now in the kingdom. We had some pleasantries with him all in a friendly way. We have some good brethren in this part of the country, and we hope to accomplish good this season. District No. 2 embraces the territory between the Arkansas and White Rivers, north of Memphis and Little Rock R. R., and south of the Boston Mountain. This district embraces some of the finest farming lands I ever saw and the truth is spreading over it fast. We have about 16 preachers in this district, and only about eight of them doing regular preaching. We need a few more working preachers in this district, or some that we already have renovated. Our next District Quarterly Conference will be held at Green Brier church, Faulkner Country, beginning Friday night before the third Lord's Day in June and will continue over Saturday and Sunday. We hope to have a good attendance. Visiting brethren will be cared for. May the Lord bless the good cause.

THE PARABLE OF THE UNJUST STEWARD.—Luke xvi.

In this parable the Savior addressing the Pharisees, intimates to them that their stewardship was about to be taken from them. The Scribes and Pharisees sat in Moses' seat, they claimed to be the successors of Moses (as our modern Anglican clergy claim to be the "successors" of the Apostles), and in the natural order of things they should have been the executive of the Messiah; but they employed their stewardship for their own aggrandizement, wealth, and power. The unjust steward provided for himself by his deceit and dishonest craftiness a home for life, and by the "mammon of unrighteousness"—that is money dishonestly obtained—made to himself friends out of his Master's debtors, by permitting them to make fraudulent deductions from the amounts they owed—"How much owest thou unto my Lord? and he said a hundred measures of oil; and he said, sit down quickly and write fifty." And then applying the parable to the Pharisees, the Lord said—I say unto you make to yourselves friends by the wealth you have unrighteously acquired (as, for instance, by devouring widows' houses), that when you are cast out of your stewardship, as you will be ere long—as they actually were by the invasion and destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans—they, i. e., the friends you may possibly make, by wisely using your unrighteous gains, may receive you into permanent homes—Greek aionian tabernacles. This word "aionian" is always limited by the subject of which it treats. In Matt. xxv. 46, it is applied to the life of the righteous and the punishment of the wicked, and carries with it its fullest force—unendingness, but in Paul's Epistle to Philemon he uses precisely the same word, when he expresses the wish that Philemon might have Onesimus as his servant for ever (aionian), and so in the passage under consideration, where the authorized version reads "everlasting habitations," and the revised version, "eternal tabernacles;" the meaning being that they, the Pharisees, might thus obtain permanent homes as long as they lived. The word aionian being limited here as in Philemon's case, by the life of the individual. The Pharisees, being money lovers, heard all these things (and understood them), but they derided him.

This parable has been frequently quoted to enforce the duty of giving money to the poor; that when they, the donors, die, the poor who have been benefitted by their bounty, may receive them into everlasting habitations—that is, into heaven. In which interpretation there are three or four perfectly gratuitous assumptions: 1. That all persons who give liberally to the poor go to heaven. 2. That they go to heaven because they have given liberally to the poor—"Make to yourselves friends by a liberal use of your money now, and when you die, the poor persons to whom you have given it, may receive you into heaven." 3. That the poor who are thus benefitted, all die before their benefactors, otherwise they could not be waiting at the door of heaven to receive them. 4. That all poor persons, who are the objects of charity, go to heaven at death, and wait for their benefactors.

Such an interpretation or application of the parable is as grotesque as it is unscriptural, and is therefore altogether untenable. It ignores and renders unnecessary the sacrificial work of Christ, and makes heaven obtainable upon liberal alms-giving to the poor, a luxury which none but the rich can indulge in, and yet by a strange and palpable contradiction, it makes the poor, who can give nothing, but who receive everything, get to heaven before their rich benefactors. In this interpretation, the rich are found gaining heaven through their works, their almsgiving; how the poor obtain heaven is not stated, unless it implies that they obtain it because they are poor. Thus the parable is complete, and Christ is shut out altogether.—R. B. Wade, F. R. G. S., in Bible Standard.

Spring Flowers.

As breaks the moon-fire o'er the sea,
As steals the morning on the night,
So the slow dawning of the spring
Is flooding all the earth with light.
O'er uplands brown and dusky hills,
Its "cloth of gold" the sunshine flings,
Where fragrant south winds, hurrying by,
Drop blossoms from their balmy wings.

On sunny banks, whose grassy slopes
Are pied with violets blue and white,
The primrose, with its golden eyes,
Climbs upward to the mellow light;
And, nodding by the meadow brook,
The knots of yellow cowslips shine,
And tufts of grass and trader leaves
Sway in the sleepy water's flow.

Beneath the dark and restless pines,
That whisper through the balmy night,
The arbutus, 'mid its shining leaves,
Its trailing blossoms, pink and white,
And purple wood-anemones,
In sheltered nooks and valleys grow,
And delicate 'mid the tawny rocks,
Gleam out like flakes of winter's snow.

But when the false and fickle winds
Shall whisper to the listening trees
Of summer's bright and bounteous things—
Her gorgeous bloom and scented breezes;
When earth beneath the changing skies
Hath blushed in May-bloom, wept in showers,
The spring shall fold her weary wings,
And vanish with the early flowers.

Gentleness.

Oh! beautiful, wonderful word—almost more a flower than a fruit of Christian life, in its grace and beauty adorning the rough places of the road, leading little children, lifting sad hearts, wiping away tears, and winning wayward souls. Paul, with all his great and eloquent words never melts the hearts so truly as when he says, with an irresistible appeal, "I Paul beseech you by the gentleness of Christ."

He Understood It.

An old schoolmaster said one day to a clergyman who came to examine his school: "I believe the children know the catechism, word for word." "But do they understand it? that is the question," said the clergyman. The schoolmaster only bowed respectfully, and the examination began. A little boy had repeated the fifth commandment, "Honor thy father and thy mother," and he was desired to explain it. Instead of trying to do so, the little boy, with his face covered with blushes, said, almost in a whisper: "Yesterday I showed some strange gentlemen over the mountain. The sharp stones cut my feet, and the gentlemen saw they were bleeding, and gave me some money to buy me shoes. I gave it to my mother for she had no shoes either; and I thought I could go barefooted better than she could."—Our Young People.

A Heavenly Spectacle.

EXPLORING THE REGIONS OF THE MOON THROUGH THE LARGEST TELESCOPE IN THE WORLD.

The first object viewed was Saturn, and the transformation was likened to a vision of fairyland. The pale star, on which a moment since we had looked with the unaided eye, is now a creation of surpassing loveliness, the most charming telescope object the heavens reveal. Saturn, his rings and moons are before us. The disk, a golden sphere crossed by faint cloud bands of a delicate creamy tint, the wonderful rings softly cradling the planet, seven of the eight moons beaming from the dark background of the sky, the largest moon showing a perceptible disk, make up the shining picture. Every detail of the magnificent and complex Saturnian system is complete—the shadowy cloud-bands on the disk; the outer ring, with its faint line of division; the division between the outer and inner rings, closely joined to the second, and the break in the ring formed by the shadow of the planet.

Jupiter is the next object to test the space-annihilating glass. The prince of planets is superb, larger than the full moon, though but little larger than we have seen him many times in a telescope of eight inches aperture. He is, however, much brighter on account of the light-collecting power of the glass. Though by no means as magnificent as Saturn, he far exceeds him in mass and volume, and as he is twice as near, we see him in a much larger scale. The giant of the system takes on grand proportions; the flood of light irradiating his surface brings out every minute detail. His broad belts are delicious in coloring, suffused with pale rose, mottled with soft gray, purple, brown and delicate green. We have seen Jupiter when the definition was much more perfect, but never with the variety of tint we behold this night. Never before did he seem so near, so grand in proportions, so symmetrical in equipoise. His four satellites are in a line on his left, and bear witness to the power of the telescope by presenting disks instead of points. We find it difficult to decide which of the two pictures is the more beautiful. Saturn is more magnificent, more complex, more curious, but Jupiter is more majestic, more like the great sun himself.

The great nebula of Orion was also inspected, and the little whisp of cloud haze around the star in the sword of the Mighty Hunter that is visible to the unaided vision becomes one of the most glorious spectacles that ever breaks upon the entranced eye of an observer. The most wonderful nebula in the northern skies reveal is before us, filling the field of view, and suffused with a celestial light suggestive of the holy city that "had no need of the sun, neither of the moon to shine in it; for the glory of God did lighten it."

In conclusion, the editor says: "The Russian objective will soon be transported to its destination in the Pulkowa Observatory, founded by the Czar Nicholas, and overlooking the city of the Czars from its lofty position on the Pulkowa hills, nine miles south of St. Petersburg. We shall never again behold the wonders of the sky through its great object-glass, but as long as life endures we shall remember the time when we beheld, irradiated by its light-collecting power, and brought near by its great eye, the magnificence of Saturn, the grandeur of Jupiter, and the awe-inspiring combination of beauty, mystery and shadowy form of the great nebula of Orion."

To the Young:

Dear young friends, I have been thinking for some time in what way we could best induce more of the young to seek Jesus, and thought it might be that a short letter from one that is young might be of some benefit to you. Did you never think that youth was the time to seek the Lord, while your minds are free to some extent from the sinful pleasures of this world. If you never thought of it begin to meditate now. Oh! how many there are that say when the sweet and gentle voice of Jesus is calling them to come and be his dear children, not now, some other time; I have not enjoyed the pleasures of this world long enough yet; some other time I will work for thee. Perhaps when I get older or when I settle down in life, but I am roving about now and it will be impossible to serve and obey thee, and a great many other excuses of like manner. Oh! dear young friends, stop one moment and consider, have you any promise of some other day? or of old age? "Now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation." Do not wait until tomorrow, for it may never come, time is fleeting and you may never have another opportunity. God says in his Word, "My spirit will not always strive with man." If once you start in this glorious work you will never regret it. Do not say I wish I was a Christian, or that I would like to be one, but be one in word and deed. "Do not delay, but come."

OBITUARY.

A great and good man has fallen with his armor on, a victim to that hydra-headed monster death!

Fell asleep in Jesus the Life-giver, at Memphis, N. Y., March 22, 1883, Benjamin Baird Schenck, M. D.

Dr. Schenck, was born in Charlestown, Montgomery Co., N. Y., July 20, 1809. His father was of illustrious German descent. His ancestors emigrated to this country in 1640, and settled in Flatlands, New Jersey. Benjamin was the fifth child and second son; at the age of six years came with his parents to Onondaga Co., who settled in the town of Lysander, then a wilderness, in 1815. His early advantages for education were limited, his boyhood days being occupied in helping his father in clearing land and other farm duties.

Not until the age of twenty-three, when failing health showed his constitution unfitted for the then rough life of a farmer, did he turn his attention towards a profession. At that time he entered the private school of T. W. Allis, of Skaneateles, where he remained some eighteen months, making great proficiency. In 1834 he attended one term at Homer Academy, then one of the flourishing schools of the state, and the following spring began the study of medicine in the office of Dr. J. H. Skinner, of Plainville, attending a course of lectures at the Medical College at Fairfield, N. J., in 1835-6, graduating February 10, 1838, at Geneva College. In June, 1838, he married Harriet, daughter of Captain R. Sullivan, Seneca Co., who survives him. In 1838 he began the practice of medicine in Plainville, which he continued, with intervals of rest, until 1878, when his health failed. But his council was sought in difficult cases.

Early in 1851, after a thorough investigation, he adopted homœopathy as his mode of practice, carrying with him into the new school all but two of his former patrons. From 1857 to 1864 he was engaged in mercantile pursuits, in the mean time teaching several terms of a select school in the higher branches.

He held a lieutenant's commission in the state militia four years, a captain's seven, and was by his own request, honorably discharged. In 1849 he was appointed postmaster at Plainville, held the office until Pierce's administration in 1853; was re-appointed in 1861, and held the commission at his death. Was quite active in his party's ranks until 1852, when the defeat of Scott and Graham took him out of active politics, since which time he had not taken a part in the matter of voting.

Brother Schenck was among the converts in the '43 movement. And in 1844 he united with the Christian Church. Soon after was ordained a minister by that church, and preached frequently for many years, and none could listen to him without being instructed. And having, in connection with the personal coming of Jesus, embraced the doctrine that man is mortal, that a future state or life in the future was made to depend upon a resurrection! Also, the glorious doctrine of the age to come. He was soon turned out on to the commons, like his co-laborer Elder Joseph Marsh. But his other duties did not allow him to travel extensively; hence his labor as a preacher was confined mostly to his own county.

During the existence of the general Conference of the Church of God in Western New York, which was brought into existence by the late Elder J. Marsh and others, but broken up by the imprudent course taken by some, Brother S. took an active part in their yearly and quarterly meetings, and generally filling the office of President, and was called upon to preach at these gatherings. It was in 1860 that the writer first met with Brother S., and from that time to the day of his death our friendship has been like David and Jonathan. A part of our work when we met was to compare notes, and we always found that we had been searching the same book, and in the same school. In the death of Brother S., Sister S. has in her declining years lost a good husband; a son and daughter, a kind father; the congregation of the Lord, a valuable member; the world a great and good man, and the writer one of his true and confidential yoke-fellows and friends.

EVENING TEARS AND MORNING SONGS.

FRANCES RIDLEY HAVERGAL.

In the evening there is weeping,
Lengthening shadows, falling tears,
Silent darkness slowly creeping
Over all things dear and bright.

In the evening there is weeping,
Fainting all the twilight through;
Phantom sorrows, never sleeping,
Wakening slumbers of the true.

In the morning cometh singing,
Cometh joy and cometh light,
When the sun ariseth, bringing
Healing on his wings of light.

In the morning cometh singing—
Songs that ne'er in silence end;
Angel minstrels, ever bringing
Praises new with thine to blend.

Are the twilight shadows casting
Heavy gloom upon thy heart?
Soon in radiance everlasting,
Night forever shall depart.

Art thou weeping, sad and lonely,
Through the evening of thy days?
All thy sighing shall be only
Prelude of more perfect praise.

Darkest hour is nearest dawning,
Solemn herald of the day;
Singing cometh in the morning—
God shall wipe thy tears away.

Selections.

"THE PRIZE OF THE HIGH CALLING."

The word calling is one of frequent occurrence in connection with Christian life, privileges, and service; it indicates our indebtedness to divine grace, not only for the provision made for us in Christ, but for any interest we have in that provision. We did not save ourselves, nor call ourselves to be partakers of this salvation. He "hath saved us and called us with an holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace." Every believer must say with St. Paul, "It pleased God, who called me by his grace."

This primary calling to salvation by Christ includes, or is followed, by a calling to many precious privileges, present and future, and to faithful service. It is used to bring under our notice some of the most important truths in divine revelation; we do well, wherever it occurs, to look at the context that we may know the special truth it is intended to teach.

The primary reference in the passage before us is to the hope or great end of our calling, viz., our manifestation with Christ in his coming glory. Enoch said, "The Lord cometh with myriads of his saints." Zechariah, "The Lord my God shall come and all the saints with him." St. John says, "When he shall appear we shall be like him," and calls it "This hope." St. Paul calls it "The manifestation of the sons of God," and speaks of it as "That blessed hope;" concerning it he writes, "Ye are called in one hope of your calling," and, that we "may know what is the hope of his calling." The great hope of our calling is not simply salvation, but manifestation with Christ at his second coming, and joint possession with him of "the inheritance incorruptible."

The apostle, in common with every believer, was the subject of this calling; but the hope, which is the burden of it, still lies in the future. "If we hope for that we see not, then do we with patience wait for it," and during those waiting days this hope is the brightest and most cheering object presented to the eye of faith. Let this fill the whole range of vision, then we shall enter fully into the meaning of those words of inspiration: "Our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory." "The sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us." Faith's present trial will "be found unto praise, and honor, and glory at the appearing of Jesus Christ."

When the apostle says, "I press toward the mark," we are not to understand him as doubtful about his interest in this calling, or about his eternal salvation—his firm standing in Christ is recorded in the preceding part of the chapter; and in another place he states as an unquestionable truth, "Whom he called, them he also justified, and whom he justified, them he also glorified." No believer should suffer himself to doubt his high calling in Christ, and his interest in this blessed hope. Calling, justification, and glory, form a chain which Almighty power has forged, and which none can break.

But this high calling of God" has its prize or prizes—hence the apostle says, "I press toward the mark," not to be saved, but to obtain this reward of Christian faithfulness. When the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall, at his appearing, give to each servant as his work shall be; i. e., rulership over many cities or few—a greater or less reward, or no reward at all—a crown more or less brilliant. "One star differeth from another star in glory," so also will it be on the distribution of these prizes to those who have part in the first resurrection from among the dead.

The calling and its hope, no believer can lose — the prize or prizes he may lose or gain. So anxious was the apostle to obtain the greatest prize that he says, "this one thing I do." I press forward as an athlete, bending all the energies of my Christian life and manhood to obtain it.

In 1 Cor. ix. 24 we are earnestly exhorted to the same diligence, and it is added, "So run, that ye may obtain." Obtain what? Salvation? Get to heaven? Certainly not. Salvation is not obtained by our running, but by faith in Christ. "By grace are ye saved through faith." When, after this exhortation to run the race, the apostle adds, "I therefore so run: I keep under my body, and bring it into subjection, lest that by any means, when I have preached to others, I myself should be a castaway," he does not refer to the question of salvation. The Greek word adokimos, which is here translated "a castaway," and in the Revised Version "rejected," means inability to stand the test, or to be unapproved as an aspirant for a crown; it does not throw any doubt upon his salvation. Only saved persons can run this race, and the prize will be to those who have run it well; it will crown the life that has been distinguished by faithfulness to the Lord's word, by an unwavering faith, a self-denying spirit, consecration to "the work of faith and labor of love," and by cheerful, loving, trustful submission to the Lord's will.

In the epistles to the seven Churches, in Rev. ii. and iii., we find the sevenfold form of evil by which, what in Our Lord's parables is called "the kingdom of heaven," now known as Christendom, would, during this dispensation, be corrupted and leavened. We find also in the same epistles the faith and love, and holy walk, in which the Lord delights, pointed out. And to the overcoming ones, i. e., those who have lived in holy separateness from these evils, and who in faith and walk have kept the word of his patience, the sevenfold blessing, or the prize or prizes, which are to reward Christian faithfulness, is assured, viz., "the tree of life," "the crown of life," "the hidden manna," "power over the nations," "the morning star," "the white raiment," a place of honor in the temple of God, with the name of God, and of the city, the new Jerusalem, and the new name written upon him, and the crowning promise, is, "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me on my throne, even as I also overcame and am set with my Father on his throne."

Is it possible for the believer to reach such prizes as these? Are these the things of untold glory and value which "eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, and which have not entered into the heart of man, which God hath prepared for those who love him." Can we attain to such possessions—possessions which the greatest glory and magnificence of earth can but dimly foreshadow? Yes, to the humblest believer who is an overcomer, all, through grace, is possible. There is no reason, save unfaithfulness on our part, why all these prizes should not be ours. Collectively, I presume, they form the highest prize in the coming kingdom of God. In Rev. xxi. 7, we read: "He that overcometh shall inherit all things." Are not these the most privileged and dignified of that royal priesthood who shall sit on his right hand and on his left when he shall sit upon the throne of his kingdom? Surely to win such a prize is worthy of being made life's one work. The apostle's estimate of it was right, when he said, touching his ambition to win this, "This one thing I do." A little later, and when nearing the end of his course, this same apostle speaks confidently of this prize being awarded to him. His testimony is, that having "fought a good fight and kept the faith," the Lord, the righteous One, will, at his second coming, fulfil his promise, by giving the reward of faithfulness, viz., "a crown of righteousness." Also that he will thus honor all those who are faithful, and love his appearing. 2 Tim. iv. 7, 8. Many may be saved who will fail to win this "prize of the high calling."

Hence a walk corresponding to our profession and hope is constantly urged upon us. "Blessed are ye, when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely, for my sake. Rejoice, and be exceeding glad; for great is your reward in heaven." Matt. v. 11, 12. "Every man shall receive his own reward according to his own labor." 1 Cor. iii. 8. "Cast not away therefore your confidence, which hath great recompence of reward." Heb. x. 35. "Look to yourselves, that we lose not those things which we have wrought (marg. gained), but that we receive a full reward." 2 John 8. A believer will surely be saved, but he may fall short of the reward.

On the last page of the inspired Word the Lord says: "I come quickly, and my reward is with me, to give every man as his work shall be." Rev. xxii. 12. All these, and corresponding passages, are addressed to those who are already saved, and they urge us to follow the apostolic example, "This one thing I do; I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling." Believers cannot too clearly understand that they have to win the prize, not salvation. Salvation is at the beginning of the race, the prize is at the end. Until a man is saved, he has nothing whatever to do with the rewards of the great future; he is without life, and can perform none of the functions of life; he has no equipment for the spiritual war, seeing he has not put on the armor of God; he has no power to run the Christian race, nor does he know the way. Lessons on these themes are learnt only in the school of Christ. His Word is the only authorised lesson-book, and his Spirit the only infallible Teacher. No power of intellect, and no amount of human culture, can bring the prize of our high calling within the range of vision, or so elevate a man in character and condition as to give him a claim to this gift of God, or enable him to run for it.

Man, in his pride and independence of God, is boasting of intellectual culture and civilizing agencies as the true regenerators and elevators of humanity. We would not discourage, or undervalue, these agencies; but they are not salvation; and of themselves, and as the expressions of man's attempt to raise himself, and to regenerate his fellows, by means of his own devising, they must utterly fail. God has laid before us his own plan; and no other can succeed. He has inseparably connected all blessing and all real progress with Christ, and has doomed to utter failure and the curse, all, even the proudest of human efforts and organizations which are not united to him. History and revelation are full of lessons in proof of this; but the growing pride and unbelief of man will yet receive more complete and sorrowful illustration of it.

Christ is the Alpha and Omega of heaven-taught men—their calling, with its hope and prizes of countless value, they possess only in and with him. Those know that there is no salvation, no acceptance before God, but in him, no personal holiness and no practical godliness, which can be laid upon the true altar, which are not the fruit of faith in him, of which he is not the example and his words the rule, and no work which he will accept and reward, save "the work of faith and labor of love." The prize will be given, not to those who have given the most untiring service to party organizations, and been most successful in making converts to man's creeds and man's churches. Sea and land may be compassed to make proselytes to these, yet no work be done for God. Loyalty to his truth is the obedience he approves, and will, according to its measure, reward, not loyalty to human opinions, regarding his Word, or to the doctrines and commandments of men. These are often set forth as his Gospel, and we are asked to accept them as divine authority, as genuine and not counterfeit, as wholesome food and not chaff or deadly poison, as a divine message and not subversive of the teaching of the Holy Spirit.

Never was the careful study of the Word, under the Spirit's teaching, more important than now. No human authority can be trusted as its true expositor: there is the greatest danger, even without our suspecting it, of our accepting something human in the place of that which is divine, and in so far as this is done we must fall in the Christian race and fall short of the prize of our calling.

The first step in Christian obedience and faithfulness is to accept God's word—all of it—whatever becomes of our opinions and oracles; and the second step is a holy walk in harmony therewith. There may be much zeal in crying, "Lord, Lord," but he reckons it of no value, if we do not the things which he commands. There may be great liberality in sacrifices and burnt-offerings, but "to obey is better than sacrifice." Those who keep the word of his patience are those he will keep in, or save from, the troubles which are coming upon the earth. He is the wise man that heareth these sayings and doeth them. "Blessed are they that hear the word of God and keep it." "Behold, I come quickly, blessed is he that keepeth the sayings of this book." Such and such only is the obedience which, according to its measure, will obtain the prize at his coming. "Of a truth, I say unto you, he will make such rulers over all that he hath."

Let us then abide in him and his word abide in us; and while men cry, "Lo here, lo there," let us reply, "This one thing I do: I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus."

"Be brave, my brother;
The recompence is great,
The kingdom bright and fair:
Beyond the glory of all earthly state,
Shall be the glory there.
Grudge not the hasty cost,
Faint not at labor's height:
'Tis but a lifetime at the most,
The day of rest is near."

THE RICH MAN AND LAZARUS—WAS IT A PARABLE.

This is a question found in Brethren at Work, Feb. 20. The writer in said paper denies its being a parable, and treats it as real history to prove the conscious existence of the intermediate state. He further states that "soul sleepers" call it a parable, and apply it to the "final state." Now I honestly believe that it is a parable, but that soul sleepers should apply it to the final state as represented, is certainly news to me. Yet I know one of his ministerial brethren who applied it thus. So this effort in the main is lost labor, falling harmless at the "soul sleepers'" feet.

That it is a parable we offer the following: While Luke does not call it a parable, yet it stands grouped with a number of parables some of which are so-called, while others that are acknowledged as such are not called parables by the inspired writer. Note the woman and ten pieces of silver, the prodigal son, the unjust steward and others. While we offer as additional testimony, Jesus was addressing the multitude (see Luke xv. 1-4, 16,) of which it is said, "Without a parable spake he not unto them." Matt. xiii. 34; Mark iv. 34. Again, we submit that the connections and style of language would seem sufficient to convict of its being a figure of speech. We object to the popular application of this Scripture as teaching the conscious state of the dead, which is a contradiction of terms. In the next place, if it be literal history, then the rich man who died and was buried is the one represented as being in conscious torment, no intimation of a separate soul or spirit. And so of the poor man; the poor beggar that was full of sores, died and was carried by angels into Abraham's bosom. Certainly Orthodoxy cannot endure a literal application of this language; yet not one word of explanation, after the popular fashion, is found as to its meaning. Again we object to the popular construction of this language, for if it be correct, then there is no resurrection of the dead, for no one is dead. No need of a future judgment, as the rich man the representative of the wicked, (yet it is not said that he was wicked). And poor Lazarus full of sores—the representative of the righteous (no intimation of his being righteous either) were both receiving their reward, one happy, and the other in torment. Why bring them out to judgment?

Then again, this popular application of this noted Scripture, which is highly esteemed among men, stands directly in opposition to the plainest teaching of the Word. King David—who is both dead and buried, not ascended into heaven—testifies that his breath goeth forth, he returneth to his earth; in that very day his thoughts perish. While Solomon, the wise man, testifies, "For the living know that they shall die, but the dead know not anything." Again, "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might; for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom in the grave whither thou goest." Acts ii. 29, 34; Psa. cxlvi. 4; Eccl. ix. 5, 10. To die is to lose life—to expire, so says the doctors, and so says the Bible. The Lord said to king Hezekiah, "Set thine house in order for thou shalt die and not live." While the patient Job manifests his interest in this important subject by asking, "If a man die shall he live again?" Isa. xxxviii. 1; Job, xiv. 14. Please read the entire chapter. The resurrection or reliving of the dead is and was the ultimate object, the crowning point in the Christian's faith and hope. Without it all is lost. "But if there be no resurrection of the dead, then is Christ not risen: and if Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain, and your faith is also vain. Yea, and we are found false witnesses of God; because we have testified of God that he raised up Christ: whom he raised not up, if so be that the dead rise not. For if the dead rise not, then is not Christ raised. And if Christ be not raised, your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins. Then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished. Gone forever. Grave results which could not possibly follow from the popular hypothesis. If, in this life only, we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable. But now is Christ risen from the dead and become the first-fruits of them that slept." 1 Cor. xv. 13-20.

Thus far it seems [illegible] and consistent. While the enquiring mind naturally reverts to the rich man and Lazarus, If it be a parable what does it signify, what does it teach? We answer, this parable, like some others, for some good reason no doubt, is left unexplained, and we are left with a key to work it out as best we can. So let us take the key found in the context (not in heathen mythology) verses 14-16 with 29 and go to work. The covetous Pharisees derided, laughed at in contempt and mocked him; a sufficient cause, one would think, for the justly merited, scathing rebukes that followed. And he said unto them, Ye are they which justify yourselves before men, but God knoweth your hearts; for that which is highly esteemed among men is abomination in the sight of God. The law and the prophets were until John; since that time the kingdom of God is preached, and every man presseth into it." The change from the law to the gospel dispensation had come; the Jew, being blind, knew it not, but still clung to and gloried in the law and a corrupt priesthood. Note the priestly outfit, and mark the similarity, "Gold, blue, purple, scarlet and fine linen" Ex. xxviii. "There was a certain rich man, which was clothed in purple and fine linen, and fared sumptuously every day."

The Jews in their blindness rejected and received him not, died politically and religiously, and being buried away among hostile nations, have for eighteen long centuries suffered their cruel torments. Read carefully Rom. xi While the Gentile nations, not having the many advantages the Jew had, were dependent on the rich man for the crumbs of knowledge, also died, not physically, but to his paganistic, idolatrous worship. A transforming change came over them, and they were transferred from darkness to light, from Satan to God. See Paul's mission Acts xxvi. 16-18. The Jews rejected the Messiah and the offer of life; the apostles turned to the Gentiles. "The kingdom of God is preached." Preaching and showing the glad tidings of the kingdom of God. The apostle James declares that God is now visiting the Gentiles, taking out of them a people for his name. The gospel that was preached to Abraham, but subsequently enlarged and explained, being the means—plan or power of God—unto salvation to every one that believeth. Those who believe are carried into Abraham's bosom, who is said to be the father of the faithful. See Rom. iv. and Gal. iii. Those of faith, are blessed with faithful Abraham, become Abraham's seed and heirs according to the promise. The gospel as preached by Christ and his apostles was but a revival of the Abrahamic covenant or promise made to Abraham, while those who believe and obey from the heart stand with father Abraham in covenant relation with God, represented as Abraham's bosom. Now who are the five brethren? Answer, The rich man representing the priesthood of Judah and Benjamin that were then in that land; the five brethren stand in or represent the ten tribes that were lost. They have Moses and the prophets, let them hear them. Who is it that have and cling tenaciously to Moses and the prophets? Is it the sinners of all nations? or is it the Jews as a nation? Abraham saith if they hear (that is believe or heed) not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead. This was really true of the Jews as a nation and is true to this day. They denied that Jesus had been raised from the dead. Here are the keys, and the line by which this most noted parable can be explained and made plain; one which we verily believe to be most free from objections. Try it friends on this line.

Editor Restitution:

It is a well-known fact that many of the brethren are scattered abroad and isolated by uncontrolable circumstances, but have a strong desire to unite themselves in some locality where a congregation may be organized for the purpose of worshipping our Heavenly Father according to the teaching of his written Word. In view of this fact I am emboldened to make a motion in that direction. I know of a few brethren in this state who would very gladly enter into a colony to move to some new locality for the above purpose. I therefore move that all unsettled brethren desiring to move to some other country for the purpose of organizing a congregation and promoting our general welfare, will correspond with me and enclose a stamped envelope addressed to themselves.

Yours in the blessed hope,

M. B. MOYER.

Announcements.

The next Annual Conference of the Church in Michigan will be held, the Lord willing, in the Brick school house three and one-half miles north of Mendon, St. Joseph Co., commencing Thursday evening, May 31, 1883, and continuing over the following Sunday. Mendon is situated on the Grand Rapids & Indiana R. R., twenty-one miles south of Kalamazoo. Teams will meet all trains on Thursday, at Mendon, to convey passengers to the place of meeting. Friends coming any other day will please inform the undersigned on which day and train they expect to arrive. Strangers coming by teams may enquire for the writer. Able speakers are expected to be present, and an earnest invitation is extended to all to attend and hear the truth. Each organized church in the state is specially requested to be represented by delegate at this meeting.

HERBERT S. MILLER, Sec.

The next conference of the Church of God in Northern Illinois will be held June 16-17, at Silver Creek School house, Ogle Co. Persons desiring to attend by rail, will, on the Chicago & Iowa road, get off and report at Oregon to L. W. Page or Elias Middlekauff, who will convey them to the place; and those coming on the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul road, will get off at Leaf River and report to Wm. Knodle who will convey them. A general invitation is extended.

To the Friends of "The Restitution."

The cost of publishing THE RESTITUTION for the year just closed exceeded the receipts over $360. To repay this deficiency and secure means to publish the paper another year, we must raise, outside the regular subscription, at least $500. To secure that amount, the Board of Directors have requested me to appeal to each subscriber to contribute at least one dollar extra. This is not asked as a donation, but brethren are requested to send names of persons to whom they wish the paper sent, with their contributions and the paper will be sent to such persons in payment for the amounts sent by each.

There are a large number of brethren and sisters in different localities who are unable to pay for the paper, and who would be very glad of the privilege of reading it. These are known to Brother Chaplin, the Editor. I would suggest that brethren who have no one to whom they especially desire to send the paper, send their contributions to THE RESTITUTION office with a request that the paper be sent to some worthy Christian who will appreciate it, but who is unable to pay for it. In this way brethren will be able to gladden the hearts of many poor but honest good Christians, and at the same time help to furnish the means to keep the paper going.

The fund will be known as "Free Will Offerings." Let each reader of THE RESTITUTION make a small sacrifice, and contribute at least one dollar, always remembering that the many persons to whom the paper will be thus sent will thank and bless you, and your Heavenly Father will reward you.

H. E. DWIGGINS, President.

THE JAW-BONE OF AN ASS.

So much that is not only unscholarly and untrue, but contemptible in the light of any candid search after truth, is said and paraded with much bombast and show of erudition on the part of so-called "Hebraists," that I would fain slay some of this bombast and show of erudition with Sampson's jaw-bone of an ass, and I choose this weapon because of its typical import. My readers will recall the circumstances which led up to the final catastrophe, namely the slaughter of the thousand Philistines with this humble instrument in the hands of the servant of the Lord. Sampson, you will remember had proposed a fair and square "jaw" with them or warfare of words and they had taken an unfair advantage of him and "ploughed with his heifer" and it seems to me nothing more than fair and square retributive justice that they should have been slain with "the jaw-bone of an ass." Now as a rule defenders of the King James or Common Version (Hebraists dernier ressort Hebraists usually) as a substantially correct translation, when confounded by having its countless blunders brought into the light of the truth by a tolerably lucid translation from the Greek of the Old Covenant Scriptures (I am now speaking of the Old only remember, the New has spoken for itself of late) invariably flee to the Hebrew with its unsolved mysteries of grammatical structure and say with pitying condescension if you only understood Hebrew you would understand it as we do, ignoring the fact that the best Hebrew scholars of today have not yet got out of the alphabet and are still squabbling over the probable use of the vowel-points, whether Seloh is the same word as Shiloh, and showing by their translations that they have not yet mastered the difference which exists to most reasoning minds between a present, past and future tense; and moreover in what they say of the age and priority of the Hebrew, ignoring the still more important fact that so far as textual manuscripts of the Scriptures are concerned, the Greek is older than the Hebrew by several centuries, and so far as authority is concerned, that the adoption and use and unquestioned sanction of the Greek by Christ and the Apostles is also indisputable.

I might say moreover, and history and scholarship would bear me out in the statement, that the Massoritic fragments (or the Massora) which have served as the basis (with laborious corrections and emanations from the Greek, Latin, Coptic and other versions) for the present Hebrew text, had their origin in a revival of Hebrew letters on the part of the very sect in the old Hebrew Church who crucified our Lord and who were confounded and put to rout in shame by such men as Peter and Paul and James and John, who showed them out of their own Scriptures of the Greek that he whom they had crucified was the very Christ of Prophecy. But I forbear further comment on these points as the history of them is too well known at least to scholars, to delay us further, and will proceed without further ceremony, in a common-sense way, to let Sampson, as our judge, swing that Jaw-bone of an ass over the devoted heads of those Philistine "Hebraists." Now please open your King James version at the 15th chapter of Judges and beginning with the last clause of the 18th verse, compare word for word with the following translation from the Greek (a literal one).

"And they bound him with two new small cords, and brought him up from that rock.

14. And came as far as Siagon (this word means a jaw-bone). And the Philistines raised the shout of triumph, and ran to meet him. And a spirit of the Lord laid hold upon him: and the small cords upon his arms became as if were tow that hath been consumed with fire; and his bonds gave way from off his hands;

15. And he found a jaw-bone of an ass that had been flung away, and he stretched forth his hand and took it, and smote with it a thousand men.

16. And Sampson said with a jaw-bone of an ass I have wiped them out, because in "The Jaw-bone of the Ass" I have smitten a thousand men.

17. And it came to pass, when he had ceased speaking, and had cast the jaw-bone out of his hand, he even called that place "An Undertaking of a Jaw-bone" (συσχεσις σιαγονος).

18. And he was very thirsty and he cried unto the Lord and said, Thou hast granted the satisfaction of this great salvation at the hand of thy Lord-servant, and now shall I die with thirst and fall at the hand of these uncircumcised?

19. And God rent open the well that was in Siagon (Jaw-bone) and there came out of it water, and he drank, and his breath returned and he lived. Therefore the name of it (that is the fountain) which is in Siagon (Jaw-bone) unto this day hath been called "The Fountain of Him Who Invoked."

20. And he judged Israel during the days of the Philistines (lit. other tribes, these Hebraists belong to these tribes) twenty years."

I have given this exposition as I have already said, because of its typical import. "Heaps upon heaps" have been slain by the incredulity which naturally attaches itself to the stupid blunders of the translation in the Common Version of this and many other passages, the verity of which as God's Word "many ignorant of the wisdom of God, but going about to establish their own wisdom" are even in the light of this nineteenth century insisting upon with a "Verily, verily, thus saith the Lord."

Many a saint I am confident will sleep easier when he comes to know that "the hollow place" that God "clave" was not in a literal jaw-bone of an ass, but in a rock in a place called that place "An Undertaking of a Jaw-bone" (συσχεσις σιαγονος).

18. And he was very thirsty and he cried unto the Lord and said, Thou hast granted the satisfaction of this great salvation at the hand of thy Lord-servant, and now shall I die with thirst and fall at the hand of these uncircumcised?

19. And God rent open the well that was in Siagon (Jaw-bone) and there came out of it water, and he drank, and his breath returned and he lived. Therefore the name of it (that is the fountain) which is in Siagon (Jaw-bone) unto this day hath been called "The Fountain of Him Who Invoked."

20. And he judged Israel during the days of the Philistines (lit. other tribes, these Hebraists belong to these tribes) twenty years."

I have given this exposition as I have already said, because of its typical import. "Heaps upon heaps" have been slain by the incredulity which naturally attaches itself to the stupid blunders of the translation in the Common Version of this and many other passages, the verity of which as God's Word "many ignorant of the wisdom of God, but going about to establish their own wisdom" are even in the light of this nineteenth century insisting upon with a "Verily, verily, thus saith the Lord."

Many a saint I am confident will sleep easier when he comes to know that "the hollow place" that God "clave" was not in a literal jaw-bone of an ass, but in a rock in a place called "Jaw-bone" for some reason unexplained in the text. Then I have no doubt that it will be a relief to many a good "mother in Israel" to know that En-hak-kore in the 19th verse has a meaning which the ordinary intellect can apprehend, viz.: "The Fountain of Him Who Invoked." Moreover many a small boy who has broken his jaw in vainly undertaking to get "Ramath Lehi" into his head by the way of his mouth, will laugh for joy when he comes to take in by the way of his intellect the stupendous fact that he had all this time been attempting the "Undertaking of a Jaw-bone" and that too of an ass.

But as I said at the outset, I have chosen this subject for exegesis because of its typical import. Let us therefore now with all reverence and sobriety consider Samson as a typical character and the typical import of this incident in his life as a judge.

And 1st, Samson is a type of Christ the Judge of all people, as a judge.

2. He is a type of Christ as the strong man or the Mighty One of Israel, "who divides the spoil with the strong." A man, but endued with a strength not human; this endowment from on high conditioned on the observance of a vow of separation and sanctification, and withdrawn when the vow was violated, and followed by weakness and blindness.

3. He is a type of Christ in that all his valiant exploits have as their inspiring motive love. Love impels him to enter the gates and the city of his enemies. The snares of death encompass him and the gates of expectant death are closed upon him as they did upon the Christ; but dawn (resurrection) rose him rise triumphant and rears off upon his shoulders the very gates which his enemies supposed insured his death: in one case, the type, we have the gates of Gaza, in the other, the reality, the gates of Hades.

4. That which initiates and leads up to the final catastrophe of his own death and the death of his enemies is the bad faith and apostasy of his bride elect, who becomes the theory of a mystery or a wise saying or a parable or a problem (αινιγμα) which he propounds to his enemies under a forfeiture penalty. The parable is the old problem of life and happiness from out death and corruption, "If a man die shall he live again." The honey was taken out of the mouth, not the "carcass," of the dead lion. We are offered the sweet boon of life from the mouth of the dead "Lion of the Tribe of Judah." But the offer is an enigma to the natural man and if it remains an enigma to him he forfeits fine linen and a change of garments (righteousness) στολας ισατας priestly and royal robes which he might have received and he pays the penalty of such an endowment as he already has, a change or loss of his carnal clothing of flesh and self-righteousness "walks naked" or as the text puts it, 30 of coarse linen and a change of garments, the 30 being the average number of years man can wear his coarse self righteousness of flesh, and the change in this case being the natural process which nature completes once every seven years.

Again love induced Samson to give up the secret of his superhuman ability, and expose himself to be shorn of his "seven-locked" endowment from on high, shorn of strength and glory, not of life mark. His strength, glory and the "light of his eyes" he resigns for human love. His life he resigns for God, righteous judgment and the welfare of his royal people whose judge he is and who tried to betray him into the hands of his enemies. And remember what his righteous judgment brought down upon his devoted head. A temple of idolatry and false worship, the rulers and oppressors of God's people, the rich but not rich toward God, the mockers and triflers with sacred things, and the makers and lovers of a lie, and above all remember that the first false step that led to the final catastrophe was the bad faith or the apostasy of Samson's bride elect which is a type of Christ's church or body. Christ has revealed and expounded the "mystery of the gospel" to his church. "To you it is given to know, etc." Has she been faithful to her trust? Remember Samson's αινιγμα or enigma was "What that is suitable for food hath come out of (the mouth of) the eater (εξ εσθοντος), and what that is sweet (out of the mouth of) from the strong?" And remember Christ's instruction, "Man liveth not upon bread alone, but upon every word that goeth its way out of the mouth of God."

The reader will understand, I think, that any strictures in which I may have indulged by way of criticism to further the truth, in this article, are not aimed at true Hebrew scholarship or scholars, but at ignorance, insincerity, duplicity, bombast and pretension, in a word at the superfilious claims of so-called learning.

Our learned brother Weethee has given us recently a specimen of the awkward foundorings of the "Hebraists" in what he says of the different renderings of a certain passage in "Jacob's blessing," namely a specific and unequivocal prophecy concerning the Messiah. Now it seems to me a rational conclusion of common sense that the Hebrew elders who translated that passage from the Hebrew into the Greek two or three hundred years before the coming of Christ and who understood and spoke and wrote both languages knew what they were about and they translated that word "Shiloh" by the Greek words τα αποκειμενα, a participial construction, or in other words a participle used substantively and meaning "the reserves" or "the things laid away in store or reserve," or still more literally "the things which are being laid away in reserve." The word in Joshua xviii. 1 is "Seloo" as the translators have made it, and is the name of a place.

The whole passage in Jacob's blessing referred to above reads as follows, and in the light of the New Covenant scheme of gold instead of stubble receive a reward beside the gift that is common to both classes, viz.: the life of the age.

"A ruler from out Judah will not fail (be wanting) and a leader from out his thighs (natural generation and ways of action on the part of this leader referred to thus) until the things laid away in reserve for him (Judah or Christ) shall have come, and he (Christ) is an expectation of nations."

Thus it is made evident that the parable of the vineyard, teaching an identical reward to all the laborers, can only be consistently applied to the subjects in the kingdom, and not to the reward which the saints of this age will receive.

Two saints who jointly reign with Christ will ever rank higher than the angels; but the future-age saints may be placed in the same rank with the angels—on this particular issue Scripture seems to be silent. In the nature of the case royalty could not be bestowed on subjects in the millennium, nor does a promise to this intent ever appear.

THE KINGDOM—A HIDDEN TREASURE.

Again our Savior said, "The kingdom of heaven is like unto a treasure hidden in the field: which a man found and hid; and in his joy he goeth and selleth all that he hath, and buyeth that field." Matt. xiii. 44.

This fairly reflects the experience of the saints who discover the fact that Christ has promised a kingdom to us, in which we shall reign, and in which with our Lord we shall bless all nations. The kingdom is indeed a hidden treasure—hidden from the wise and prudent and revealed unto babes. "Hearken, my beloved brethren: did not God choose them that are poor as to the world to be rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom."

They who have left the beaten pathway of apostacy, and thus been compelled to relinquish the friendship of old associates, of relatives, and even of family, have tasted the joy of finding this treasure—the happiness of becoming joint heirs with Christ to the kingdom—and enjoyment which wisely impells the sacrifice of worldly ambition, wealth, and kindred attachments, that the new relationship with Jesus may be firmly cemented; they also experience the bitterness of the cup, but divine consolation sustains the pilgrim while he hears the Master say, "Fear not, little flock, for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom."

THE TEN VIRGINS.

The futile attempts to find consistent reflections of every feature of this parable should caution us that its details were never intended to typify a long series of correspondencies. It clearly portrays circumstances connected with a primordial event embraced in the term "kingdom of heaven"—the translation.

Three parallels may be distinctly recognized: 1. The Bridegroom's coming portrays Christ's advent; 2. The sleeping virgins, the waiting church; 3. The midnight cry, a divinely commissioned herald, distinct from the virgins.

In this discourse Christ had prophesied with respect to his second coming, stating what events would precede it. He intimates that there will be holy persons waiting for his coming, as well as evil persons who say in their heart, "My Lord tarrieth;" thus he makes known to us that at the time of his advent there will be holy and unholy, wise and foolish persons who confess that he will come, and claim him as their Lord.

That this parable is not now historic is very evident, yet one of its features may be a present fact, if it be true that this generation will witness the glorious advent, i. e., the present watching church may be that prefigured by the sleeping virgins; and this we trust is the actual case. The true church has been in the same attitude as the sleeping virgins since Christ went to heaven, but that element of the parable can only apply to that part of the church who survive till his return.

It is true that in different centuries there have been injudicious announcements of the coming of Christ, but these "movements" can by no means be made the counterpart of the parable, because, first, Christ did not actually come; and second, the presumed virgins were not sleeping, but made their own "midnight cry."

THE MIDNIGHT CRY.

In the parable it is said of the ten virgins — "they all slumbered and slept," and since these sleepers represent the whole waiting church, and are all aroused by the messenger's cry, it follows that the midnight cry could not be the voice of the church, but a voice to the church.

Had the parable stated that nine of the virgins slept while one remained awake to watch for the Bridegroom's coming, and announce it to the others, then there would be a positive evidence that the preaching of the Lord's coming by a portion of the church would constitute the midnight cry—but this, we see, is not the case.

The sleeping of all the ten virgins till the herald announces the Bridegroom, being, in the parable, a proper position, cannot be construed to typify an improper attitude of the church. If this construction is insisted upon, since the true church is the parallel of the ten virgins, it follows that the true church is not faithful and true—a self-answering argument. The case might have been different had a contrast been drawn between awake and sleeping persons; and indeed this illustration is used for this purpose in another Scripture.

THE WISE AND FOOLISH.

If, as it is devoutly believed, we are living in the generation when our Savior certainly will come, then, at least, those who profess to be waiting for his advent are prefigured by the ten virgins, and may be divided, as experience teaches, into wise and foolish—though this division need not of necessity be half and half.

The wise are holy, humble, devoted and good; the foolish are the contrary in heart, though outwardly they may not always be discerned. Both have taken the Word of God as a lamp unto their feet, and while waiting for Christ its light of prophecy has brightened their pathway.

One class, studious of the truth, becoful continually "unto prophecy," obedient to all the precepts of their divine Master, have their lamps continually brightly burning, and, through the favor of God, have their vessels filled with oil through the knowledge of prophecy, and faithful regard for their Lord's instruction.

The other class, careless of their devotions, embroiled in the attractions of the world, neglectful of the prophetic Word to which at first they were attached, carry no oil in their vessels, and, when the divinely sent messenger announces the coming of Christ, they find their lamps "going out," and are unable to replenish their faith before the translation is past. A sad situation indeed.

"I WILL SEND YOU ELIJAH."

Soon, we trust, the midnight cry will be made by the appointed messenger: "Behold the Bridegroom! Come ye forth to meet him!" Since this announcement cannot be from the sleeping virgins, (and surely it cannot be the voice of the ungodly) we are shut up to the conclusion that the person who makes this announcement to the church is sent from heaven with the glad message. Who is this messenger? Let the prophetic Word answer: "Behold I will send you Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and notable day of the Lord" Mal. iv. 5.

The prevalent, but false, idea that John the Baptist was the Elijah referred to in Mal. iv. must be dismissed by every consistent literalist. John himself fairly said he was not Elijah (John i. 21), and it is unkind to make him out a story-teller by misconstruing some other texts.

It was eminently proper that Christ's first advent should be announced by John in fulfillment of prophecy; and it is eminently necessary that Christ's second coming should be heralded by Elijah the ancient prophet of Israel, in accordance with that Word which has never and can never be broken. "Truly Elijah shall first come" before the Lord's day and kingdom, and his message parallels the midnight cry of the parable. For this purpose he was translated.

The two witnesses who precede the coming of Christ by 3½ years of testimony, are, by circumstantial evidence, indicated to be Elijah and John the revelator; but were this proof insufficient, yet Elijah must come prior to the advent, as a herald of the King; and if his identity with one of the witnesses is not conceded, the consequence is that three prophets will testify during a few years prior to the translation instead of two; and even if Elijah was omitted from the scheme, still the testimony of the two unknown prophets would faithfully fulfil the midnight cry of the parable, and thus avoid the incongruity of making the sleeping virgins awaken themselves by a somnambulent cry.

THE TRIBULATION.

Christ's advent being thus heralded by a miraculously empowered and divinely sent messenger, the church of God is marvelously sustained in their expectation and hope. Since for a few years prior to the advent the man-of-sin is in the meridian of his power, and his Satanic deceptions are exercising great influence while his royal edicts are resulting in great persecution to the saints, manifestly it is an eminently appropriate time for God to provide a living, powerful witness to the truth of the second coming of Christ, who will, for a short period be a herald of the coming King.

Such a messenger the parable of the ten virgins evidently portrays by the person who utters the midnight cry; and if correspondence to the midnight is demanded, let it be known that Christ's coming takes place in the midst of the darkest hour of trial that the church has ever experienced—in fact his appearance puts a term to the persecution.

GENERAL RECAPITULATION.

We have thus examined every parable which is directly stated to illustrate the kingdom of heaven, and have found that each of them may consistently be applied to some feature of the future kingdom of Christ, but, in no case, appropriately to the gospel or Gentile dispensation.

The "Ten Virgins" teach that a divinely commissioned herald will announce the immediate coming of Christ and but a part of the professed church will be translated into the kingdom. The "Net," that the kingdom comprises both good and bad. The "Mustard Seed," that the royalty of the Abrahamic seed shall bless all nations through the kingdom rule. The "Talents," that the saints shall rule; and the "Pounds," that the extent of their jurisdiction depends upon present faithfulness. The "Marriage Feast," that just prior to the instalation of the royalty over the nations, a number of rebellious people will perish. The "Tares," that until the end of the kingdom some evil persons will survive. The "Vineyard," that the saved of the millennial kingdom all receive the same reward. The "Unmerciful Servant," that forgiveness is a law of the kingdom. The "Leaven," that the general character of the age will become righteous. The "Treasure" and "Pearl," that the royalty of the kingdom is a prize worthy of every sacrifice. The "Nobleman," that the kingdom will be instituted at the return of Christ from heaven.

"As in Adam All Die, Even so in Christ Shall All be Made Alive.
1 Cor. xv. 22.

The word "in" is used to express a variety of revelations.—Webster. Here it is used in two relations; one to Adam and death, and second to Christ and the resurrection.

No one doubts this relation to Adam the first, for we are his dying descendants; and no one can rationally doubt that "in Christ" teaches a contrasted relation, quite as distinct and determinate, both with regard to Christ himself and the resurrection, of which the apostle is speaking in this chapter.

By request I write: Please note,

1. That "in" is used twenty times in this chapter: vs. 1, 17, 19, 22, 31, 41, 49, 58. Read, "In your sins, in grace, in Christ, in this life, in his own order, in glory, etc., all unmistakably plain.

2. Our natural state, as "in Adam", it is written "without Christ, having no hope and without God in the world." Eph. ii. 12.

Again, the Christian destiny is written, "with Christ," which is "glory, honor and immortality." Rom. ii. 7–10; Phil. i. 23.

Thus without Christ, in Christ, and with him proves there is no ground left for doubt as to the meaning of "in Christ" as contra-distinguished from "in Adam." It teaches a new saving relation to Christ and resurrection.

Hence the absolute relation of man to "death" is universal; and so comprehensive of the human race (excepting Enoch and Elijah—which may be as if in anticipation of those "who shall be alive and remain at the last trump." 1 Thess. iv. 16–18; and vs. 49–57 of this chapter).

In confirmation of this fundamental truth we daily use the word with a like precision and particularity. "In poverty, in sickness, in health, in pain, in sorrow, in nakedness, in labor, in hope," and thus in thousands of instances, and no mistake.

If such proof fails, then three or four columns, or an entire broadside of THE RESTITUTION would fail—perhaps of even a reading. Some, however, seem to think that quantity is the standard of quality—a signal mistake, as to any possibility of usefulness.

Plymouth, Indiana, June 6, 1883.

Four articles have of necessity been deferred.

Br. Woodward of Michigan gave us encouragement that he would try to attend our Antioch meeting. His labors in that State have been attended with signal success. We also expect Br. R. S. Dwiggins from Rensselaer and others. That God's blessing may attend our contemplated meeting is our earnest prayer.

Attended the Michigan State Conference near Mendon, but have only time and room to say that the meeting was one of an enjoyable and interesting character, during which we had the privilege of forming the personal acquaintance of many brethren and sisters with whom we here met for the first time. The fuller particulars are deferred to the Secretary's Report and a future number.

From Mr. Edward White, London, we have just received two works of which he is the author. The first contains four lectures under the general title: "Genesis the Third: History not Fable," and the second is entitled: "Church Life in London." From the special headings of the four lectures on Genesis, as well as from the ability and literary reputation of the author, we feel fully persuaded that we shall have something both instructive and interesting to place before our readers in future numbers of our paper, from these lectures; especially as the Pentateuch has become the subject of so much criticism and controversy in our times.

Excursion Rates to the Chicago Railway Exposition.

For the benefit of our brethren and the general public who may desire to visit Chicago, we say that the National Exposition of Railway Appliances is now in progress in that city, and that the Pennsylvania Company will sell excursion tickets to Chicago and return from principal stations on Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne & Chicago Ry., Meadville Ry., and North Western Ohio Ry., Thursday and Friday of each week until the close of the Exposition June 23d 1883, at rate of one fare for the round trip. Tickets good to return until Monday inclusive following date of sale.

Communications.

FROM JERUSALEM.

United States Consulate, Jerusalem, Syria, May 3 '83.

Dear Mr. Chaplin:

Your note of March 27 is at hand and your request has been attended to. We know Mrs. Davis very well and are deeply interested in her welfare. I shall be glad to be of service to yourself or to her at any time. The season of pilgrims has just passed and we estimate that there have been about 15,000 Mohammedans and 8,000 Christian pilgrims in the city during the season. All these of course came from abroad, or from a distance, very many coming from central and western Asia. I remain yours sincerely,

Selah Merrill.

Jerusalem, May 3, 1883.

This is Ascension Day and all have gone to the Mt. of Olives for a holiday as usual. Last week was celebrated by the arrival and departure of Prince Alexander of Bulgaria; he was pleased with his visit. Also there has arrived a Mr. Winterstien from Omaha. Mr. W. is a Christian Jew and and in full sympathy with the cause for which we are laboring. He will write for The Restitution and I think you will be pleased to receive his communication. He was strongely and miraculously moved upon to leave America and return to the home of his fathers. He has been persecuted for his faith and has left all for the hope of Israel. I shall share with him all that I possess and esteem it a blessed privilege. He is a man of extraordinary ability and has come for work, and I feel that God has surely sent him and his dear wife to assist me in my labors which are growing too heavy for my strength. I see that his eye is ever upon his children and when we are ready, to faint his arm is near to uphold. How long and earnestly I have prayed for some one to help me and I thought God did not regard my prayer. Mr. W. wrote to me asking many questions and said he thought of coming to Jerusalem but did not know when. The next post brought a card from him saying that he with his wife and child had started for "the City." Two days following the card he appeared at my door. I assure you I was astonished. But I can see plainly the hand of God in all this.

Dr. Wardell, from London, has established a hospital here for the poor. It will be devoted especially to diseases of the eye and ear. The ruler has presented him with a building and spacious grounds for use. The location is very fine. Your letters have all been received with money up to March 26. I shall send flowers as you wish soon; I will do the best I can, as I always do. I did mean to write an account of the Greek Fire which I witnessed last Saturday but must defer it till next week.

The weather is very fine but rather dry for the season. Mr. Goldsmith the Jewish agent in London has been here looking after the interests of the Jewish colonists. Mr. Freelander, who is at the head of the Jewish Christian Mission has gone to London to solicit aid for refugees. The interest is daily and hourly increasing. Men are now proud to say I am a Jew or I belong to Judah. It is truly sublime to witness the "signs of the times." A man said to me yesterday. "Mrs. Davis I can remember when a Jew did not dare to go outside the walls after nightfall and scarcely during the day," but said he "now the Jews live outside and the scales have turned and fear of the Jews has fallen upon men." And said he, "We have only to walk through the city on the Jewish Sabbath and observe the number of shops that are closed and it is easy to tell who holds the mercantile power here."

An order came last week prohibiting the use of foreign money, and what is the result; they say if your poor Sultan has plenty of gold we will pledge ourselves to take your gold, but you have none and we know it, therefore we refuse to submit to your decree. In fact they treat it as absurd and sheer nonsense. Well we shall see what will come of it. One thing we are sure of, when God commences his work it cannot fail. I have been quite sick for several days and I have a very unsteady hand; can scarcely write legibly. I hope you will soon receive better communications than I am able to give you; the spirit is willing but the flesh is very weak. My plan is to help Brother Winterstien by my flower onus while he gives you the news. Please excuse this badly written letter this time. In haste and trial.

Yours in hope,

A. E. Davis.

BRITISH PLANE OF THE EASTERN QUESTION.—No. 20.

Prelude—What became of Jeremiah after the fall of Jerusalem?—In Egypt.—Was he in Spain?—Did he visit Ireland?—Where did he die? Ten-tribed kingdom in captivity.—The broken link of the historic chain welded.—Are the ten tribes identical with the Saxons—Historical chain traced link by link, and closely scrutinized.

Prelude.—What became of Jeremiah after the fall of Jerusalem? This question can not be very readily answered. What did the Scriptures afford us? Jeremiah was, it seems, the prince of prophets. So wonderful a seer as David was simply his pupil, when David applied himself attentively to the investigation of Jeremiah's predictions.

Thus speaks Jehovah: "Before I formed thee in the belly I knew thee; and before thou camest forth from the womb I sanctified thee, (and), behold I cannot speak: for I (am)...a child. But the Lord said unto me, Say not I am a child: for thou shalt go to all that I shall send thee, and whatsoever I command thee thou shalt speak. Be not afraid of their faces: for I (am) with thee to deliver thee, saith the Lord. Then the Lord put forth his hand and touched my mouth. And the Lord said unto me, Behold, I have put my words in thy mouth. See, I have this day set thee over the nations and over the kingdoms, to root out, and to pull down, and to destroy, and to throw down, to build and to plant."

Such was the vastness of the power of Jeremiah's commission. That commission he fearlessly executed, and suffered the severe penalties of such fidelity. His messages against the Jews brought upon him the wrath of his own nation, who treated him with terrible severity. When Jerusalem fell, Jeremiah had his liberty. Nebuchadnezzar's charge concerning Jeremiah was, "Take him, and look well to him, and do him no harm; but do unto him even as he shall say unto thee." They sent and took Jeremiah out of the court of the prison, and committed him unto Gedaliah, the son of Ahikam, the son of Shaphan, that he should carry him home; so he dwelt among the people." Jer. xxxix. 12, 15.

The captain of the guard said to Jeremiah, "And now, behold, I loose thee this day from the chains which (were) upon thy hand. If it seem evil unto thee to come with me into Babylon, come; and I will look well unto thee, but if it seem ill unto thee to come with me into Babylon, forbear; behold, all the land (is) before thee; whither it seemeth good and convenient for thee to go, thither go." Jer. xl. 4. Jeremiah's unbounded patriotism decided him to share the disgrace of his own country, and to remain there with its distressed poor. Gedaliah, the governor appointed by the Chaldeans, under whose charge were Jeremiah, Baruch and Zedekiah's daughters slain by Ishmael, who carried away captive the residue of the people that (were) in Mizpah, (even) the king's daughters, and all the people, (Jeremiah and Baruch his scribe included), towards the country of the Ammonites. Johanan overthrew Ishmael, and, recovering the captives, fled towards Egypt, for fear of the Chaldeans. Since Ishmael had slain their governor, God, by the mouth of Jeremiah, promised the people protection, provided they remained in Judea; warned them not to enter Egypt, but said he "now the Jews live outside and the scales have turned and fear of the Jews has fallen upon men." And said he, "We have only to walk through the city on the Jewish Sabbath and observe the number of shops that are closed and it is easy to tell who holds the mercantile power here."

An order came last week prohibiting the use of foreign money, and what is the result; they say if your poor Sultan has plenty of gold we will pledge ourselves to take your gold, but you have none and we know it, therefore we refuse to submit to your decree. In fact they treat it as absurd and sheer nonsense. Well we shall see what will come of it. One thing we are sure of, when God commences his work it cannot fail. I have been quite sick for several days and I have a very unsteady hand; can scarcely write legibly. I hope you will soon receive better communications than I am able to give you; the spirit is willing but the flesh is very weak. My plan is to help Brother Winterstien by my flower onus while he gives you the news. Please excuse this badly written letter this time. In haste and trial.

BELSHAZZAR'S FEAST.

At the feast of Belshazzar
And a thousand of his Lords,
While they drank from golden vessels,
Which the Book of truth records,
There the night as they revoked
In the royal palace hall,
They were struck with consternation—
'Twas the hand upon the wall.

Chor.—'Tis the hand of God on the wall,
'Tis the hand of God on the wall,
Shall the record be found wanting,
Or shall we be found trusting,
While that hand is writing on the wall.

But the brave captain Daniel
As he stood before the throne,
And rebuked the wicked monarch
For his mighty deeds of wrong,
As he read out the writing,
'Twas the doom of one and all,
For the kingdom was to divide—
Read the hand upon the wall.

See the faith, zeal and courage,
That would dare to do the right;
Which the spirit gave to Daniel,
'Twas the secret of his might.
In his house in Judea,
Or a captive in the hall,
He understood the writing
Of the God upon the wall.

So our deeds are recorded,—
There's a hand that's writing now.
Sinners give your lives to Jesus,
To his royal mandate bow,
For the day is approaching,
It must come to one and all,
When the sinner's condemnation
Will be written on the wall.

[DEAR EDITOR:—I know not the author of the above piece; but was 5 years (brother Gould's article of the hand writing on the wall) I thought the above piece would be of interest to some. I learned it from my old friend and Brother, J. S. Hatch. Your brother in Christ, S. T. Hook.]

THE COMING KINGDOM.

And the seventh Angel sounded, and there were great voices in heaven saying, The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and his Christ, and he shall reign forever and ever. Rev. xi. 15.

This is a great event, no less than the overturning of the power and the dominion of human apostacy and the transfer of the royalty and the diadem of the earth to him whose right it is to reign, and of whose dominion there shall be no end.

The relations of this great event to the future destiny of men, and to all our present efforts to spread throughout the world the knowledge of the gospel by which he is to be saved, are immediately apparent. To a consideration of some great facts and principles connected with it, I shall here mention.

1. The kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ. They are not so now. They are not only not identical, they are completely separate and opposed. They have no other relations than those which are possible between opposing elements commingling upon the same area of manifestations, occasionally, severally conquering, and severally overcome, and awaiting, in this changing process of development, the final adjudication of their contest, and the conclusive settlement of the victory.

The governments or kingdoms of this world are but the organized dominion of human apostacy from God. They have ruled under the four distinct aspects of Paganism, Mohammedanism, Popery, and Infidelity, but always in opposition to our Lord and his Christ. The will and the word of God have never yet been adopted by men as the rule of earthly authority.

Noah looked upon the world as corrupt before God. Abraham, Moses, and Daniel beheld it, in their successive ages, as still wholly apostate. Seven hundred years after the last of these, St. John declared it was everywhere still lying in the wicked one. Eighteen hundred years later we survey a field vastly more extended, but maintaining the same universal characteristics, and we are, in our turn, compelled to proclaim that the governments of this world are still everywhere apostate from God and his Christ. His word is, indeed, more or less tolerated as the possession of individuals, as his providence restrains and overrules the hostility of men.

His glorious revelation of redeeming love, so dear and precious to the hearts of his believing children, is permitted in more or less public profession; is sometimes, indeed, protected, in its civil aspect, as the chosen and valued property and right of individual men. But not one government of the earth, great or small, is a Christian government. Not one nation professes to reverence the authority of the Lord of hosts. And one or another of the shapes of human apostacy, already mentioned, is everywhere still the garb and symbol, the rule and type of the government of men.

We easily trace the origin and course of human apostacy as God has himself described to us. Its combination of individuals, its organization as a combination, make up a painful part of the historic record of the Scriptures. Near three thousand years before the Savior's coming was the first earthly kingdom established. Three other great empires have since succeeded it, occupying the same theatre, ruling on the same field, and marked by the same characteristics. The rebellion against God, which engendered its dominion on the plain of Shinar, has filled the veins of human ambition, stimulated the lusts of human conquest, and sounded the triumphant shout, "Who is Jehovah that we should serve him?" in every succeeding generation, and on every successively cultivated soil to our day.

Britain and America, as nations, no more really adopt the Divine authority as the rule of government, than did Babylon or Persia. The production of God's revealed Word as the rule to be adopted for the government of men; the reverent assertion that his law should be the only line of human dominion; the position assumed that human society should be organized and governed for the purpose of spreading his truth, and giving knowledge of his salvation, was far less scorned when Jonah proclaimed its principle in Nineveh, or when Daniel announced its authority in Babylon, than it would be now in the Parliament of Great Britain or in the Congress of the United States.

The apostacy of man, then, ruled upon the plea of open idolatry, with all its earnestness, if with all its crimes. The same apostacy now rules on the more offensive and scornful ground of absolute infidelity, professedly ignoring all religions; conceding that one God, or a hundred gods, must be acknowledged and protected alike, if man shall so please; avowing that the present world is its wholly lawful object, and human government has no end beyond the protection of man while he is in it, and in the enjoyment of the material benefits which it presents. Thus God, in his authority, is banished from his own earth, and the kingdoms of this world are, in their absolute profession, not the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ.

From the midst of this apostacy of man God selected a line of grace, a family for himself, a people over whom he would rule, and by whom he would have his authority acknowledged, and his name glorified. We may trace this line of grace from Adam downwards. Like a silver stream meandering in stillness through the plains of the earth, often concealed by the showy verdure along its banks, and yet marked by the very verdure which itself has created, it springs over from the gate of a Paradise lost, whose cherubim were stationed, the symbol of a reconciled and reconciling God. It wanders, and grows as it wanders. Yet, in all the early ages of its course, this fifth stream, if I may call it so, seems comparatively small when contrasted with the four heads of human rebellion into which the river of original Eden has been divided. Countless millions make up the apostacy from God.

The Savior's flock is still a little one on the earth. This selected demonstration of the divine government among men is clearly marked as we come down to Noah, to Abraham, to Moses, to the time of the Savior's advent in the flesh. Its subjects are the sons of God, the people of God, the election of grace, the church, the assembly of the living God. To them the promises were given, the revelations were made, the prophecies were uttered, and among them, in its various appointed methods of manifestation, the divine presence was established and maintained. They were God's property, and God's people in the midst of an unbelieving world. From Jacob's time this line of grace was in his family peculiarly—perhaps alone. Whatever there was of true religion, of the knowledge of God on the earth, was found among them. As a nation they were organized professedly on divine authority. Every nation outside of Israel was but a part of the organized apostacy from God. And though all Israel were not of the true Israel, yet among them was the covenant of God, the adoption of his children, the giving of his promises, and the remnant according to the election of grace. In the very organizing of Israel as a people God had said to them, "If ye will obey my voice indeed, and keep my covenant, then ye shall be a peculiar treasure to me above all people, and ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests, and a holy nation." They were constituted the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ, abiding for centuries in the earth, a visible kingdom, separate from the kingdoms of this world, and opposed to them in all the principles of their organization, and in the source and the whole arrangement of the authority by which they were governed. They stood in the earth, the witness for God—they only, chosen from all the nations of the earth, to know his will, and to receive his laws. The Lord their God was their king.

2. Thus we have the two subjective parts of the great contrast before us, and we may trace their separate but parallel courses. The kingdoms of this world," in the triumphant annunciation of the apocalypse before us, is a technical expression. It describes the actual dynasties of human government, the powers of the present world, but it describes them in a special relation to previous Scriptural testimony. It is the proclamation of the actual fulfillment of a divine prediction long before recorded for the encouragement and hope of the Church of God. The Prophet Daniel was appointed to record this complete history of the governments of this outer world in the seventh century, before the Savior's advent. He interpreted the great symbol of the metallic image, which Medes calls "the great almanac," and Faber "the great calendar" of prophecy, as a divine history of four successive kingdoms which were to arise in this world of apostacy, to constitute the whole course of government, and the grand outline which its passing ages should fill up as they proceeded. The fourth of these kingdoms should close its individual history in a series of divisions, which should never again coalesce in one empire under one earthly head. "But in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed—a kingdom which shall not be left to other people, but shall break in pieces, and consume all these kingdoms, and shall stand forever."

Fifty years later the same great facts in the history of the world were revealed to the same prophet under another and very different shape of illustration. In the first exhibition the four successive kingdoms of this world were displayed as the parts of an image in human form, "whose brightness was excellent, and the form thereof terrible." Its head of gold, its breast and arms of silver, its belly and thighs of brass, its legs of iron, and its feet part of iron and part of clay, were declared to be the illustrations and symbols of these four successive monarchies, as they should arise and manifest themselves in their appointed place, and then pass, in their turn, away. In the second view of the same facts these four monarchies were represented as four wild beasts, of different form and character, coming up from the stormy sea, accomplishing their designated mission upon the earth, and each, in his turn, destroying the one which had preceded him, the last one destroyed by a new and divine kingdom which should succeed it, to the ruler of which should be given "dominion and glory, and a kingdom that all people, and nations, and languages, should serve him. His dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed." These four monarchies were to make up the history of man's apostacy. Their succession should include the whole course of earthly government. They should succeed each other upon the same field of manifestation, each absorbing into itself all that had preceded it. They should thus succeed in connection with each other, joined as the separate but connected links of a majestic chain, and depending upon this connection for the transmission and inheritance of the power and dominion which they exercised; and these four are the kingdoms of this world, whose dominion is to be superseded and absorbed at last by the kingdom of our Lord and his Christ.

Four such empires of human origin, ruling in apostacy from God, have thus, in a perfect and precise parallel with the prophecy, made up the history of the government of men. They have successively controlled the whole historic world, connected with each other, absorbing each other, transferring the people, the lands, and the dominion of the earth from one dynasty to another, in a succession of masters who, having each in turn fulfilled his appointed course, have left the field to the appointed successors to themselves. The fourth empire, in its final divided state, still remains, comprising the present actual condition of civilized men, and waiting for the sounding of that trumpet which shall proclaim with a heavenly voice, "the kingdoms of this world are become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ, and he shall reign forever and ever."

"We see not yet all things put under him. But we see Jesus, who was made a little lower than the angels for the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honor." And we wait, until having received the kingdom, he shall return to reign forever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end.

Sixteen hundred years before the time of Daniel, the first great empire of man's apostacy arose, which culminated as the head of gold in Nebuchadnezzar. During Daniel's life, Cyrus overthrew the first kingdom, and established the second, "the Persian, the breast of silver in its place." Within three hundred years afterwards, Alexander took the City of Babylon, overthrew the empire of Persia, and set up the Grecian, "the thighs of brass," over the same nations, and upon the same field. In three hundred years more, Augustus established, as "the legs of iron," the empire of Rome, which grasped within its bounds all the territories and all the nations that had known and yielded to the previous dominions.

These have made the four kingdoms of this world. A fifth, to reconstruct and combine again the divided elements of the last, and once more to set up a universal earthly throne, has been the bait of ambition to many of the mighty ones of earth since. But then the completed record still remains, and the fifth monarchy is yet to be revealed.

This appointed succession made the prophetic almanac of Scripture. And in this succession human testimony has been remarkably confirmed. The famous astronomer, Ptolemy, who lived 140 years after Christ, seven hundred and forty years after Daniel, constructed a chronology of the reigns before his time. And his continuous arrangement is the same as Daniel's. He describes a succession of four great monarchies as reigning over the same empire, making the Persian Cyrus the immediate successor of Belshazzar; the Grecian Alexander the successor of Darius; the Roman Augustus the successor of Cleopatra, as in the same line, and in a continuous dominion, with no reference to their previous government in their separate states. It is an unbroken line from Nebuchadnezzar to Augustus Cæsar. This, Daniel said, 2500 years ago, should be the fact of human history. This, Ptolemy says, had been the fact, as recorded in his day. The prophet and the astronomer combine to give the history of an unbroken imperial rule, under four successive dynasties, as the history of the government of men.

A very remarkable modern history brings the record much further down. Le Sage, the friend of Napoleon, while with him in St. Helena, drew up, for their mutual employment, a series of charts of history. He delineated the empires of this world, and their subdivisions, on his charts, by separate colors. But with no consciousness of the value of his testimony. Like Daniel, he divides the history of the world into four empires, and marks them by the same successive names. The Greek into four, and then into two parts; the Roman into two, and then into ten. Neither Ptolemy nor Le Sage, probably, knew nor thought of Daniel. Yet they have followed with the record of historic testimony, the one 745 years, and the other 2450 years after him, precisely in the track of his prophetic statement. Daniel said to his royal master in Babylon, "there are to be four successive kingdoms in this world." Le Sage, 2460 years after, said to his imperial master in St. Helena, who had vainly attempted to recombine a fifth, "there have been four great empires of the East successively ruling;" and he traces the line from Nebuchadnezzar to Napoleon.

These are the kingdoms of this world. They have made an unbroken line of succession, in complete identity, so that Rome is properly called Babylon, as inheriting the same dominion of apostacy, in a different age. The empire is one running through different dynasties, with different languages. The Empire of Rome commenced with Babylon. The Empire of Babylon concludes, and is completed by Rome. And, therefore, when St. John calls Rome "Babylon the great," "the mother of harlots," and "abominations of the earth," it is not in a merely figurative, but in a real application of the epithet.

Babylon was the origin of this idolatrous and infidel apostacy in human government, to which Rome has succeeded, and which Rome perpetuates. A remarkable fact, in this connection, is the complete adoption, by the Pope, of the royal dress of the ancient kings of Babylon, worn nowhere else upon the earth. Strabo and Herodotus both describe the ancient garb. The ring upon the finger; the slipper on the foot, the toe of which tributary kings bowed down to kiss; the white tunic, or cassock, hanging down to the feet; the large white cloak upon the shoulders; the high, round cap, with pendent fillets, which it was death for any other to wear; the attendants clothed in scarlet, with chains of gold about the neck. Who that has ever seen this self-styled, universal monarch at his public festivals, has not beheld the description exactly, like Nebuchadnezzar raised again from the dead? His tiara; the inscribable cap of royalty in Babylon; his long, white tunic, his white satin cloak, embroidered with golden stars; his cardinals preceding, clothed from head to foot in scarlet, beneath a scarlet canopy, with attendants in scarlet, waving fans of peacock's feathers in their hands. Who that has intelligently seen this, has not been struck with this amazing assumption of identity? Yes, Rome is Babylon, and the fourth kingdom of the world, in its divided and mingled state, claims and bears a complete identity with the first.

There is a general, nay, almost universal, anticipation of some great event which is shortly to transpire. All see some majestic foreshadowings before them. As in ancient days, when in the wilderness of Judea, John proclaimed the approach of the Kingdom of God, so now "all await expectation," looking for and hasting unto the coming of some great event.

The anticipations of ages seem culminating here, and resting upon something just in the future. What shall it be? Some say a converted world; but this is contrary to the appearances, analogy, Scripture, reason, fact, and the universal faith of the Church, for more than 1400 years.

The infidel, the spiritist or necromancer, the politician, and the sage, all talk of coming good; but as to what, and when, and how it shall come, they are in Egyptian darkness.

We have seen from the sacred Word of the external Jehovah what is to come—"the Anointed of God," "the Redeemer" of the world; him of whom Israel's prophets and Christ's apostles prophesied to make restitution of all things, and whom heathen sages have dimly foreseen. Inspiring hopes, on which sick humanity hath stayed its fainting soul in the ages of gloom which are past. And never could their hopes rest upon the triumphs of humanity or the success of principles, until they grasped the idea of a Coming and Divine One, who should redeem man, and restore harmony to the world; one who should fulfil that primal prediction delivered in Eden, "and thou bruise the serpent's head," or, in other words, he shall return to the earth to make restitution of all things.

And can it be that this hope shall fail? Is there no element of truth in that world-wide anticipation of a coming day-spring from on high? Have all nations thought, and hoped, trusted and sighed in vain?

Nay, verily. The Word of God has illuminated, and defined, and shed lustre on the dim and shadowy hopes of past ages.

God has spoken, and he will make it good. Even so, come quickly Lord Jesus. Amen. — S. Bonhomme, in Prophetic Times and Watchtower.

The Little Bird.

A little bird with feathers brown
Sat singing on a tree—
The song was very soft and low,
But sweet as it could be.

And all the people passing by
Looked up to see the bird
That made the sweetest melody
That ever they had heard.

But all the bright eyes looked in vain,
For birdie was so small;
And with a modest dark-brown coat,
He made no show at all.

"Why, papa," little Gracie said,
"Where can this birdie be?
If I could sing a song like that,
I'd sit where folks could see."

"I hope my little girl will learn
A lesson from that bird,
And try to do what good she can,
Not to be seen or heard.

This birdie is content to sit
Unnoticed by the way,
And sweetly sing his Maker's praise
From dawn to close of day.

So live, my child, all through your life,
That be it short or long,
Though others may forget your looks,
They'll not forget your song."

The Little Arab Girl.

At the time of the massacre in Syria in 1860, very many women and children fled to Beirut for safety. The mothers especially suffered very much from hunger, as they gave what little food they could get to their children. Among other Arab women who escaped from Hasbeiya was a native Christian, who not only loved herself, but taught her little girl Miriam the prayer our Savior gave us. One night Miriam who was only three years old, being very hungry, kneeled down beside her mother and began to say, "Our Father." She went on till she came to "Give us this day our daily bread; and please do dear Jesus, give us bread and olives, enough for mother and me to." Was her prayer answered? Yes, God sent them food, and made her sing for joy. There was "enough for mother and me too."

A Queen's Example.

We are fond of imitating the examples of queens and princesses in many ways, some of which by virtue of their positions are allowable for them, but are unwise and unnecessary for the majority of uncrowned women. Are we as ready to follow their more excellent and sensible examples?

But surely, queen's and princesses are not seen walking out, like plebeians some one will say! That is where you are mistaken. The queen who holds the highest position of any woman in the world upon whose kingdom the sun never sets understands thoroughly that vigorous, out-of-door exercise, such as is not derived from sitting in a close and cushioned carriage, must be otherwise secured, does not send a message in the morning to the Royal Mews for the grand state carriage and blooded steeds to be before the palace gate at such an hour, to give Her Majesty her morning exercise, but instead, at ten o'clock in the morning or before that time, sometimes alone, and often with one of the princesses, arrayed in a substantial short dress and stout shoes, Queen Victoria starts out for a two hours' walk.

Over the country roads and through the fields, with lively steps and an air of abounding health, enjoying nature and physical existence in a way that home-bound women know nothing of, England's Queen sets a notable example to her subjects and sisters everywhere. She stops occasionally in her walk to visit some humble cottage or speak an encouraging word to some poor peasant. A portion of the afternoon she occupies in official work and generally sets out about five o'clock for a drive of two hours. An American lady in London, writing privately to a friend, thus describes the appearance of Queen Victoria whom she saw recently at a garden party. "She was looking very young in her simple black dress and bonnet, her fine teeth and large blue eyes as striking as twenty years ago when the writer was first presented to her."

We do not hesitate to assert that this daily exercise in the open air has done much toward the maintenance of Victoria's fresh and youthful appearance, and her vigorous health. In these busy days, when the song of almost every woman is, "So much to do," and when nearly all of us have a worn and weary look, let us reflect for a moment on the subject, and see if it is not possible for us to imitate the example of the Queen, and claim and enjoy each day a larger amount of the vitalizing oxygen of which many of us take far too small a share.

"Who'll Wake Me."

A little girl in San Francisco was recently run over by a street car. When removed, it was found that one of her limbs was nearly severed from the body, besides other serious injuries. She was carried to the hospital, and the disjointed member taken off. The little girl bore the operation remarkably well. As there appeared to be very little chance for her recovery, the surgeons concluded to let the other limb, also badly damaged, remain. The mother was with the child immediately and did for her all that a mother could do. The little one was under the influence of anodynes most of the time, and of course slept a great deal. The day following the accident, as she was dropping off, she exclaimed, "I'm going to sleep." Then noticing the temporary absence of her mother, she added, "but who'll wake me." It turned out to be her last sleep—a sleep that will finally look in its embrace all the living.

The query of the child was a natural one. On a broad sense, it is the one great question of life. Upon the return of the dawn, we go about our daily duties and pleasures until it is time to retire. We shut our eyes to sleep with no anxiety but what they will open when we have had the needed rest. This is confidence, we have tried the experiment, and it never failed; therefore we believe when resigning our lives to sleep that we shall wake again. But at the close of life's fitful fever, when we feel that the sleep of death may be stealing over us, we want to know whether we shall ever wake, who it is that will wake us, and where we will be, and what will be our condition when we awake. Thousands have reached that point in their history, when they would give all the world, if they had it to give, to have these queries satisfactorily answered.

This is purely a matter of faith. None of us have had any ocular demonstration that there is another world. From all we can see, our journey leads directly to the grave, and the life that we now live apparently ends there. With some of us the distance to the grave is not long. With all, it becomes shorter with every sun. A man's days are threescore years and ten, but the average is not half that. Life is often said to be a mystery, and so it is. The only certainties about it are that it has a beginning and an end. We know that we exist and we know that we shall cease to exist. We have made graves for others, and we often visit them in kind remembrance of the one gone before. Where our grave will be, we know not, but the place and date of occupation are fixed, and every beat of the pulse is a step to the locality and hour.

"Who'll wake me?" We can descend into the dark and cold ground with resignation, if we are assured that some one will wake us. Everybody has a trace of this faith—life would be intolerable if we were not permitted to entertain it. Better that the belief should be a delusion, than that it should not exist. It helps to soften many of the rugged places of this life to believe that a better one awaits us. It eases many a pain, dries many a tear, lightens many burdens, illumines many a dark passage, to know that there is a world where there are no pains, "or tears," or burdens. Take away that belief, and unselfish motives and heroic deeds vanish. We are worse than the beasts that perish. For my part, I must believe that the fabric of human life was constructed for some nobler end than can be possibly wrought out in the brief period of existence between the cradle and the grave. Any other view implies a great waste of wisdom, energy, and material. The little girl's query has been answered: We shall all awake from our last sleep, "some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt." How will you awake?—Bene-Berak.

Sewaren's Meeting.

According to arrangement Brother Arnold came on Friday. The meeting commenced with a fair audience and increased to the close. Saturday at 10:30 Brother T. E. Adams of Jefferson Co., and Brother W. Finn of Topeka came. The time was then spent in short speeches from the brethren and sisters, strengthening and building each other up in our most Holy Faith. The preaching was then divided between the Brethren. The house being used for a school house we meet Monday at Brother Small's. Spent several hours in Bible class, the resurrection being the subject. Tuesday met at my house, the Lord's Supper being the subject of investigation as to design and importance. It was evident in the investigation that we had all learned from the same Book. In all, the meeting was one of the best ever held here; and I will say here for the benefit of congregations that have not made the acquaintance of Brother Arnold, he is a workman that you need not be ashamed of, and his conversation as becometh saints. Brother Finn is an old man with fair ability, kind and pleasant, with a deep earnestness, which commends him to the household of faith. While the Master tarries we expect to have those brethren visit us often. Visitors, Brethren Adams, Finn, Moyer, Buckles and Pierson, and Sister Williams and husband of St. Joseph, Mo. Yours in hope,

J. T. BITNER.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

ADVENT HYMN.

O King, of kings, thou Lord of all,
Whose righteous rule in love is known!
When will thou list thy people's call,
And here on earth erect thy throne?

Our hearts believe thy promise, Lord;
We glad expectant toward the sky;
We read with joy the unfailing Word,
Trusting the longed-for day is nigh.

The church on earth waits thy return;
Their sad discussions then shall cease.
And all who name thy name shall learn
To live and serve in love and peace.

The nations still refuse thy sway,
And faithless kings in council meet:
Thy coming haste; thy might display,
And bring them subject to thy feet.

The groaning earth repeats her sighs,
Waiting release from sin's embrace;
And upward toward the silent skies
She turns an eager suppliant's face.

We plead thy sure prophetic word,
Lifting our heart in prayer to thee;
Let now the herald cry be heard;
Let us thy advent glory see.

In glorious majesty descend,
Thy rightful power on earth possess,
The reign of sin and sorrow end,
Begin the reign of righteousness.

O quickly come! Let earth behold,
Her sovereign Lord with glory crowned!
O bring the day so long foretold,
Let us thy advent praises sound!

WILL THE EARTH BE BURNED?

A brother requests me to write an answer to this query, in order to throw some Scriptural light upon 2 Peter iii. 7–13. I do so with some diffidence, because I know that my views conflict with those of many worthy writers for the columns of THE RESTITUTION. Still I think that I have both reason and Scripture to support my opinions on this subject, and submit the following remarks for the consideration of the reader. Should any one think I am in error, and can give a better and more Scriptural exegesis of this difficult text, I shall feel thankful, and hope to be instructed thereby.

Those who advocate the literal burning of the earth, are not all agreed as to the time when the great conflagration will take place. Some think it will occur at the second coming of Christ, when he comes to judge the world—to give reward to his saints, and punish the wicked; and others say it will not take place till the close of the millennial era. The first opinion cannot be correct, because the fire would destroy the very nations which Jehovah has given to his Son for an inheritance, and over whom he will reign as the seed of Abraham and David in order to save and bless them. And the second opinion, that the baptism of fire will happen at the close of the day of Christ, seems incompatible with the idea that the millennial heavens and earth, the future abode of Christ and the saints, should be thus destroyed.

Besides, both these opinions collide with the plain and positive statements of God's Word which tells us that "the earth abideth forever," Eccl. i. 4; that God "has established the earth, and it abideth," Psa. cxix. 90; that "God himself formed the earth and made it; he hath established it, he created it not in vain, he formed it to be inhabited," Isa. xlv. 18. And although once on account of man's wickedness, God, in his wrath, brought in a flood of waters upon the world of the ungodly, yet he promised, saying, "I will not again curse the ground any more for man's sake; for the imagination of man's heart is evil from his youth; neither will I again smite any more every living thing as I have. While the earth remaineth, seed time and harvest, and cold and heat, and summer and winter, and day and night shall not cease." Gen. viii. 21, 22. If the earth is to be literally deluged with fire, will not this promise be broken?—the ground will be cursed again for man's sake, and every living thing will be smitten and die.

It is not wise to read or interpret the Bible so as to contradict itself. The sacred writings are set forth as "the Word of truth," and "the Scriptures of truth," and therefore they must be consistent with themselves. Peter could not contravene the prophetic word, to which he invites attention in these words — "I stir up your pure minds by way of remembrance, that ye may be mindful of the words which were spoken before by the holy prophets." 2 Pet. iii. 1, 2. Let the heavens be dissolved by fire and pass away with a great noise, and the elements melt with fervent heat, and the earth also and the works that are therein be burned up, in a literal sense, as many earnestly contend for, then how can many, very many predictions be fulfilled? And not only predictions but also promises which God has made to his people? God's word cannot fail; he says, "it shall not return unto me void, but it shall accomplish that which I please." Isa. lv. 2. For instance,—whether this conflagration occurs before the millennial era or at its close, how can Israel become a strong nation, and inherit the land forever, as Isaiah predicted? chap. lx. 21, 22. Again, whom planted in their own land, they are to be pulled up no more, Amos ix. 15; and Judah shall dwell therein for ever, and Jerusalem from generation to generation. Joel iii. 20. The kingdom and throne of David is to be established for ever, Psa. lx. 6, 7; and when the Son of David, and Son of God, shall sit on David's throne, the promise and prediction is, that "he shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end." Luke i. 33. Jerusalem and Zion will be the seat of government; the Redeemer will come to Zion, and the Lord will choose Jerusalem again; "sing and rejoice, O daughter of Zion; for lo, I come, and I will dwell in the midst of thee, saith the Lord." Zech. ii. 10, 12. The Psalmist also says, "The Lord hath chosen Zion; he hath desired it for his habitation. This is my rest for ever: here will I dwell; for I have desired it." Psa. cxxxii. 13, 14. Jerusalem will then be called the city of the Great King, and the throne of the Lord: and all the nations will be gathered unto it. They will come to worship the King, the Lord of hosts; he will teach them of his ways, and they will walk in his paths; and all the ends of the earth shall see the salvation of our God. Jehovah's promise to Abraham, and his oath to Moses, must and will be verified, when all nations will be blessed under the government of Messiah, and the earth shall be filled with the glory of God. Num. xiv. 21. Jesus is coming to bless the nations, not to curse them and their habitation — he is coming to save the people, and not to destroy them and their dwelling place. True, he will destroy them that destroy the earth, and break in pieces the oppressor, Rev. xi. 18; Psa. lxxii. 4; and a day of vengeance will come upon the wicked,—a day that shall burn as an oven, and all the proud, yea, and all that do wickedly, shall be stubble; Isa. lxi. 2; Mal. iv. 1; but the meek shall inherit the earth; the poor and needy will be cared for, and their blood shall be precious in his sight, Psa. xxxvii. 9, 11, 29; lxxii. 12–14; and the nations shall be blessed in him, and shall call him blessed.

The query now arises, how must Peter's language be understood? I answer, as we understand similar phraseology used by the prophets. The same Spirit inspired Peter which inspired them; he was of the same nation, spoke the same language, was writing to his own countrymen, and therefore it is not strange that he should use similar bold metaphors to set forth the fate of his nation and country. Peter was a Jew, and writing to believing Jews, only a few years before the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans. I understand him to be describing in bold imagery the passing away of the Mosaic order of things, and the judgment of the ungodly nation who lived under it. In accordance with Bible usage, and prophetic language, heavens represent government, and earth the people governed; and world (translated from οικος, kosmos) generally means, constitution, order, or arrangement of things. The connection in which these words are found will usually determine whether a literal or figurative signification is to be attached to them.

In order to show that it may be wrong to understand Peter to be foretelling the literal passing away of the heavens, and the burning up of the earth, I refer the reader to the prophet Isaiah's description of the destruction of Babylon, as given in chap. xiii., of his prophecies. The prophet says, verse 9, "Behold, the day of the Lord cometh, cruel both with wrath and fierce anger, to lay the land (of Babylon) desolate; and he shall destroy the sinners thereof out of it. For the stars of heaven and the constellations thereof shall not give their light; the sun shall be darkened in his going forth, and the moon shall not cause her light to shine .... Therefore I will shake the heavens, and the earth shall remove out of her place, in the wrath of the Lord of hosts, and in the day of his fierce anger." The literal heavens and earth, with the sun, moon, and stars are only used as symbols, and their removal and darkening indicated the subjugation and blotting out of Babylon and its kingdom. It would be simply absurd to adopt the literal sense, as nothing of that kind could possibly have occurred.

Isaiah also predicts the destruction of Idom in highly figurative language. See chapter xxxiv. The mountains are represented as being melted with the slain, "and all the host of heaven shall be dissolved, and the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll; and all their host shall fall down, as the leaf falleth off from the vine, and as a falling fig from the fig-tree." "It is the day of the Lord's vengeance, and the year of recompences for the controversy of Zion. And the streams thereof shall be turned into pitch, and the dust thereof into brimstone, and the land thereof shall become burning pitch. It shall not be quenched night nor day; the smoke thereof shall go up for ever," etc. These are the symbols of a complete and utter destruction which came upon Idom and the land of Idumea; but the literal fulfilment has no place in history. The Lord also said of it by Jeremiah in plain language, "Bozrah shall become a desolation, a reproach, a waste, and a curse; and all the cities thereof shall be perpetual wastes." Jer. xlix. 13.

Ezekiel prophesying concerning Pharaoh and Egypt, says, the word of the Lord came unto me, saying, "When I shall put thee out, I will cover the heaven, and make the stars thereof dark; I will cover the sun with a cloud, and the moon shall not give her light. All the bright lights of heaven will I make dark over thee, and set darkness upon thy land, saith the Lord God." Ezek. xxxii. 7, 8. Also in chap. xxx. 8, 10, he speaks of setting a fire in Egypt, and destroying all her helpers.

Jeremiah prophesied to the men of Judah and Jerusalem about the Babylonish captivity — "Destruction upon destruction is cried; for the whole land is spoiled:....I beheld the earth, and lo, it was without form, and void; and the heavens, and they had no light. I beheld the mountains and, lo, they trembled, and all the hills moved lightly. I beheld, and lo, there was no man, and all the birds of the heaven were fled. I behold, and lo, the fruitful place was a wilderness, and all the cities thereof were broken down at the presence of the Lord, and by his fierce anger. For thus hath the Lord said, The whole land shall be desolate; yet will I not make a full end. For this shall the earth mourn, and the heavens above be black," etc. Jer. iv. 20, 23–28. Isaiah also uses similar language when referring to the same event. "Behold, the Lord maketh the earth empty, and maketh it waste, and turneth it upside down, and scattereth abroad the inhabitants thereof." Isa. xxiv. 1.

The foregoing quotations will suffice to show that it is not proper to affix a literal interpretation to such prophecies. Then what shall we say of Peter's prophecy? Does it refer to the future, or has it had a fulfilment in the past? Does it refer to the Jews or to the Gentiles? To the closing scenes of Judah's commonwealth, or the end of Gentile times? My opinion is, that we shall find its fulfilment in the destruction of Jerusalem and the dispersion of her people.

Jesus foretold this destruction as recorded in Luke xxi. 22–24—"For these be the days of vengeance, that all things that are written may be fulfilled." "For there shall be great distress in the land, and wrath upon this people. And they shall fall by the edge of the sword, and shall be led away captive into all nations; and Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." Again, he says, as given in Mark xiii. 24, 25, "But in those days, after that tribulation, the sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars of heaven shall fall, and the powers that are in heaven shall be shaken." On the day of Pentecost Peter quoted as follows from Joel's prophesy, "And I will show wonders in heaven above, and signs in the earth beneath; blood, and fire, and vapor of smoke: the sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before that great and notable day of the Lord come." This was quoted in connection with the prophecy about the pouring out of the Spirit, which had then a present fulfilment, but which will not receive a full accomplishment until the times of restitution. So the signs here spoken of as taking place in the heavens and the earth, occurred in that generation, when Zion's sun and moon were darkened, and her stars withdrew their shining. The time had come for the Mosaic order of things to come to an end. The One like unto Moses, yet far greater than he, had come—the Seed of Abraham, the Seed of David, the Son of God. He had proved himself to be the Messiah by the miracles he performed in the midst of his people, and God his Father endorsed that claim by raising him from the dead on the third day after his rejection and crucifixion by the Jews. The nation said in words and deeds "we will not have this man to reign over us" — "we have no king but Cæsar." And when Pilate said to the multitude who demanded the crucifixion of Jesus, "I am innocent of the blood of this just person; see ye to it;" they took the responsibility upon themselves, and said, "His blood be on us, and on our children." The apostle Peter said that if they would not hear this great Prophet who had been raised up amongst them, that they should be destroyed from among the people. And when the Sanhedrim saw that the doctrine of the apostles was rapidly spreading they began to fear and said, you "intend to bring this man's blood upon us." Paul also said of the Jews, that they "both killed the Lord Jesus, and their own prophets, and have persecuted us; and they please not God, and are contrary to all men; forbidding us to speak unto the Gentiles that they might be saved, to fill up their sins always; for the wrath is coming upon them to the uttermost." 1 Thess. ii. 15, 16.

In this way they "treasured up wrath against the day of wrath and revelation of the righteous judgment of God." They were as Jehovah said by Moses, "a very froward generation, children in whom is no faith." Therefore he declares what he will do to them—"I will move them to jealousy with those who are not a people; I will provoke them to anger with a foolish nation. For a fire is kindled in mine anger, and shall burn unto the lowest hell, and shall consume the earth with her encrease and set on fire the foundations of the mountains....They shall be burnt with hunger, and devoured with burning heat, and with bitter destruction." Deut. xxxii. 20–24. This prophecy received its fulfilment when the Romans came against them, and took away both their place and nation. Wrath then came upon them to the uttermost, because of the righteous blood they had shed upon the earth—for they killed the prophets who foretold the coming of the Just One, of whom they had now been the betrayers and murderers.

Thus the Mosaic constitution of things passed away, and the Jewish heavens being on fire were dissolved, and its elements melted with fervent heat. This was the day of the Lord, and the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men.

Zephaniah calls it "the great day of the Lord"—"a day of wrath, a day of trouble and distress, a day of wasteness and desolation, a day of darkness and gloominess, a day of clouds and thick darkness"—"the day of the Lord's sacrifice;" when he would consume all things from off the land, both man and beast, the fowls of the heaven, and the fishes of the sea. Zeph. i. 14, 15, 8, 2, 3. "Behold, the day cometh, that shall burn as an oven; and all the proud, yea, and all that do wickedly, shall be stubble; and the day that cometh shall burn them up, saith the Lord of hosts, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch." Mal. iv. 1. And did not John the Baptist tell the Jews that even then the axe was laid to the root of the trees, ready for use? "Therefore," says he, every tree which bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down, and cast into the fire." And he also told them of One mightier than himself, who should baptize them with the Holy Spirit, and with fire; "whose fan is in his hand, and he will thoroughly purge his floor, and gather his wheat into his garner; but he will burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire." Matt. iii. 10–12.

The subjugation and demolition of Gentile kingdoms at the close of Gentile times are set forth also by the rolling together of the heavens as a scroll, the darkening of the sun and moon, and the falling of the stars. See Rev. vi. 12–17. Those heavens are shaken and removed, while those things which cannot be shaken remain, viz., — that kingdom which cannot be moved, but which becomes a great mountain and fills the whole earth. Hab. xii. 27, 28; Dan. ii. 35.

Let the foregoing citations from the Word of the Lord suffice to show, that what is called Peter's burning day, cannot be literally interpreted, and do justice to the prophetic word. And this becomes further apparent, when we consider the new heavens and new earth, to which Peter refers in chap. iii. 13. "Nevertheless, we, according to his promise, look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness." That promise is found in Isa. lxv. 17,—"Behold, I create new heavens and a new earth, and the former shall not be remembered, nor come into mind. But be ye glad and rejoice for ever in that which I create; for, behold, I create Jerusalem a rejoicing, and her people a joy." The context shows that a literal creation of heavens and earth is not spoken of. It is rather the new order of things established by Messiah and his saints when he shall set up again the tabernacle, throne and kingdom of David. Of him Jehovah said, "I have put my words in thy mouth, and I have covered thee in the shadow of mine hand, that I may plant the heavens, and lay the foundations of the earth, and say unto Zion, thou art my people," Isa. li. 16. This is the work the Father has given the Son to accomplish. He was given "for a covenant of the people, to establish the earth, to cause to inherit the desolate heritages." Isa. xlix. 8. There are no new heavens and earth spoken of by the prophets, except there to be planted and established by the Redeemer when he comes to Zion. John says, "He that sat upon the throne said, behold, I make all things new." Rev. xxi. 5. He is placed at the head as ruler over all—the head of the new creation—that in all things he may have the pre-eminence. He will be the Light of Israel then. To Zion it is said, "Arise, shine; for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee....And the Gentiles shall come to thy light, and kings to the brightness of thy rising." Again, of her it is said, "Thy sun shall no more go down; neither shall thy moon withdraw itself; for the Lord shall be thine everlasting Light, and the days of thy mourning shall be ended." Isa. lx. 1–3, 20.

More might be said, but let me close by asking the reader to compare what I have written, and culled from the Scriptures, with the crude and contradictory statements of world-burners, and judge what is the truth on this subject.

ORIENTAL SKETCHES.—Second Series. Number 14.

THE BATTLE-FIELDS OF GIDEON, AI, AND MICHMASH.

"I wandered on to many a shrine,
By faith or history made divine;
And then I visited each place
Where valor's deeds had left a trace."

The stars were still trembling in the sky when, from the top of our little tower, we heard the impatient horses champing their bits beneath. We were soon in the saddle, and dashing down the rocky side of Olivet. It was a dewy morn in the end of September, and the air was fresh and balmy. Gethsemane and the Kidron were in deep gloom; but the first fleecy clouds of autumn, high overhead, had already caught the ruddy rays of the coming sun. A death-like silence reigned in the Holy City as we rode past. Our path led through the olive-groves, and then across the great northern road, near those mounds of ashes which have of late created so much controversy. At a smart pace we traversed the rugged table-land at the head of the Kidron, noticing the tombs in the rocks on each side. The plain but chaste facade of the Sepulchre of the Judges drew our attention. Within its dark vaults are some seventy or eighty recesses for bodies; and here, it is said, the members of the Jewish Sanhedrim were laid in glory, "every one in his own house."

We had now reached the western brow of the table-land; and the deep glen of Wady Beit Hanina was at our feet, its banks formed into natural terraces by the horizontal strata. The whole scene was painfully desolate. Verdure there was none; — but grey crowns and grey cliffs protruding everywhere from the grey soil. In places the declivities seemed as if covered with white flags. The few old olives scattered singly or in groups along the glen can scarcely be said to relieve the uniform barenness; for they, too, look dusty and sapless; and the stunted trees and shrubs, clinging to the mountain-sides above, only make the features of nature more forbidding. There was a total want of color and variety of outline in the landscape. The dull uniform grey and the long bare declivities and rounded summits had nothing attractive in them. Most of the higher peaks are singularly formed. They rise in concentric rings of terraces, like steps of stairs, from bottom to top.

MIZPEH.

Away beyond the Wady towered Neby Samwil, the highest and most conspicuous peak in southern Palestine. Its conical top, crowned with village, mosque, and minaret, forms the only striking feature in the northern view from Jerusalem. To it we were now bound as the first point of interest in our tour. Diving down into the glen; and then clambering up through terraced vineyards, over rude fences, along rocky brakes,—startling flocks of partridges at almost every step—we gained the summit, and committed our panting steed to the care of a group of wild-looking boys who had been watching our approach from the walls of a ruined tower. The village sheikh was there to welcome us, conspicuous in his scarlet robe, which to this day, is the badge of royalty or power among the inhabitants of Palestine. Lam. iv. 5; Dan. v. 7; Matt. xxvii. 28). Several of his elders stood round him, whose outer garments in the brilliancy and variety of hue of their embroidery reminded me of Joseph's coat of many colors.

Taking the worthy chief into our service we requested him to lead the way to the top of the minaret. What a noble view was there! I had seen none to be compared with it among the mountains of Palestine. It is far more extensive than that from Olivet, or Gerizim, or any of the peaks around Hebron. Away on the western horizon slept the "Great Sea;" and from this and other commanding heights in Palestine I ... how natural it was for the ancient Israelite to style the world "sea" (yam), a synonym for "west," Gen. xxviii. 14; Psa. civ. 8. Along its glittering shore lay the plains of Sharon and Philistia, extending to the horizon on the north and south — the orange groves of Joppa looking like a shadow, and the towns of Ramleh, Lydda, and Ekron like points of brilliant light on the smooth grey surface. Nearer were the declivities of Judah's mountains, furrowed deep with many a ravine, and bristling with many a castle-like village and ruin. The broad summit of the ridge was a forest of hill-tops,—separated, here by a little upland plain, there by a deep, dark, winding glen. On the east the Jordan and its valley were hid behind the hills of Benjamin, but the chain of Moab and Gilead rose over them, — a vast wall of naure, built up against a golden sky, and streaked from base to summit with rich purple shadows. The mountain strongholds of Judah and Benjamin, renowned of yore in sacred story, or celebrated in sacred song, were grouped around me; — Gibeon on its "hill;" Beth-horon guarding the western pass (2 Chron. viii. 5); Beeroth and Bethel, and away beyond them the "rock Rimmon;" where the six hundred men, the shattered remnant of a guilty tribe, found an asylum (Judges xx. 45–48); Ramah of Benjamin crowning its "height" (1 Kings xv. 17); Gibeah of Saul, now a bare desolate "mound" (1 Sam. x. 26); Kirjath Jearim, perched on the side of "the hill," where the ark of the Lord remained so long in the house of Abinadab (1 Sam. vii. 1, 2); Bethlehem, overlooking the wilderness, where its shepherd warriors were trained to battle; and in the centre of the group, begirt with mountains (Psa. cxxv. 2), Jerusalem herself sat in queenly state. That was a panorama which, once seen, could never be forgotten. Time cannot deface the picture;—the mind must treasure up the stirring, hallowed memories with which every feature is associated. Probably this peak, from which the western pilgrim gets his earliest glimpse of the Holy City, was in Tasso's mind, when he thus described the effect of "that first far view" upon the Crusaders,—

"Lo, towered Jerusalem salutes the eyes!
A thousand pointing fingers tell the tale;
'Jerusalem!' a thousand voices cry,
Catch the glad sounds, and shout, 'Jerusalem,
All hail!'"

The mountain gets its modern name from an early tradition, which makes this village the site of Ramathaim-zophim,—the house and burial-place of the "prophet Samuel." Topography is against the tradition, but it seems to identify this spot as the Mizpeh,—"watch-tower" of Benjamin (Josh xviii. 26); the gathering-place of Israel, where the tribes assembled and bound themselves by an oath never to return to their homes till they had avenged on the inhabitants of Gibeah the rights of hospitality outraged by an abominable crime (Judges xx.); where Saul was chosen monarch, and where, for the first time, the hills of Palestine echoed back the loyal cry, "God save the king" (1 Sam. x. 17). It appears too that this is that very "high place of Gibeon" where Solomon offered a thousand burnt-offerings, and where the Lord in answer to his prayer, gave him the wisdom which made him a world's proverb. 1 Kings iii. 4–12. Something of sanctity has ever since clung to the spot. The Crusaders built a church on it; and now, within its shattered walls, the Muhammedans have a prayer-niche, and perform their devotions beside the traditional tomb of the great Jewish prophet.—J. L. Porter, A. M.

The Real Difficulty.

If it is impossible to harmonize the statements of Genesis with geology and astronomy as at present understood, it would be a waste of time for one to attempt to do it, but this fact I notice, which seems to me worth considering. The difficulty in reconciling the geologic with the Mosaic record so far as I have observed, is found by students of the Bible who know nothing practically of geology, and by the students of geology who are ignorant of the Bible, or hate its plain requirements, so that they wish to discredit the book for their own peace of mind. Devout men, eminent both as practical geologists and Bible students, like Hugh Miller, Principal Dawson and Professor Dana, do not seem to find any real difficulty in the case. If there are any two men living who are better able to give an opinion in this matter, I, for one, should be glad to go far to take lessons from them.—Prof. Chadbourne in Alliance.

He who travels with his eyes open, cannot fail to see that other people, as well as himself, have their discomforts and drawbacks, and he will, seeing this, be all the more disposed to meet the troubles and trials incident to this life with a brave and courageous spirit.

To the Friends of "The Restitution."

The cost of publishing THE RESTITUTION for the year just closed exceeded the receipts over $300. To repay this deficiency and secure means to publish the paper another year, we must raise, outside the regular subscription, at least $600. To secure that amount, the Board of Directors have requested me to appeal to each subscriber to contribute at least one dollar extra. This is not asked as a donation, but brethren are requested to send names of persons to whom they wish the paper sent, with their contributions and the paper will be sent to such persons in payment for the amounts sent by each.

There are a large number of brethren and sisters in different localities who are unable to pay for the paper, and who would be very glad of the privilege of reading it. These are known to Brother Chaplin, the Editor. I would suggest that brethren who have no one to whom they specially desire to send the paper, send their contributions to THE RESTITUTION office with a request that the paper be sent to some worthy Christian who will appreciate it, but who is unable to pay for it. In this way brethren will be able to gladden the hearts of many poor but honest good Christians, and at the same time help to furnish the means to keep the paper going.

The fund will be known as "Free Will Offerings." Let each reader of THE RESTITUTION make a small sacrifice, and contribute at least one dollar, always remembering that the many persons to whom the paper will be thus sent will thank and bless you, and your Heavenly Father will reward you.

The Restitution.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXII. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, JUNE 13, 1883. NO. 22.

THE RESTITUTION.

TERMS--TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR, Payable in Advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.

Address all Letters and Communications to THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, or conversion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

GENESIS THE THIRD: HISTORY NOT FABLE--Lecture I--Part I.

THE PLACE WHICH THE MOSAIC ACCOUNT OF THE CREATION AND FALL OF MAN OCCUPIES IN HOLY SCRIPTURE.

"As in Adam all die, so in Christ shall all be made alive." 1 Cor. xv. 22.

In the present course of lectures I shall offer a brief view of the argument in support of the historical character of the Mosaic account of the creation, and specially of the fall of man. The design is, perhaps, not untimely: for in some scientific circles, in which Christian faith has no place, this narrative is now regarded as one of many similar fables of the early world.—the truth being that there was no first man, and no fall of man, but a gradual rise from the animal level up to humanity, through the ages of an immeasurably distant past.

In other scientific and theological circles, where Christian faith still maintains its hold on revelation in general, the narrative is regarded as an allegory wholly destitute of historical reality, but setting forth in pictorial form the early struggles of man with the lower forces of nature, and the ascension of the spirit, through discipline and temptation, to the heights of faith in God. Among Christian believers of this class, it is now boldly affirmed that it is impossible to attach any historical value to the idea of the ruin of the world by the common ancestor of the race. In the language of a recent anonymous expositor of those views: "If the allegory of Eden is a divine presentation of certain perennial facts of human nature, which man's conscience asserts, and man's reason owns at this hour, then Paul's elaborate augmentation with his countrymen will have infinitely better ground to rest upon, than if he based it on the hypothesis, at which conscience stands aghast, and by which reason is utterly revolted, that because a miraculously talking reptile persuaded an inconceivably constituted woman, six thousand years ago, to eat an actual apple, men, women, and children, in the nineteenth century, are guilty and accursed in the sight of God."

I have thought that it might be a moderately useful contribution to the cause of Scriptural Christianity to show, in opposition to such methods of dealing with Holy Scripture, what may be fairly alleged in support of the Scripture, what may be fairly said in reply to the more common objections to its literal credibility. It is quite impossible that genuine science and a genuine revelation from God can directly contradict each other. It may be that a clearer understanding of all the facts will assist faith in the complete truth, and dissipate some of the difficulties which at present occasion a seeming discontention between the two.

Our general object will be to show first, the place which the narrative of Eden occupies in the Bible; secondly, assuming, on the strength of evidence to be briefly indicated that nothing is known, on a scientific basis of certainty, to compel disbelief in the recent origin of the existing human race,—to show that when the supernatural history of revelation is taken as a whole, and considered in its organic unity, there is nothing in this early narrative, not even the incident of the serpent tempter—inconsistent with its historical credibility; and lastly, the object will be to show that this narrative, itself, contains numerous marks of a truly divine solution of many mysteries of human life, both as to its origin and as to its destiny.

Our business in this lecture will be to clear the ground by showing the place which the narrative of the creation and fall of man occupies in the Bible. There can be no hesitation in affirming that the books of the Old Testament, and emphatically the books of the New Testament, with one consent, treat the narrative of the recent creation and fall of man as historical, and [illegible] they profess to record. [illegible] the assertion is frequently made that the earlier chapters of Genesis are manifestly symbolical, and demand no faith in their literality. But in the book of Genesis there are no signs of symbolism in the earlier portion. If there is a simple realistic style in ancient prose history anywhere, that style is found in the book of Genesis, from the beginning to the end. The story of Eden is told in as matter-of-fact a spirit as the travels of Abraham. A supernatural element appears, in each case, now and again throughout, but there is no variation in the historical tone which characterizes the narrative in all its parts. The circumstances related respecting the beginning, of man's life are, of course, wonderful, but the writer never soars into poetry. If he is recording a myth, he at least records it as if he believed it to be a truth. The account of the trial in Paradise passes on into the history of the antediluvians, without any break in the narrative. Seth, Cain, and Abel seem to be as real persons as Enoch or Methuselah, and their biographies are closely annexed to the narrative of the first man's loss of Paradise. The beginning of the useful and fine arts is given with no appearance of allegory, and belongs to a story which seems to be told as if true from its beginning. Indeed, one may say that no reader would have imagined that the author was writing fables in the earlier chapters of Genesis, unless moved thereto by an imagined necessity of saving the remainder of the Bible from rejection, through the supposed incompatibility of these chapters with science, if taken in their literal sense.

It is surely a great violence to criticism to represent the author or compiler of Genesis as distinguishing in his own mind between the allegorical quality of his earlier and later chapters. Whether true or not, most certainly he delivers them as if he believed them to be true, and true in their literal sense; the first chapter relating to a very recent action of God in refitting the earth, and in creating man and certain animals upon it; the second and third recounting the moral trial of the newly-made human beings in order to decide the question of eternal obedience to their Maker, with the result of loss of life through sin, and of the prospect of immortality. The narrative professes to account for the entrance of death into the human world, and this problem could not be solved by an allegory.

If the presence of direct divine action, asserted in this narration, is sufficient ground for rejecting its literality, consistency will require the rejection of the whole subsequent narrative of Scripture on the same ground. The story in Genesis is not more open to objection for this reason than any other parts of the Bible. The whole Bible, certainly may be a false record; but it is impossible to save or defend a long supernatural history simply by attempting to allegorize its earliest chapters. The narration recorded by Moses may not be true, but, at least, there is every sign that, whether original or traditionary, he believed it to be true. And the fact that such a man as Moses gave forth this narrative to the Hebrew people, after a forty years' education in all the lore of Egyptian schools, and a subsequent forty years of meditation upon it in the solitudes of Sinai, adds immense emphasis to this belief of his, which will be best appreciated by those who know how completely the story of Eden both agrees with, and differs from, the contemporary heathenish traditions of Memphis and Heliopolis.

Passing by the many references to Adam by name in the Old Testament, which are more frequent than appears in the English version, where "son of man" and "sons of men" stand almost everywhere for the Hebrew "son of Adam," "and sons of Adam," and passing by those frequent references in the Old Testament to "Eden," and the "garden of God," which indicate familiarity with the narrative in Genesis in the latest centuries of the Hebrew history, let us at once direct attention to the New Testament.

It is, I think, easy to show that, throughout its books, in the teaching both of Christ and the apostles, the narrative of Eden is not only taken for historic truth, but is made the basis of Christianity itself as a religion, of redemption. 1. In St. Matt. xix. 3-6, we find our Lord Jesus Christ establishing the sanctity of the marriage union for all mankind from the beginning of the world, and forbidding divorce, except for unfaithfulness, on the basis of the truth of the Mosaic account of the creation of Adam and Eve, and on the authority of the words said to be spoken on the occasion of that first marriage. "Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife for every cause? And he answered and said unto them, Have ye never read, that he which made them at the beginning made them male and female, and said, (that is, God said, quoting Gen. ii. 24,) For this cause shall a man leave his father and mother, and shall cleave unto his wife, and they twain shall be one flesh. Wherefore they are no more two, but one flesh. What, therefore, God has joined together, let no man put asunder." This is repeated in Mark x. 2-9. Christ's teaching surely is Christianity, or an important part of it, and he here most distinctly founds his own legislation in respect to indissolubleness of marriage, except for the cause of adultery, on the historical reality of the narrative in Genesis. If he took this part of the narrative as historical truth, it is certain that he did not look upon the remainder as allegory. If the story of Adam and Eve is a fable, and these persons had no real existence, then the alternative is, that Christ founds his law of marriage, one of the most important laws in any religion, on a fable which he mistook for a truth. And with that primary mistake his authority as a divine legislator falls altogether.

In St. John, viii. 44, our Lord again refers to the Edenic narrative, and supplies the explanation of the temptation by the serpent. Addressing the Pharisees he said, "Ye are of your father, the Devil, and the lusts of your father ye will do. He was a murderer from the beginning, and standeth not in the truth, because there is no truth in him." The word here translated "murderer" is not the ordinary [illegible], but the emphatic [illegible], man-killer; and it plainly indicates, in conjunction with the words "from the beginning," a reference, by our Lord, to the history of the introduction of death into the world by the falsehood of the serpent in "Paradise." The life of man, looking onward to eternal life by obedience of faith, was destroyed by the Devil. St John in his first Epistle, iii. 15, uses the same word to describe Cain who murdered Abel, [illegible], and "was out of (or a son of) that wicked one, because he slew his brother." Here again it is clear that Jesus partook the general belief in the historic reality of the narrative in Genesis. His beloved disciple says, "For this purpose was the Son of God manifested, to destroy the works of the Devil:" to undo the murderous work of the Serpent, by the gift of eternal life. But if Jesus Christ did not rightly understand, in fact, why they required to be saved, mistook an allegory for a history, and falsely imagined the action of an Adam, and of an Adversary, who had no real existence, what remains in his teaching to which it is possible to attach any real importance?

It will be requisite to carry the allegorizing process much further, and to convert the gospel history itself and all our Lord's teaching into a fabulous representation of truths which he himself did not understand, and which have nothing to do whatever with authentic history.

If next we pass from Christ to his biographers and apostles, we find St. Luke, in the genealogy of Jesus, placing "Adam, the son of God," at the summit of the table, evidently with as firm a persuasion of his real personality as of that of any of his successors. If we open the epistle to the Romans, we find St. Paul, the chief apostle of the gospel, in his chief doctrinal epistle, addressed to the chief church in Christendom, laying the very foundation of the doctrine of salvation through the Incarnation, in the historic truth of the fall of man in the book of Genesis. When he has shown that salvation, from first to last, is not man's work towards God, but God's work towards man; when he has finished his argument on the necessity of salvation by grace, not by law, if man is to be saved at all from sin and death; when he has established the doctrine of the propitiation by the sacrifice of Christ; when he has shown that the mode of applying the benefit of redemption is by the gift of faith to the sinner; he then proceeds to sum up the history of God's dealings with man, under both law and grace, in the memorable paragraph at the close of his fifth chapter. And no less than nine times does St. Paul assume and affirm, in the most distinct manner, the truth of the narrative in Genesis respecting the entrance of death by the offence of the one man Adam; tracing both the analogy and the difference between that history and the method of God in dealing mercifully with sinners, through the man Christ Jesus. Let any one attentively read the apostle's words, and say if he does not build the whole fabric of Christian doctrine on the reality of the history in Genesis.

"Therefore, as through one man sin entered into the world, and death through sin, even so death passed unto all men, for that all sinned. For before the law sin was in the world, but sin is not imputed where there is no law; nevertheless, death reigned from Adam to Moses, even over them that had not sinned after the likeness of Adam's transgression, who is a figure of him that was to come. But not as the trespass, so also is the free gift. For if by the trespass of the one the many died, much more did the grace of God, and the gift by the grace of the one man, Jesus Christ, abound unto the many. And not as though one that sinned, so is the gift; for the judgment came of one unto condemnation, but the free gift came of many trespasses unto justification. For if, by the trespass of the one, death reigned through the one, much more shall they that receive the abundance of grace, and of the gift of righteousness, reign in life through the one, even Jesus Christ. So, then, as through one trespass the judgment came unto all men to condemnation, even so through one act of righteousness (the free gift came) unto all men to justification of life. For, as through one man's disobedience, many were constituted sinners, even so through the obedience of the one shall the many be constituted righteous."

Nine times in those eight verses does St. Paul affirm the literal truth of the Edenic history; and represent the redemption by Christ as having a distinct relation to the entrance of sin and death therein described. If St. Paul was in error here at the foundation, he erred at least along with his Master, as we have seen; and if he erred in his belief on the fall, and we can certainly know it, it is quite certain that there is nothing whatever left in his doctrinal teaching respecting the redemption to which any divine authority can be attached. He is mistaken in the two fuel of his theological system.

It is, nevertheless an error which he repeats in many forms of his writings. Thus in chap. xvi. 20, of the same epistle, he promises the Romans, in manifest allusion to Gen. iii. 15, that "the seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head." "The God of peace shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly."

Again, in writing several years before to the Corinthians, when treating of the resurrection of the saints to eternal life, in the glory of God, he had thus spoken of the origin of death, and of the cause of resurrection in these words. "Now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first fruits of them that slept. For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead. For as in Adam all die, so also in the Christ shall all be made alive." And lower down, when speaking of the different constitutions of the animal and spiritual humanities, he adds, "There is a natural, or soulual, or psychical body and there is a spiritual or pneumatical body. And so it is written, 'The first man Adam became a living soul,' or psyche, the last Adam became a life-giving spirit or pneuma. Howbeit, that is not first which is spiritual or pneumatical, but that which is natural, or soulual, psychical, then that which is spiritual. The first man is of the earth, choikos, a man of dust. The second man is of heaven. As is the man of dust, such also are the men of dust, and as in the heavenly one, such also are the heavenly ones. And as we have borne the likeness of the man of dust, we shall also bear the likeness of the heavenly one." 1 Cor. xv. 21, 22, 44-49. How is it possible to avoid seeing that in every expression of these verses St Paul refers to the detailed account of the creation of Adam in the second and third chapters of Genesis, and treats the whole narrative, not only as historical, but as the record of an essential part of the general system of the divine dealings with humanity in his psychical and pneumatical stages of development, under its two federal heads, Adam and Christ.

Again, in the same epistle, 1 Cor. xi. 8, Saint Paul gives as a reason why women were to be attired in a manner to represent subjection to man, that "For a man ought not to cover his head, forasmuch as he is the image and glory of God, but the woman is the glory of the man. For the man is not out of the woman, proi ex andros, but the woman out of the man. Neither was the man created for the woman, but the woman for the man." Can there be any doubt that the apostle here refers to the words of Genesis ii. 23, and reasons from them as a true history. "As Adam said, This, now, is bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh; she shall be called Isha, woman, because she was taken out of man."

In his second epistle, St. Paul does not hesitate to hold up the example of Eve's weakness as a warning to the philosophical Corinthians. "But I fear less by any means, as the serpent beguiled Eve by his craftiness, your minds should be corrupted from the simplicity and the purity that is toward Christ." 2 Cor. xi. 3.

In his epistle to the Ephesians the apostle quotes the words of Gen. ii. 24, "For this cause shall a man leave his father and mother," etc., just as our Lord had done before him, to describe to his converts the law of marriage union fixed at the creation of Adam and Eve—a quotation without the force or authority even of antediluvian legend, unless he held the history as authentic, real and indisputable.

In his first epistle to Timothy, he assigns as a reason for the subjection of women and their silence in church, so far as teaching in the church is concerned, the original constitution of things, and the truth of the narrative of the fall of Eden: "I suffer not a woman to teach, nor to usurp authority over the man, but to be in silence. For Adam was first formed, then Eve. And Adam was not deceived, but the woman being deceived was in the transgression. Nevertheless, they shall be saved through the child-bearing (that is, of the promised "seed of the woman," the Christ), if they continue in faith and love, and sanctification with sobriety."

It is easy to see in every sentence of this exhortation that St. Paul regarded the Edenic history as a fable, no more than he looked on the rest of the Old Testament as mythical or allegorical. Indeed, there is no narrative in the Old Testament which St. Paul so frequently refers to in his writings, as true and instructive, as that of the earlier chapters of Genesis.

In the same manner Apollos, or whoever wrote the epistle to the Hebrews, speaks of the history of the ante-diluvians in his eleventh chapter, from Abel downwards, as if equally authentic with that of all subsequent ages. St. John in his epistle refers, as we have seen, similarly to the history of Cain and Abel as a practical instruction in the ways of piety and faith. And, lastly, in the Apocalypse, not only is the scenery of the earthly Paradise taken as a type and symbol of loftier realities beyond, but "the Devil and Satan" is twice pointed out as the "mankiller from the beginning," and described as "the ancient serpent, which deceiveth the whole world," so as to fix beyond dispute the diabolical nature of the power which brought upon our first parents ruin and destruction. Rev. xii. 9; xx. 2.—Edward White.

Turkish journals announce that the Porte has granted to a Syrian syndicate a right to construct a railroad from the port of Acre to a point on the Jordan, just below the sea of Galilee, and thence to Damascus. The line will run through a district of great fertility. The necessary works, it is said, are to be undertaken at once.

ORIENTAL SKETCHES.--Second Series. Number 15.

GIBEON AND ITS BATTLE-FIELDS.

At the northern base of Neby-Samwil, in a little upland plain, stands a low circular hill with steep sides and flat top. The sides are covered with terraced vineyards, and on the top is the village of El-Jib, the representative of the ancient capital of the wily "Gibeonites." The name describes the site,—Gibeon signifies "belonging to a hill." We were soon in the midst of the village examining the ruins of its old castle, and the massive fragments of ancient masonry which still form the substructions of its houses. But the fountain—there is only one—was the main point of attraction. It bursts from a rent cliff at the eastern base, and empties its tiny stream into a large reservoir a few yards off in the plain. This is that "Pool of Gibeon" where Abner and Joab, the rival warriors of Israel met, and where David's general gained a crowning victory. 2 Sam. ii. 12-32.

But a still more famous battle was fought beneath the walls of Gibeon. Its old inhabitants, by a clever trick, had beguiled the Israelites into a league. Josh. ix. 3-15. The Canaanites combined against them, and five Amorite kings marched their forces to punish the traitor Gibeonites (x. 1-6). Messengers were sent to Joshua, then encamped at Jericho, praying for help. It was readily granted. In the evening Joshua set out; all night his active troops climbed the rugged defiles; with the first dawn they crossed the rising ground which shuts in the little plain on the east, and ere a note of warning could be sounded, they charged the besiegers. The attack was sudden and the victory decisive. The banded forces broke and fled (x. 7-10).

Mounting our horses, we turned westward to trace the line of flight. The Israelites "chased them along the way that goeth up to Beth-horon" (verse 10). A quarter of a mile west of Gibeon is a sharp ascent to a low ridge. Up this the Amorites fled, hard pressed by their pursuers. From the top of the ridge a long and rugged descent leads to Beth-horon, which now appears in front crowning a projecting shoulder of the mountain. The nature of the ground favored the fugitives, but "as they fled from before Israel, and were in the going down to Beth-horon, the Lord cast down great stones from heaven upon them" (ver. 11). Joshua led the van of his troops. He saw that the victory was complete, but yet that night must eventually save the Amorite army from total destruction, and enable a large body of them to escape to their cities through the valley of Ajalon, at the foot of the pass down which they were rushing. Then, standing on some commanding rock in the sight of the whole people (ver. 12), in the fulness of faith and in the ardor of enthusiasm, Joshua gave utterance to that wondrous prayer-prophecy — glancing back towards Gibeon and forward upon Ajalon—"Sun, stand thou still upon Gibeon; and thou, moon, in the valley of Ajalon. And the sun stood still, and the moon stayed until the people had avenged themselves upon their enemies" (ver. 12-13).

Beth-horon itself,—"Beth-horon the upper," now called Beit Ur el-Foka, an Arabic translation of the Hebrew name,—has little to interest us besides its military associations as a strong outpost of Judea, guarding the principal pass from the western plain to Jerusalem. 1 Mac. iii. 13-24. As I sat on the top of its conical hill, beside its shattered walls, I saw the "nether Beth-horon" (Josh. xvi. 3) away below at the bottom of the pass; and further south, on the side of its valley, the little village of Ajalon. The view over the broad expanse of Sharon and Philistia to the sea was glorious.

BEEROTH AND BETHEL.

We now turned our faces eastward again, and rode across wild and bleak hills, dotted here and there with a vineyard or an olive-grove, and in two hours reached Birah, the ancient Beeroth, one of the four cities of the Gibeonites. Josh. ix. 17. The only object of interest there is an old Gothic church, built by the Knights Templars, who held Beeroth during the reign of the Latin kings. I did not linger, but galloped [illegible] miles distant, where I found my tent pitched beside the little fountain.

During the still evening, when the shadows were deepening in the glens, and the last rays of the declining sun gilding the top of rock and cliff, I explored the site of this the most ancient of Israel's holy places. I looked all round in the hope of identifying the spot where Jacob slept, and which he consecrated and called "House of God." I explored the rock sepulchres, too, which dot the sides of "the mount" (2 Kings xiii. 16), thinking that one or other of them might be that of "the man of God from Judah," whose bones Josiah respected (ver. 17, 18). Clambering to the top of a shattered tower which crowns the hill of Bethel, I looked long, and in sadness, over that dreary field of ruin, only inhabited by a few shepherds; and I saw how terribly thine had fulfilled the city's prophetic doom: "Bethel shall come to nought." Amos v. 5.

AI.

In the early morning, crossing a rocky glen, I ascended the mountain to the spot where Abraham pitched his tent and built his altar, "having Bethel on the west, and Hai (Ai) on the east." Gen. xii. 8. Here I found a little plateau, stony but fertile, on the very crest of the hill; and on reaching it the valley of the Jordan, and the glittering waters of the Dead Sea suddenly burst upon my view, lying deep, deep down at the foot of a dreary wilderness. On this spot Abraham and Lot had that memorable interview after their herdsmen had disputed, and "they found that the land was not able to bear them, that they might dwell together, for their substance was great." Gen. xiii. 3-7. There and then they resolved to separate; and "Lot lifted up his eyes, and beheld all the plain of Jordan that it was well watered" (ver. 10), and he chose that rich region as his abode. How wonderfully graphic did the whole narrative appear to me as I read it on that mountain-top.

Bethel was behind me on the west; but where was Ai—long lost Ai? On this and on two other occasions I visited the district to search for and verify its site. I believe I was successful. Jutting out eastward from the plateau on which I stood is a lower ridge, having deep glens on all sides, except where it joins the mountain. Over its whole summit I found traces of very ancient ruins, with cisterns and caves such as exist on the sites of all mountain cities in Palestine. At the eastern base are large quarries, and many rock-hewn tombs. I had no doubt then, and I have none now, that here stood Ai, "on the east" of Abraham's camping ground and altar.

The capture of Ai forms one of the romantic episodes in Jewish history. The first assault was unsuccessful, and the little army was driven back in confusion. Josh. vii. 4, 5. The second was more skillful planned, and had the sanction of the God of battles. Northwest of Ai, between it and Bethel, is a little rocky glen; and in this, during the night, five thousand chosen Israelites were placed in ambush. Josh. viii. 9, 12. Joshua and the main body took up a position on the commanding ridge north of the city, separated from it by a deep valley (ver. 11). In the morning, before it was yet light, he advanced into the valley, as if to attack the fortifications in front (ver. 13). The first dawn revealed him to the watchful foe, who immediately, leaving Ai in force, charged impetuously down the hill (ver. 14). The Israelites gave way "as if they were beaten, and fled by the way of the wilderness,"—down the wild mountain defiles towards Jericho (ver. 15). It was a feint, and it succeeded. The whole population of the city rushed out in pursuit (ver. 16). Just then, in obedience to the command of God, and, doubtless, in accordance with a preconcerted signal, Joshua standing on some prominent rock or cliff, "stretched out the spear that he had in his hand toward the city. And the ambush arose quickly out of their place, and they ran, and they entered the city, and hasted, and set the city on fire. And when the men of Ai looked behind them, they saw, and, behold, the smoke of the city ascended up to heaven, and they had no power to flee this way or that way" (ver. 19, 20). They were completely paralyzed. All were put to the sword, and Ai was razed to the ground.

Some centuries later Ai appears to have been rebuilt; but it is now, and has been for a thousand years, a desolate ruin.—J. L. Porter, L. M.

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, June 13, 1883.

OUR Conference at Antioch was well attended both by brethren and sisters from abroad, and by residents in the immediate vicinity. On Sunday the assemblage was large indeed. The social meeting in the morning of that day was unusually good. The preaching was what the brotherhood and the world need — practical, earnest, and permeated with gospel truth and love. Instead of speculating about untaught questions and theories, the quickening word was dispensed to living men and women teaching them what they must do to be saved. Such preaching is never without effect. For further account of this conference, as well as of the Michigan State Conference, we await the reports of the Secretaries.

WE are in receipt of a very interesting letter from the East Indies. In carrying out our missionary work we concluded that some faraway who have embraced the truth of eternal life through Christ alone, as well as that of the literal fulfilment of prophesy, would gladly read our paper. To reach them some of our dear brethren and sisters have subscribed and paid for some copies of THE RESTITUTION that it might be sent to believers living on the other side of our world. The letter alluded to above is from one of these, a lover of our Lord Jesus Christ who lives in Southern Hindostan. This letter, which we propose to give next week, is indeed good news from a far country. Our new correspondent also sends us a sample of the Bible Banner published in the Tamil language for which he has our special thanks.

WE have also received a long letter from Jerusalem written by P. H. Winterstien of whom Mrs. Davis spoke in a recent letter. In addition to an account of his journey, he makes a sad statement regarding the fanaticism of the Illinois colonists who have gone to Jerusalem. We should have been rejoiced to have received a very different report. But, alas for poor, weak, fallen humanity: miserable, foolish extravagance and fanaticism have been characteristic of its depraved condition in all ages. And sadder still, its vilest and most abominable phases are likely to be exhibited in this time of the end. Let us all be prayerful, watchful, and let us carefully walk in the narrow path of truth and holiness. Will give this letter next week.

LAST week we noticed that the Pennsylvania Company would sell excursion tickets to Chicago and return from all the principal stations on Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne & Chicago Ry., Meadville Ry., and North Western Ohio Ry., on Thursday and Friday of each week until the close of "The National Exposition of Railroad Appliances" June 23, 1883 at the rate of one fare for the round trip. All our friends, who would like to visit Chicago, have a chance to gratify this desire at comparatively small cost by embracing this offer. We have passed over the entire line of this company East and West several times and heartily commend the rout to all our readers who may at any time wish to visit Eastern cities from the West or Western cities from the East.

A LAY SERMON.

THE PULPIT VS. THE LAITY—A FEW HINTS UPON THE CAUSES WHICH KEEP MEN AWAY FROM CHURCH—WHAT LAYMEN ARE THINKING ABOUT

We are not among those who believe religion is declining. On the other hand there is logical evidence of ever increasing interest in religion. The fact that men are lukewarm in church attendance has a deeper significance to our mind than is generally conceded. Certain ministers of decided ability and wide thought hint that the time is growing ripe for a revision of creeds, and they seem to think that were this done the apathy and doubt which they assert to be spreading so alarmingly would disappear and men would swing back into regular attendance at church and heartily engage in church work. Another class of worthy pulpit orators indulge in doleful plaints about the general tendency of things to infidelity, and the agnosticism of the day is denounced as a stepping stone thereto. Another class of good ministers see the hand of the devil in the whole business. They are therefore not sparing in their denunciations of modern religious thought as evinced by lay writers, speakers and thinkers. All these gentlemen are doubtless doing what they conceive to be right, and we deeply sympathize with them in their travail.

We believe the root of the trouble can be found embedded in this statement, viz.: the pulpit and the people have to a great extent ceased to entertain a common sympathy. This may be a grevious error; but we are a layman and think, feel and write as a layman. We know nothing about technique of theology, nor desire to be instructed therein. We simply think, feel, talk and write in a common sense and unlearned way. Therefore, mingling largely with men of thinking classes, whose opinions sway communities and leaven the aggregate of thought and power which influence the country, we deliberately assert the belief that the men of today think more about religion than the men of ten, twenty and fifty years ago. As proof we point to the very large space devoted to religious discussion and publication of facts pertaining to religious matters in the magazines and newspapers of the day. There is no better touchstone of the public pulse than this. If it were not popular such publications would not appear. Newspapers and magazines are made to sell, and they always cater, or aim to cater, to the popular demand. Twenty years ago the world depended upon the pulpit, religious books, and a few religious newspapers for religious food. How different now? These facts are eloquent and carry their own argument.

Now as regards the absence of sympathy between the clergy and the laity. Men as a general thing give their personal attendance and attention wherever their sympathies are. That men have left off going to church in so marked a degree as to excite a universal wail from the pulpit, is not, we believe, due to a lack of interest in or a want of reverence for the Christian religion, but mainly because they have ceased to sympathize with theological methods and dogmas of church. We refer to no church in particular, for all are open to criticism from the lay mind in this regard. There has grown up a feeling, which is rapidly gaining strength among the laity, that religion is, or ought to be, an every-day, practical thing, capable of logical demonstration and consistent with an intelligent understanding of the attributes of a reasonable, intelligent and all-wise God. That while there is a vast amount of very beautiful and inspiring sentiment in religion, there are also hard facts in existence which cannot be glossed over and which should be considered as facts by theologians. As these points are only half conceded by the pulpit and the grace of the concession nearly destroyed by subsequent floods of technical theological mysticism and exalted sentimentality, to say nothing about sneers at so-called materialism (for the pulpit can sneer even at men who are honest in their belief,) the laity are rapidly forming the habit of digesting their own religious food unassisted by the preachers. This is a frank and free statement of the situation, as we understand it. The laity may be wrong and the preachers right. We do not presume to adjudicate the merits of the question. The preachers have their views and enforce them from the pulpit without contradiction. This is a lay sermon by a layman in behalf of laymen. It is not intended to be a sermon of instruction for the pulpit. It is not designed as a sermon of affirmations as to new beliefs or religious discoveries. Neither is it a sermon of negations. But it is a sermon of statements of facts believed by the laity and of objections to theological unfairness upon the part of the pulpit when opinions are advanced contrary to the accepted dogmas taught in the schools of theology. As we must be brief we resort to laconicism and proceed to state as follows:

We believe in the Christian religion as a sentiment and also as a fact. We believe in it as a divinely revealed, intelligent, common sense, reasonable fact. We also believe the men who wrote the Bible were inspired, but we do not believe they were infallible. We believe that they did, so far as their humanity permitted them, write what divine inspiration taught them. We do not believe that King James' translators were inspired, and think they were liable to err. We also believe that it was possible for interpolations and corruptions to creep into the original text from the time of the apostles to the reign of James of England. And we have the new revision as proof that the belief is well-founded. We believe in the general inspiration of the Old Testament, but do not believe that it is necessary to our salvation to endorse the mere records of history contained therein as the sacred letter of inspiration. We believe such endorsement is not material or necessary.

To sum up the whole matter, we believe in the spirit of the Bible as the revealed Word of God. We leave the strict construction of the letter of the book to those who think minute analysis material to salvation.

We object to being told that we know nothing and that the pulpit enjoys a monopoly of information of and is alone to adjudicate upon sacred things. For we think that the same ability which enables us to understand other questions affords the power to grapple with questions of religion.

We object to the assumption that a course of special theological training fits a man to better comprehend plain facts of revelation than those of us whose minds have been trained in other schools. We acknowledge that theology as a science is unknown to us. But that is theology and is for those whose profession requires them to know it. The Bible is an open book, free to all, and its facts are so plain that the wayfaring man though a fool need not err therein.

We believe that there is too much preaching of theology and church, and too little preaching of the Bible, and we object to it as the exaltation of the opinion of the human mind above the plainly revealed intention of the Infinite. For the spirit of revelation is so large that it is impossible to confine it within the narrow limits of a set of dogmas or reduce it to the size of a society of religionists.

We object to the dogmatism which denies us the right to question the reasonableness of one obscure text, and then goes on to enunciate as God's truth an elaborate and vulnerable explanation of another far more obscure passage which happens to stand in the path of a humanly constructed tenet of theology.

We object to the practice and question the logic which insists upon the strict construction of the letter of certain parts of the Bible and passes over other portions with the awe-inspiring injunction that these are mysteries not intended to be revealed to the finite mind. We object to the presumption that thus assumes to know that God did not intend to reveal such and such things to creatures made in his own image.

We object to being denounced as scoffers at religion when we venture to differ from a set of theories, earth-born and predicated upon human constructions of inspired writing. For we feel that we have as much right as the theologians and the leaders of the Reformation to have opinions and exercise judgment, even in matters religious.

We object to being warned that we are on the road to infidelity because we seek to know the reason why a thing is true. For we are conscious that understanding is necessary to faith, and that is just what we are reaching after.

We object to the effort of the pulpit to discountenance inquiry into matters which seem obscure. For it either shows a lack of confidence in the righteousness of the cause, or else displays a spirit of repressive intolerance, either of which acts as a clog upon the progress of thought and research.

We object to sectarian war and bickering. For we believe in the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. And we feel that the application of the principle that a true prophet will believe in another prophet, is a safe rule in judging the merits of religious controversies. Hence, while conceding the necessity for methods, we believe final conclusions should all meet and fraternize upon the broad-gauge road which stretches across the last miles to Judgment.

We do not object to creeds. But we do object to subordinating the Bible to creeds. We do not object to theological learning and drill and the preaching of doctrinal sermons. But we do object to having these things hung about us as infallibly sacred pronunciamentoes of the Divine will and made paramount to the grandly beautiful truths which our reason, judgment, faith and heart-throbs convince us are infinitely above and beyond all humanly devised rechatque and form the foundation and capstone of the whole Christian fabric.

We object to platitude in the pulpit; to the re-vamping of worn-out thoughts to the easy indolence which declines all effort to present fact in attractive forms; to the assumption of saintly character without the grand dignity and majestic wisdom which should accompany it; to the utmost general failure of the pulpit to meet us upon the only ground we can conscientiously and manfully stand upon, and counsel with us in our grappings after the true inwardness of things to point us on the road to the better land in the great Beyond; to giving us the day husks of theological opinion when we are begging for the ripe kernal of the Word in all its clearness of beauty and glory and power, and disdainfully shrugging the shoulder of holy scorn when we decline.

Old loves, old faiths, old friends are dear to the heart. But they are all the more dear when presented in such forms which heighten their beauty and clear away from about them any mists of doubt with which they may have been surrounded. We want fair, free and earnest investigation. We want fearless, manly acknowledgment of past errors. We want to see such exhibition of faith in the ministry that the newest revelations of science shall no longer be denounced at first as inventions of the devil; looked at askance later on as possibly not subversive of Christian truths, and lastly accepted as really corroborative of sacred facts. We want to see the pulpit stop fighting the progress of thought and investigation, leap to the fore and help direct it. Just here is the meeting point. Right here we will meet our clergy and help them with a hearty good will. But, remembering Lot's wife, we will not look back.

These thoughts belong to the writer only so far as he is a unit in the vast aggregate of men who now think and speak them. That they are pregnant with instruction to the ministry depends upon the spirit in which they receive them when they meet them. In the meantime the laity will go on thinking independently. If this be wicked in the eyes of the pulpit, may-hap the abundant mercy of God will be more kind.

A GREAT GULF FIXED.

When presenting our views on the Rich man and Lazarus, and contrasting the law and the gospel, and the Jew and the Gentile, the argument from this great gulf sometimes rises up like a mountain of objection to our application. Can not the Jew come over and be adopted into the Abrahamic faith and family? We answer, yes, most emphatically. Thousands have, and thousands more may be grafted back into their own olive tree. And so of the believing Gentile. They may and can pass out from the fold — from Abraham's bosom to a level with the unbelieving Jew—they may apostatize. Then what is this impassable gulf that is thought to be so in the way? We answer that this great gulf pertains to the two systems, the law and the gospel which separates the two peoples, the unbelieving Jew and believing Gentiles. The design of the gospel in this age, is to select out from the Gentiles a people for the Lord's name, who are to be kings and priests — joint rulers in the kingdom of God when established. While the Jews, as a nation cling to Moses—the law and the prophets can not wish that system become a participant in the honors of the kingdom age. Neither can believers who stand firm in Abraham's bosom by faith in and obedience to gospel requirements, step back and took on the law, and still attain the prize. No there is that great gulf in the way.

The kingdom is taken from them, the Jews, and will be given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof. To seek to be justified by the law is to fall from grace. The law as a system has filled its place, served its purpose and passed out being nailed to the cross. The law and the prophets were until John, since that time the kingdom of God is preached and men press into it. The gospel of the kingdom of God, as preached by Christ and his apostles constitutes God's moral motive power, or plan of salvation, having many privileges and honors in store for the obedient, while the Jew in his blindness rejects all this trusting to Moses and the law instead of Christ and the gospel, and can not possible cling to that system and pass over into Abraham's bosom, Justification by faith. No it is an impassable gulf. No bridge devised by human skill can reach that golden shore.

A BRIEF ACCOUNT.

Bro. Flon and I started the 18th of May in a lumber wagon to attend the meeting at Severance, Doniphan Co., Kansas. We stopped over night with brother Buckles, then on the next day to Severance where we found several brethren assembled. Here we met for the first time brother Arnold of Jamesport, Mo., and brother Moyer (brother to George Moyer) of Effingham, Kansas. The meeting was a good one, with quite a good attendence from the immediate vicinity. The preaching was of a good character, the hobbies being left at home. On Monday and Tuesday the brethren met in Bible class to investigate in reference to the resurrection of the dead, and the importance and time for the celebration of the Lord's death. And we can truly say, the time was well spent, and all passed off very pleasantly. But oh, how we missed brother Vickery and his amiable family, who had just sold out and moved to Sumner Co., Kansas. May their lights shine forth unto the perfect day. Tuesday evening the meeting closed and we started the next day for our homes. I took a cold on the way to the meeting which settled on my lungs, unfitting me for much talking or singing, and am not over it yet. And on the way home I took sick and was detained some days, but was with brethren and kind friends, who have our kindest regards. We arrived home on Saturday and found all well. But as we did not design this as a report of the meeting, we will close by saying that we have found Bro. W. S. Finn, of North Topeka, well informed in the Scriptures and quite a good speaker, and on every way worthy the confidence of the brethren, who would do well to have his acquaintance and his help in the gospel vineyard. The night is far spent, the day is at hand, let us watch and be sober. Beware of covetousness. Beware of the cares of this life. Beware of that prevalent and deceitful spirit of negligence and indifference which is ensnaring thousands. Watch and pray.

Letter Drawer.

JERUSALEM, May 17, '83.

Dear Brother:

Brother Winterstien sent yesterday to your address a letter for publication which I hope will please you. He is an American Jew, a proselyte. He was singularly wrought upon to come here and I am convinced that it is of God. I felt that my labors were becoming too heavy, and he came to my help; I am very thankful. I think his letters will be read with interest by all your readers.

I have been quite ill with fever for a week past, and shall not finish the cards promised until next post. But all will come as ordered. The flower crop has been abundant and my store is full. The Lord is working wonderfully here and all can see that he is making here his holy arm to the nations. I thank you more than I can tell for all your kindness to me and our poor brethren in Jerusalem and your reward is sure. The French Consul died very suddenly of disease of the heart. I think the procession which followed to the grave was fully half a mile in length. I heard that an American colony would start for Palestine in August; I hope it is true. What we need is a colony of live Yankees to make Paradise. God will do the rest.

We love dear Jerusalem more and more as we see the beginning of the fulfilment of prophesy. I hope to send some sketches now that I have help. Mrs. W. will be much help to me in finger making; it is rather a tedious work. How glad I am that God opened this way to me. May God bless and keep you.

In hope,

A. E. DAVIS.

Editor Restitution:

Will you please say to the readers of THE RESTITUTION that I am calculating to go to Palestine towards the last of the summer, and if any wish to correspond with me on that or any other subject, if they will address me at Orange City, Fla., until further notice, I will gladly open up a correspondence with them.

Yours in the Christian's hope,

DANIEL HOWARD.

Editor Restitution:

Enclosed please find five dollars to be used as follows: One dollar to continue my subscription; with the remaining four send THE RESTITUTION six months to the following persons.

* * * * *

Opposition to the truth is giving way among [illegible] readers. THE RESTITUTION has a telling effect when it can be placed in the hands of those who will read it. It is time and money thrown away to send our paper to non-readers. Unbelievers who will read are the proper material to work upon. In my own humble experience I know of a number brought to a faith-producing knowledge of the truth through the merit of THE RESTITUTION.

Yours in hope of life from the dead,

W. P. STATES.

AUGUSTA, Wis.

Editor Restitution:

It has been some time since I have written to you, but it is better late than not at all. I prize THE RESTITUTION very much; I am sorry that I cannot contribute to its support more than my subscription the ensuing year. I feel glad that it is being supported by its many liberal friends. I will try to do better in the future if the Lord should need it for a mouth piece.

There are only a few, very few, here in Augusta that believe in the restitution of all things spoken of by all the holy prophets. But that few is a power against tradition and doctrines of men. We are guided by nothing but the Word of God, and the truth makes us free. We recognize no head but Jesus. He is the Great Shepherd of the sheep.—He is the Price paid for our sins, and not only ours (the church), but for the sins of the whole world—the rest of mankind. We feel encouraged to press on and win the prize of the high calling—the divine nature—immortality. We want to be overcomers that we may be associated with the seed, that shall bless the nations—families—of earth. Unto this end we are endeavoring to make our calling and election sure; fearing least through negligence we loose the crown. Think of us in your supplications unto the God of Israel; through Jesus the Christ.—

Now may the God of Israel guide you and yours into all truth; is my prayer.

J. W. ROBINE.

PORTERS MILLS, Wis.

Editor Restitution:

Enclosed find three dollars to apply on my subscription for THE RESTITUTION. I have been negligent in this matter, but hope this will make it all right. We are very much pleased with the paper, and my wife says give me THE RESTITUTION in preference to any and all other papers. Hope you may be able to continue the publication of the good tidings of Israel's return, and the establishment of the throne of David in the land of promise.

Editor Restitution:

Enclosed find $2.00 to apply on subscription for THE RESTITUTION. am sorry I am not in circumstance to send you more, please accept my hearty thanks for your kindness in sending me the paper so long after my subscription was due. I love THE RESTITUTION as I can love no other paper that I have ever taken. It has brought to light so many points of Scripture and made them so plain. Dear brother language can not express the real gratitude of my heart for the benefit that I feel I have received from reading it carefully. In watching carefully the discussion on the Sabbath question has fully settled that with me. I would be glad to send you a free will offering but feel too poor to do so just at present but will try and send you more soon.

Yours of like faith and love.

D. FAILING.

GEORGETOWN, Col.

Editor Restitution:

We are thankful to you for sending us the paper after our subscription was out. And we hope you will excuse us for not remitting sooner, for what little money we had ahead was invested so it was not at our command. Besides some sickness and doctor bills to pay. We have been in Colorado some five years and have never during that time met one person that embraced the Abrahamic faith; so you may imagine the pleasure it gives us to get THE RESTITUTION each week, for it is mostly through its pages that we hear from those whom we long and pray for. Hoping and praying that God will bless you with health and strength and give you success in your noble work, we subscribe your Brother and Sister in hope of life,

JOHN and JANE COWEN.

HESPERIA, Mich.

Dear Restitution:

Your visits to me are very agreeable indeed, and I am very glad that I can send you the $2.00 so that you can continue to come. May the Lord bless you abundantly. I had the pleasure of baptizing five willing converts into the name of the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit on Sunday, May 20, in the township of Hart, Oceana Co., Mich. The meeting was held at the Brooks School House. A very deep conviction seemed to rest upon the hearers while I discoursed from the Word, "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God." John iii. 5. The Word of truth is prevailing over philosophy.

WM. G. WELLS.

OSEGO, Wis.

Editor Restitution:

Enclosed please find $2.00 for continuance of THE RESTITUTION. THE RESTITUTION makes its weekly visits and I know not how we could do without it. I was very much interested in the article written by a converted spirit medium, also the one written by Br. Wilson on the same subject. Brethren please see to it that you put on the armor of God, for by so doing you will be able to withstand the wiles of the devil who is ever on the alert to captivate those that are not acquainted with his devices. May the God of peace ever sustain those who by prayer and supplication make all of their requests known to God.

It is a source of gratification to me to know that the links of Satan's chain will descend like the lightning and lay hold of that old serpent which Jesus calls the devil and binds him so that he (Jesus) can enter his prison house of death and set the captives free, then be it to the praise of his holy name whom the Son maketh free shall be free indeed and none can pluck them out of the Father's hand.

In conclusion I will say that I have baptized one within the last year, an intelligent brother by the name of F. H. L. Cotton of Eau Claire, Wis., he having seen my name in THE RESTITUTION wrote to me stating that he requested baptism; I answered his letter by saying that the Lord being my helper I would baptize him if he requested it; he accordingly came in due time and we repaired to a place where there was much water and I in the name of Jesus that died for us buried him in the likeness of our Redeemer and raised him with his sins all washed away to walk in newness of life, I have seen him but once since but found him rejoicing in hope and giving glory to God. May the Lord in whom he trusts preserve him unto his heavenly kingdom.

W. M. BUZZELL.

True Work Never Wasted.

No true work since the world began was ever wasted; no true life since the world began has ever failed. O, understand those two perverted words, and measure them by the eternal, not by the earthly standard. What the world has regarded as the bitterest failure, has often been in the sight of heaven the most magnificent success. When the cap, painted with devils, was placed on the brow of John Huss, and he sank dying amid the embers of the flame—was that a failure? When the frail, worn body of the Apostle of the Gentiles was dragged by a hook from the arena, and the white sand scattered over the crimson life-blood of the victim, whom the dense amphitheatre despised as some obscure and nameless Jew—was that a failure?

And when, after thirty obscure, toilsome, unrecorded years in the shop of the village carpenter, One came forth to be pre-eminently the Man of sorrows, to wander from city to city in homeless labors, and then expire in lonely agony upon the shameful cross—was that a failure? Nay, my brethren, it was the death of him who lived that we might follow his footsteps—it was the life, it was the death of the Son of God.—F. W. Farrar.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

The third Quarterly Conference of the second District of Arkansas, meets with the Church of God, worshipping at Green Brier, Faulkner Co., at 11 o'clock on Friday morning before the third Sunday in June, and continue over the following Sunday. Any one that has any business they wish brought before the conference, that can't attend, can have the same done by writing to the Secretary. We humbly trust, that all the brethren will come with a full purpose of heart, to do all they can for the soon coming Lord. Hoping that all of like precious faith will govern themselves accordingly.

JOHN W. TEAS, Sec'y.
Morrilton, Ark; P. O. Box 38.

There will be a debate held 7 miles southeast of Delcon, Texas, beginning on the 2nd day of July, between W. H. Wright of the Disciples and J. P. Todd of the Brethren of Christ. Propositions to be debated,

1. Does the consciousness of man wholly cease between death and the resurrection? J. P. Todd affirms, W. H Wright denies.

2. Does the kingdom of God or the kingdom of Christ exist on the earth at this time? W. H. Wright affirms, J. P. Todd denies.

"MY TIMES ARE IN THY HAND."

GEO. WHITMAN.

My times are in thy hand, O Lord:
Whatever ill betide
I lean upon thy sacred word,
And trustingly abide.

The griefs I bear are hidden joys;
The sorrows I endure,
Are but the means that God employs
To make my soul more pure.

The darkest clouds that veil my sky,
Are fringed with sovereign grace;
That darkness ne'er can dim his eye,
Nor hide me from his face.

Be still, my soul! Doubt not his love!
Nor past nor present things,
Nor life, nor death shall ever move,
That hand that to thee clings.

My days and years in his great hand
Are safe forevermore,
Firm as the eternal hills that stand
Rock-roofed as of yore.

AT JACOB'S WELL.

On arriving at Jacob's well, we found the mouth of it, which is in the middle of the ruins of a church by which it was formerly surmounted, covered with two large stones. These we were unable to remove; but a half-dozen sturdy Arabs, from a small hamlet close by, did the needful for us, in expectation, of course, of a due reward. The opening over the well is an orifice in a dome or arch, less than two feet in diameter. Our Samaritan friend was the first to enter. He held by a piece of rope, which we kept in our hands till, swinging himself across the mouth of the well, properly so-called, he found footing on the margin of the excavation over which the dome extends. Mr. Smith and myself, dispensing with the superfluous parts of our dresses, followed his example, the Jew, Mordecai, keeping fast hold of the rope, till, with the assistance of Jacob, we got a firm footing beside him. The Arabs entered, one after the other, without difficulty. All within was, hitherto, darkness; but by the aid of a packet of lucifers, we lighted our candles, and were able to look down the well to a considerable depth.

It was now time to disclose our plan of operations to our native attendants. "Jacob," said we, "a friend of ours, an English traveller and minister (the Rev. Andrew Bonar, of Collace), dropped the five books of Moses and the other inspired records into this well, about three years ago, and if you will descend and bring them up we shall give you a handsome bakshish." "Bakshish!" said the Arabs, kindling at the sound, "if there is to be a bakshish in the case we must have it, for we are lords of the land." "Well, down you go," said we, throwing the rope over their shoulders, "and you shall have the bakshish." "Nay, verily," said they, "you mean to hang us; let Jacob do what he pleases." Jacob was ready at our command; and when he had tied the rope round his body, below his shoulders, he received our parting instructions. We asked him to call out to us the moment he should arrive at the surface of the water, and told him we should so hold the rope as to prevent him from sinking if there was any considerable depth of the element. We told him also to pull out one of the candles with which he had stored his breast, and to ignite it when he might get below. As he looked into the fearful pit on the brink of which he stood, terror took hold of him; and he betook himself to prayer in the Hebrew tongue. We, of course, gave him no interruption in his solemn exercises, as, in the circumstances of the case, we could not but admire the spirit of devotion which he evinced. On a signal given, we let him go. The Arabs assisted in holding the ropes, and we took care that he should descend as gently as possible. When our material was nearly exhausted he called out, "I have reached the bottom; and it is at present scarcely covered with water." Forthwith he kindled his light; and that he might have every advantage we threw him down a quantity of dry sticks, with which he made a blaze, which distinctly showed us the whole of the well, from the top to the bottom. We saw the end of the rope at the lower part; and we put a knot upon it at the margin above, that we might have the exact measurement when Jacob might come up.

After searching for about five minutes for the Bible among the stones and mud at the bottom, our kind friend joyfully called out, "It is found! it is found!" We were not slow, it may be supposed in giving him our congratulations. The prize he carefully put into his breast; and then he declared his readiness, with our aid, to make the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

"BE YE ALSO READY."

BY T. E. BOOLE.

"I am now ready."—2 Tim. iv. 6.

Ready to fight for Jesus,
If the trumpet call resounds,
And the rallying horn of evil
Fill earth's great battle-grounds,
Ready to raise his banner
'Mid the foeman's fiercest din;
Or ready to die in his service,
If death win the day for him.

Ready to speak for Jesus,
If he needs a human tongue,
To tell out the wondrous story,
That from age to age has sung
Who never a thought of laurel,
And never a hope of gain,
Content to be just an echo
Of his matchless love to men.

Ready to work for Jesus,
If work he his will for me;
By swift, light-hearted service,
Showing my loyalty—
Stooping to lift a burden,
Or offering sympathy;
Thankful, to have with angels,
Each happy ministry.

And ready to sit down silent,
To lie at his wounded feet:
If speaking or speech be denied me,
By his will unspeakably sweet.
Ready to suffer for Jesus,
If suffering bring him praise:
If any new cry of glory,
I've won by my weary days.

Ready to give to Jesus,
My life, my love, my all;
If my heart, alert and eager,
Hear his sweet comforting call.
Never a thing withholding,
That he stoops to ask of me,
Giving my choicest treasures,
With a glad heart willingly.

Ready to wait for Jesus,
If he wills to tarry long.
Whiling away the weary night,
With soft and hymn-taught song.
Watching each pale star waning,
Ere the golden glory dawn
Floods earth and sky with brightness,
And crowns the coming morn.

BRITISH PHASE OF THE EASTERN QUESTION.—No. 80.

Prelude—Have the throne and kingdom of David had a continuous existence from the time of his personal reign in Jerusalem, B. C. 1055 to 1015 to 1883? If so, where, and under what name? If not, how is God's oath to David to be interpreted? Sceptre of Judah—Israel and the Saxons: their identity further noticed—The terms Israel and Judah further examined.

Prelude—Have the throne and kingdom of David had a continuous existence from the time of his personal reign in Jerusalem, B. C. 1055–1015 to A. D. 1883? If so, where, and under what name? Its continuous existence is maintained by one school of expositors, and opposed by another. It is affirmed in these words, "That throne of David (Psa. lxxxix. 32–37), and the kingdom of Israel must be in existence somewhere; and, moreover, they must have had a continuous existence throughout all these centuries." As to the place where, and under what name, the same author (Pool) says, "The sceptre of Judah remained in the house of David; and in the family of David it was transferred from the East to the 'Isles of the West,' where it will remain until the time of the 'peaceful' (Gen. xlix. 10.) union of the two houses so long divided, that is the 'rest' (Gen. xlix. 10.) promised in the latter days." That transfer was made, according to the same expositor, through the daughter of the captive king Zedekiah, when Jerusalem was taken and destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar. That continuous kingdom has continued in the British Isles till 1883, and known as the British empire, or "Anglo-Israel." While we fully believe in the British future mission, and have been at great pains to trace the ten tribes from Southwestern Asia, through Central Asia into Europe, and into the British Isles, we have been unfortunate in not being able to trace David's sceptre to the same locality. A rent kingdom is not David's kingdom, though it may consist of ten parts. David had twelve tribes, so will his Son Messiah. The union of the two sticks will make one nation. Ezek. xxxvii. 15–28. That union is still future. We can see an intimate relationship between Genesis xlix. 10, and Ezekiel xxi. 26. "And thou, profane, wicked prince of Israel, (not of the ten tribes, for they had been in captivity since B. C. 720, one hundred and twenty-nine years previous) whose day is come, when iniquity (shall have) an end, vs. 29; thus saith the Lord God; remove the diadem, and take off the crown; this shall not (be) the same: exalt (him that) is low, and abase (him that is) high. Vs. 27, I will overturn, overturn, overturn it: and it shall be no (more), until he comes, whose right it is; and I will give it him." Who, then, took the sceptre? God, who keeps it till Messiah is ready to receive it. Dan. vii. 13, 14. The sceptre is not, therefore, perpetuated in the family of Zedekiah through his daughter, who is said to have married an Irish king. If the transfer to the "Isles of the West" was by the daughter of king Zedekiah, it did not follow the ten tribes at the rending of the kingdom of Rehoboam. The captivity of the ten tribes put an end to the ten-tribed kingdom of Israel, since they did not return, nor does the prediction intimate that they would have a continuous regal existence: "For the children of Israel shall abide many days without a king, and without a prince, and without a sacrifice, and without an image, and without an ephod, and (without) teraphim: and afterward shall the children of Israel return and seek the Lord their God, and David their king; and shall fear the Lord and his goodness in the latter days." Hos. iii. 4, 5. The Targum reads, "And they shall obey the Messiah, the Son of David, their king." This is evidently a prediction of their conversion. Such language teaches that Israel would long be wanderers, without any settled government or visible means of communication with the Deity. Some time after these years of political and religious destitution a great national change would result in their conversion. Such would seem to be its true interpretation. The sceptre of Messiah, David's Son and Heir, is retained by God till the time comes for the Nobleman (Christ) to receive the kingdom and return to reign.

A continuous existence of the throne and kingdom of David is not taught in Psa. lxxxix. 32–37, as we understand the language of this psalm; also Jer. xxxi. 35, xxxii. 33; 2 Chron. xiii. 4, also xxi. 7. Also, in all the repetitions of God's oath to David, to convey this one definite thought, that he would not exterminate his (David's) house, as he had the house of Saul, but, that the time would never come in the endless revolutions of ages, when it could be said, David's family is extinct. The idea is fully expressed in Psa. lxxxix. 30–37. "If his children forsake my law, and walk not in my judgments. If they break my statutes, and keep not my commandments; then will I visit their transgressions with the rod, and their iniquity with stripes. Nevertheless my loving-kindness will I not utterly take from him, nor suffer my faithfulness to fail. My covenant will I not break, nor alter the thing that is gone out of my lips. Once have I sworn by my holiness, that I will not lie unto David. His seed (Christ) shall endure forever, and his throne as the sun before me. It shall be established for ever as the moon, and (a) as a faithful witness in heaven."

Anglo-Israel. We do not use this compound, because we endorse all that many writers say, but, simply, to express the thought by a single term. We may believe that the Saxons are of the ten tribes without holding that they constitute the whole of the ten tribes; or that the ten tribed kingdom of Israel is the British empire governed by one of the house of David.

The chain of Saxon-lineage has been traced from Abram in Southwestern Asia, link by link to the British Isles. They reached Central Asia in families. They had heads to their families who became subordinate rulers under one chief; or, sometimes under many chiefs. They first appeared in Europe as families. In Northwestern Europe, they first appeared as families, then; as tribes; then, as a confederacy for nearly one thousand years. They passed over into the British Island in a small band under Hengist and Horsa, A. D. 449. Sharon Turner thus describes the times of their invasion: "Hitherto England had been inhabited by branches of the Kimmerian and Keltic races, apparently visited by the Phenicians and Carthaginians, and afterwards occupied by the Roman military and colonists.

From this successive population it had obtained all the benefits which each could impart. But in the fifth century, the period had arrived when both England and the south of Europe were to be possessed and commanded by a new description of people, who had been gradually amid the wars and vicissitudes of the Germanic continent; and to be as to manners, laws, and institutions peculiarly their own, and adapted, as the great results have shown, to produce national and social improvements, superior to those which either Greece or Rome had attained.

The Anglo-Saxon invasion of Britain must therefore not be contemplated as a barbarization of the country. Our Saxon ancestors brought with them a superior domestic and moral character, and the rudiments of new political, juridical, and intellectual blessing. An interval of slaughter and desolation unavoidably occurred before they established their new systems in the island. But when they had completed their conquest, they laid the foundations of that national constitution, of that internal polity, of those peculiar customs, of that female modesty, and of that vigor and direction of mind, to which Great Britain owes the social progress which it has eminently acquired. Some parts of the civilization which they found in the island assisted to produce this great result. Their desolations removed much of the moral degeneracy we have before alluded to."

Great Britain was ruled by the Romans four centuries. From their departure till the Saxon conquest. The various petty sovereigntes which arose, were constantly contending for the supremacy. When Hengist and Horsa, two twin brothers, and descendants from Wodon, came before the "king and British chiefs, they were holding a public council, on the best means to repel their Irish and Scottish enemies, and it was agreed to employ these Saxon adventurers as subsidiary soldiers." These Irish and Picts were pirates, and, therefore, they often returned. More Saxons came, and the island was finally conquered by the Saxons.

This is sufficient to show the time when, and the way in which the Saxons gained possession of the British islands, which they held for five hundred years till conquered by the Normans, another tribe of Germans. It will be seen that the Saxons belonged to the second, or Gothic, German, or Scythian emigration. They were behind the Kimmerian or the first emigration. But the Saxon element is the peculiar power of the British nation. It is formed of a combination of people of various other nationalities. Still the Saxon was its bone and sinew. Without the Saxon blood we should never have heard of a British empire. The Saxon being the vital and active element of the British empire, has demanded special notice, which we have given it. We have been particular in tracing their Asiatic origin; giving Sharon Turner as our authority, whose authority on the origin and history of the Saxons is undisputed. We have been at great pains to obtain a copy of "Anglo-Saxon History," and esteem it very highly. When we quote Sharon Turner, his history lies open before us. We thus speak, because we see some persons ascribing to him what he does not say.

The direct testimony on which we rely to prove the origin of the Anglo-Saxon, or British nation, is the historic chain following that people from Abraham to the establishment of that empire in the British Islands. What we shall hereafter address, will be collateral testimony, designed to strengthen the primary chain, as strands twining about it.

Corroborative evidence, 1. From B. C. 1200 to B. C. 720—480 years, the Hebrews had commercial intercourse with Spain, and the British Isles. Aside from any direct historical proof, the proposition is reasonable. It is not probable that an active, enterprising people, as the children of Israel had shown themselves to be, among the Canaanites, in their agressive, exterminating wars; and with such an extended sea-coast, would confine themselves to their own narrow tribal limits. Such is not the disposition of man. He is constantly pushing his researches into the unseen. Something new, just out of sight charms him, and he moves onward into the unknown. Other countries were to the Hebrews what Central Africa and the poles are to modern explorers. The land of Goshen was not out of traditional memory. That bondage was hard, but the living was good. They soon became quite intimate with the Phenicians, inhabiting a district on the sea-coast north of Palestine, whose principal cities were Tyre and Sidon. The Phenicians were the great maritime and commercial people of the ancient world; originally Canaanites. With these ancient sea-kings, the Jewish tribes that dwelt by the sea, associated with that people, Palestine being the granary of Phenicia. The Phenicians founded Carthage, traded in Spain and in the British Isles, when David conquered Edom. The command of Ezion-geber, opened to the Jews the navigation of the Red Sea. In the days of Solomon the Hebrews became, by the aid of the Phenicians, a maritime nation. But in the days of Deborah, the tribe of Dan had vessels in the Great Sea. This we learn from her song B. C. 1286. "And why did Dan remain in ships? Asher continued on the sea-shore, and abode in his breaches (creeks)." Judg. v. 17. Dan was not in the battle; neither was Asher, since their commercial relationships with the enemy kept them neutral. Under the reign of Solomon every country was tributary to its boundless researches for the wealth and productions of every clime, were transported to Jerusalem. J. P. WEETHEE.

A BRIEF REVIEW.

"Beloved, when I gave all diligence to write unto you of the common salvation, it was needful for me to write unto you, and exhort you that ye should earnestly contend for the faith which was once delivered unto the saints." Jude 3.

It was under divine guidance that he was moved "to write" this exhortation, that it might be handed down to us, to whom it is just as "needful" as it was to those who read it while the ink was yet fresh upon the parchment. Fierce and long rages the battle against error, and will rage till the great "Captain of our salvation" appears on the field and crowns our struggles with victory.

A pamphlet of 160 pages, published in 1881—the name of the writer does not appear on the title-page—has been handed to me with a request that I would say something against its errors. Without undertaking to mention all these, or to examine them in the order of their occurrence, I will begin at what it affirms of the deceased heathen who never heard the gospel. It says, "All lost life; not of their own will or choice, in the first Adam; all receive life at the hands of the second Adam, equally without their will or choice. When thus brought to life, having the love of God testified to them, their probation, their first chance, begins." p. 42.

But Paul writes very differently of the heathen. After vividly describing their sinful condition without law, he says, "As many as have sinned without law shall also perish without law." He does not say they shall be raised to a millennial probation or chance of salvation. If it be enquired, "When shall they perish without law?" the answer—skipping for a moment the three parenthetic verses—is, "In the day when God shall judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ according to my gospel." Rom. ii. 12–16. And the Master, by dividing the dead into two great classes, excludes the notion that the dead heathen are to come forth to a millennial probation. He says, "All that are in the graves shall hear his voice and shall come forth; they that have done good unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil unto the resurrection of damnation." Jno. v. 29. Certainly the deceased heathen in worshipping idols, "have done evil;" hence, if raised, theirs must be "the resurrection of damnation." Paul enumerates a few of their evil doings. "As they did not like to retain God in their knowledge, God gave them over to a reprobate mind, to do those things which are not convenient; being filled with all unrighteousness, fornication, wickedness, covetousness, maliciousness; full of envy, murder, debate, deceit, malignity; whisperers, backbiters, haters of God, despiteful, proud, boasters, inventors of evil things, disobedient to parents, without understanding, covenant breakers, without natural affection, implacable, unmerciful: who knowing the judgment of God that they which commit such things are worthy of death, not only do the same, but have pleasure in them that do them." Rom. i. 28–32.

The heathen believe not, and hence they need no millennial chance or probation to show whether they shall be worthy of condemnation, for "He that believeth not is condemned already." Jno. iii. 18. The Bible does not promise idolaters—as most of the dead heathen were—a part in the millennial probation, but "in the lake of fire and brimstone which is the second death." Rev. xxi. 8. None but the "blessed and holy" have part in the first resurrection, which occurs at the beginning of the millennium. How then can the deceased heathen, who, if they rise at all, must be included among "the rest of the dead" that do not rise "until the thousand years are finished," have a probation in that thousand years? Rev. xx. 5, 6. All who are not believers are designated by Paul as "the rest, which have no hope." 1 Thes. iv. 13, R. V. But if there were a millennial chance in reserve for "the rest," this would be a very bright hope.

This pamphlet quotes the promise that "all the families of the earth" shall be blessed in Abraham and his seed as proof that the deceased heathen will rise and enjoy that blessedness. pp. 130 and 148. Of course it must be understood that "all the families" here means "all the nations," for so Paul quotes the promise, "In thee shall all nations be blessed." Gal. iii. 8. In that promise the Hebrew for "families" is mishpachah, one of the meanings of which, according to the Lexicon of Gesenius, is, "a whole people, nation." For example, "the family of Egypt" means "the nation of Egypt." Zec. xiv. 18. But neither of these expressions, "families" or "nations"—in the Abrahamic promise, means all the deceased members of those families or nations. When I ask a friend, "How is your family?" am I enquiring after all the deceased ancestry of the family, that ever lived and died since the foundation of the world? When the Lord threatened to bring Nebuchadnezzar and "all the families of the north" against Judea and carry the Jews captive to Babylon seventy years, are we absurdly to suppose the deceased members of those northern families were raised and conscripted into Nebuchadnezzar's army of invasion? Jer. xxv. 9–11.

Taking into view the general tenor of Scripture, I cannot suppose the promise to bless "all nations" in Abraham and his seed had any reference to the unrighteous dead of those nations, even those who had died before Abraham was born. Examples abound in which "all nations" means simply the people living at the time, without any reference to their deceased ancestors. "Darius wrote to all people, nations, and languages." Dan. vi. 25. Does any one suppose that all the former generations of each of those nations were raised from the dead to read what he wrote? "All nations shall serve Nebuchadnezzar." Jer. xxvii. This has been fulfilled, but its fulfilment did not require the resurrection of any one to "serve" the Babylonian king. "I will break the yoke of Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon from the neck of all nations within the space of two full years." Jer. xxviii. 11. This, too, was fulfilled without raising the dead of those nations. "The kings of Assyria have laid waste all the nations and their countries." Isa. xxxvii. 18. But many individuals of those nations had gone to sleep in the dust long before the first king of Assyria was born, hence, the phrase "all the nations" could have no reference to those deceased individuals. Power was given unto the Beast "over all nations." Rev. xiii. 7. By the sorceries of Babylon "were all nations deceived." Rev. xviii. 23. These examples, it seems to me, point out with sufficient clearness the usus loquendi of the phrase "all nations," and what is meant by it in the promise to Abraham. Why carry the gospel to the heathen if by letting them alone they would be entitled to a millennial chance—which would be a far better chance—of hearing it? Think of a missionary going among the heathen and telling them that his coming would not only create divisions and persecutions among them in this life, but, worse than all, would also, after their resurrection, deprive them of a millennial opportunity of being saved! Would not such a doctrine be sad tidings instead of "glad tidings" to them? Which of us, if we had the privilege of choosing would not infinitely prefer a millennial chance to a present chance of obtaining a salvation? It will be so much easier to learn and practice what is right in that dispensation, when a multitude of errors and vices that now delude and ensnare mankind will be banished from the world, for Satan will be bound to prevent his deceiving the nations, and "they shall call Jerusalem the throne of the Lord;"—a name now given to heaven, Matt. v. 34;—"and all the nations shall be gathered unto it, to the name of the Lord, to Jerusalem: neither shall they walk any more after the imagination of their evil heart." Jer. iii. 17. And not only will they worship the Lord in his own appointed way while gathered to the annual feast at Jerusalem, but also when returned to their homes in the remotest parts of the world, for "the King, the Lord of hosts," "will famish all the gods of the earth; and men shall worship him, every one from his place, even all the isles of the heathen;" and "the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea." Zec. xiv. 16; Zeph. ii. 11; Isa. xi. 9. And then too, in addition to other advantages, we would all, must be included among "the rest of the dead" that do not rise "until the thousand years are finished," have a probation in that thousand years? Rev. xx. 5, 6. All who are not believers are designated by Paul as "the rest, which have no hope." 1 Thes. iv. 13, R. V. Zec. xiv. 16; Zeph. ii. 11; Isa. xi. 9. And then too, in addition to other advantages, we would they were [illegible] himself bearing that [illegible] apostolic age, for he immediately [illegible] "whereunto I am ordained a preacher and an apostle." To Titus he expresses nearly the same idea in other words, when he says that God "hath in due times manifested his word through preaching which is committed unto me." Titus i. 3. The "due times" and the testimony, therefore, had already come, for he uses the perfect tense,—"hath in due times manifested."

"The grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men." Titus ii. 11. Why did not the pamphlet-writer construe "all" to include the deceased heathen here as well as in the phrase "a ransom for all?" It would, in that case, appear that they have already had the offer of salvation. Rightly interpreted, however, "all" in these places means both Jews and Gentiles, Barbarian, Scythian, bond and free,—all kinds and degrees of people. "All" must frequently be restricted in its meaning by the context and the subject spoken of. Thus servants are to please their masters "in all things." Titus ii. 9. "The Lord upholdeth all that fall, and raiseth up all those that be bowed down." Psa. cxlv. 14. The apostles were to "be hated of all men." Matt. x. 22. "All men" came to Jesus. Jno. iii. 26.

"God is love," but as to what number or proportion of sinners must be saved to exemplify this truth, sinful man is not capable of deciding. It must be left to the perfect wisdom of God as revealed in his Holy Word. I think we may safely say there will be enough destroyed to exemplify his justice, and enough saved to exemplify his love; for both attributes, justice and love, are rightly proportioned and perfectly adjusted in the heavenly balances of divine wisdom.

As to religious light, the four thousand years from Adam to Christ were not so dark and blank as some suppose. A "testimony" to the great truth of redemption through Christ was faithfully "borne" by prophecy, type, and sacrifice; all pointing to that "one sacrifice" which in every age has been the believer's ground of hope. This testimony was borne by a long succession and "great cloud of witnesses" from Abel to John the Baptist. So that, with the light that has ever blazed from those two royal volumes—the book of revelation and the book of nature—the idolaters were then and are now inexcusable. Nor were the image-worshippers entitled to a millennial probation "through the ignorance that is in them," but on the contrary they were by that very ignorance "alienated from the life of God." Eph. iv. 18.

The pamphlet says, "We think we have good, solid reasons, not imaginations, nor dreams, nor visions, but Bible evidences that we are now in the days of the Son of man: that 'the day of the Lord' has come, and Jesus, a spiritual body is present, harvesting the gospel age." p. 71. On the preceding page it says, "Some may have confounded these remarks on the presence of Christ in a spiritual body with the presence of the spirit of Christ, but they are quite distinct. The latter never left the church; consequently, in that sense, he could not 'come again.' Of his spiritual presence he said: 'Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world'—age. We refer to the personal presence which did go away, and was to come again—a spiritual body."

But to say the day has come and that Christ is now personally and bodily present on earth, is an error plainly condemned by Paul who says, "Be not quickly shaken from your mind, nor yet be troubled, either by spirit, or by word, or by epistle as from us, as that the day of the Lord is now present; let no man beguile you in any wise." 2 Thes. ii. 2. R. V. This version correctly represents the Greek here. The true Christian is not "troubled" or "shaken" by hearing that the day of the Lord is "at hand," for Scripture uniformly teaches that it is. But to believe that the Lord personally came as long ago as 1881, and that the righteous dead have been caught up to meet him in the air, and to know that we have not been "caught up together with them," would be enough to trouble us, for we would have to conclude we were not accounted worthy of salvation, and were left to perish with the wicked 1 Thes. iv. 17. Perhaps this conclusion would drive the best believers into despair and apostasy. They would have to conclude, also, "that the resurrection is past already;" and those in the early times who taught this, "overthrew the faith of some," and Paul says, "their word will eat as doth a canker." 2 Tim. ii. 17, 18. To think the Lord came several years ago might lead us to abandon the communion-table also, for that was only to be observed "till he come." 1 Cor. xi. 26.

The undisturbed graves of the right-

[illegible] this pamphlet-writer says, a "spiritual" body, in rising, will not make "a hole in the ground." p. 67. But at the Savior's resurrection the stone, too heavy for the women, had to be "rolled away" by an angel to afford his body an exit. And when the disciples entered the sepulchre they "found not his body" there, but saw "the linen clothes laid by themselves." Luke xxiv. 2, 3, 12. Our bodies are to be "fashioned like unto his;" hence, his risen body is a pattern of what ours will be, if we are saved. Phil. iii. 21.

Of his appearances after rising, this pamphlet says, "None of the various forms or bodies in which he appeared were his body." p. 82. To support this it quotes, "He appeared in another form to two of them as they went into the country." Mark xvi. 12. Since it has so much to say of so-called "interpolations," why did it not inform the reader that the R. V. has the following note on Mark xvi.: "The two oldest Greek manuscripts, and some other authorities omit from verse 9 to the end. Some other authorities have a different ending to the gospel."

But I am not at all contending for its omission; let us therefore take the portion as genuine, still it fails to prove that he appeared, "in various bodies." The word here rendered "form" is morphee, which is never rendered "body" in Scripture. According to the Greek Concordance it occurs but twice more in the N. T.—Phil. ii. 6, 7. "In another form," then, means in another external appearance of dress, that is, as a traveller, and not as "the gardener," nor in the dress he usually wore. That he had his own countenance is shown by the fact that "their eyes were holden" to prevent them from recognizing him, and as soon as that restraint on their eyes was taken off, "they knew him." Luke xxiv. 16, 31.

The pamphlet says, "In each instance he is said to have appeared or showed himself, language never used of him before his change from a natural to a spiritual body." p. 60. But the Scripture says, "Now once in the end of the world hath Christ appeared to put away sin by sacrifice of himself." Heb. ix. 26. Of course it was in the "natural" body that he "appeared" before being sacrificed.

Of the ancient Jews it says, "We can hardly impress too strongly the fact that all of the promises ever held out to the Jews during previous ages, were only such as pertain to the natural man—i. e., natural life, prosperity and blessing. The first offer of anything spiritual was made by Jesus to those who believe on him during this gospel age." p. 138. But the Scriptures teach that "the gospel" was preached to Abraham and the ancient Jews. Gal. iii. 8; Heb. iv. 2. Certainly it would be the climax of absurdity to say that the gospel does not contain the "offer of anything spiritual." Paul says, "I stand and am judged for the hope of the promise made of God unto our fathers;" thus identifying his hope with theirs. Acts. xxvi. 6. To the ancient Jews it was said, "Many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life," Dan. xii. 2; and the very same life is offered to us: "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." Jno. iii. 16. "He that soweth to the spirit shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting." Gal. vi. 8. David among the patriarchs and John among the apostles had the same hope of ultimately "partaking of the divine nature," for one says, "I shall be satisfied when I awake with thy likeness," and the other, "When we see him we shall be like him." Psa. xvii. 15; 1 Jno. iii. 2. The mercies covenanted to David are promised all believers, for the Lord says, "I will give to you" the pronoun here is plural—"the sure mercies of David." Acts xiii. 34. "Ye shall see Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, and all the prophets in the kingdom of God," and no man can enter that kingdom unless born of the Spirit. Luke xiii. 28; Jno. iii. 5. Is there not something truly "spiritual" and above the "natural" body in the nature of one born of the Spirit?

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXII. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, JUNE 20, 1883. NO. 23.

THE RESTITUTION.

TERMS--TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR, Payable in advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.

Address all Letters and Communications to The Restitution, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

The Restitution advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of Kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel: the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

BRITISH PHASE OF THE EASTERN QUESTION.--No. 81.

Prelude--Is Jesus of Nazareth the legal heir to David's throne? Genealogy of the seed-line from the ending of the kingdom to the birth of Christ--What relationship has Christ's first Advent with Gen. xlix. 10, and Ezek. xxi. 25, 26, 27?--Line of tribes is continued--Historical chain through Central Asia, Europe, to the Island of Great Britain, independent of Irish tradition--c. How far Irish legends should be credited.

Prelude.—Is Jesus of Nazareth the legal heir to David's throne? Why propose such a question? Who calls it in question? We reply. A theory may be such as to render Jesus' title rather doubtful. The Jewish nation, at Christ's first Advent, decided against his claim. If we cannot establish his genealogical title and admit that the seed-line to David's throne, was, at that very time, occupied legally, in the Isles of the West, was not Jesus of Nazareth an impostor as the Jews claimed? how could he fill a throne that is legally occupied? He claimed to be, when here, the legal heir to David's throne. If it was then legally filled, somewhere else, where is the validity of his claim? It is a matter of serious doubt whether David's throne can be legally filled in any other place than in Jerusalem. Hear Jehovah speak when he is about to rend the kingdom, "Notwithstanding in thy days I will not do it (rend the kingdom) for David thy father's sake: (but) I will rend it out of the hand of thy son. Howbeit I will not rend away all the kingdom; (but) will give one tribe (Benjamin) to thy son (who was of Judah) for David my servant's sake, and for Jerusalem's sake which I have chosen." 1 Kings xi. 12, 13, (see Deut. xiii. 17). Ten tribes were to be rent from the twelve tribes. Two tribes and the city, its temple and worship still continued. That kingdom still held the line of the seed, and, consequently, the sceptre. For, why should God say, "For David thy father's sake," "and for Jerusalem's sake," if he did not mean this. I have promised to David, "Thy seed shall endure forever, and thy throne as the sun before me." Psa. lxxxix. 36. Now, lest that oath should seem to fail, I will still continue two tribes, the city, and the temple my house.

It is said, "That the throne of David and the kingdom of Israel must be in existence somewhere; and, moreover, they must have had a continuous existence throughout all these centuries." "Who is it that has read history that does not know that Judah, or the Jews, never had the sceptre of dominion for one day, since the days of Zedekiah, no, not for an hour."—Pool.

The transfer of David's throne from Mount Zion, to the British Isles, on the fall of Jerusalem, in the days of Zedekiah, is here distinctly taught. Hence, Jerusalem, and the temple cease to contain David's line (royal) and his worship, as established under David and Solomon. If so, what become of the genealogies of Jesus of Nazareth as given by Matthew and Luke? Why does not the genealogy follow the house of David into the Western Isles?"—What reason can be given that Matthew and Luke should follow the line of Judah at Jerusalem, rather than in Ireland, Scotland and England? Why not trace the family of David in the British Isles, until it gives birth to the true heir, somewhere in the future, according to the expectation of the Jews?

Genealogy of Matthew. — The first of the genealogy, after the captivity commenced, Matthew gives as follows: —"And after they were brought to Babylon, Jechonias begat Salathiel; and Salathiel begat Zorobabel (Zerubbabel, born at Babel). Of Zerubbabel Dr. Wm. Smith, in his Dictionary of the Bible, says, "The head of the tribe of Judah at the time of the return from the Babylonish captivity in the first year of Cyrus. He was appointed by the Persian king to the office of governor of Judæa.... Zerubbabel was the legal successor and heir of Jechoniah's royal estate, the grandson of Neri, and the lineal descendant of Nathan the son of David." Matthew traces the house of David into Babylon; and out of Babylon to Jerusalem, after the captivity, instead of tracing it to the British Isles. Matthew's genealogy, after Zerubbabel, has the following order: Abiud, Eliakim, Azor, Sadoc, Achim, Eliud, Eleazar, Matthan, Jacob, Joseph the husband of Mary, of whom was born Jesus, who is called Christ. So all the generations from Abraham to David (are) fourteen generations; and from David until the carrying away into Babylon (are) fourteen generations: and from the carrying away into Babylon until Christ (are) fourteen generations." The line comes down through Rehoboam the son of Solomon.

When Christ rode into Jerusalem, "The multitudes that went before, and they that followed, cried, saying, Hosanna to the Son of David: Blessed (is) he that cometh in the name of the Lord; Hosanna in the highest." Matt. xxi. 9. The two blind men said, "Have mercy on us, O Lord (thou) Son of David." Matt. xx. 30. Paul says of Jesus, the Christ, "Declared (to be) the Son of God with power, according to Spirit of holiness, by his resurrection from the dead." Rom. i. 4. An unbroken genealogy from David to Christ is traced from Palestine to Babylon to Jerusalem and continues there till Christ, the heir to David's throne, is born. There the genealogy ceases because its design is accomplished. Another genealogy would make David's throne occupied by one of his sons in the West at the very time that these multitudes were crying, Hosanna in Jerusalem. The words of Jacob Gen. xlix. 10, we think, establish the same genealogical chain.—In a former number this prediction has been somewhat fully considered. Some other supplementary thoughts will now be considered.

"Sceptre," "Lawgiver," "Shiloh," are terms that may be still further explained, sceptre and lawgiver, mean short staff, tribal (1 Sam. x. 19, 20), and long staff, or judge's staff. The idea is this, Judah shall have a tribal and judicial existence till Shiloh come: —there shall be princes and governors in Judah till Shiloh comes, and unto him shall be the gathering of the people. The other tribes shall be lost, but Judah (Jews) shall continue in some organized form till Shiloh comes. These verses (vs. 10, 11) contain divine predictions which have been accomplished, or will be in the future. This is readily admitted. Yet the true import of the word "Shiloh," is differently understood. It is said that Shiloh means "rest." Shiloh is used twenty times in the Bible, yet it is first used by Jacob in Gen. xlix. Suppose that in every other passage it means a "resting place," or town, does that decide its first meaning? what God intended by this word is not stated. All proper names have some original meaning: more particularly those found in the Bible; but does this fact do away with their personality, or local identity? Jacob's two names did not do away with his personal identity. Admit that the term Shiloh was localized, does that prove that the word where first used, is not the name of a person, given him because of some distinctive characteristic? Jacob's (supplanter) name is changed to Israel (prince of God) should there be a thousand of persons, tribes, places and things called Israel, the original import would remain the same. "Shiloh come," implies an agent. So does the expression, "And unto him (shall) the gathering of the people (be)." The same may be said of vs. 11, "Binding his (Shiloh's, not Judah's) foal unto the vine, and his ass's colt (Matt. xxi. 2) unto the choice vine; he washed his garments in wine; and his clothes in the blood of grapes." Such expressions will suit an agent but not a town nor a quality. We do not speak of a town's coming, nor binding his foal to a vine; nor washing its garments, etc. It is true, towns and cities are personified, but no person will presume thus to interpret these verses.

The objection to the common interpretation seems to be founded on a certain historic mistake; viz., that Judah's sceptre of dominion ceased with Zedekiah. We affirm that Judah had his tribal existence, and his judicial power though in a state reduced from that of its former condition, from the Babylonish captivity to the close of the genealogies of Matthew and Luke, for fourteen generations, when Jesus of Nazareth was born: that Ezek. xxi. 25, 26, 27, is a clear exposition of Gen. xlix. 10, 11 (see.) A few thoughts relative what Ezekiel says will explain Judah's position till Christ appeared. 1. It was necessary that there be an unbroken genealogy of the house of David till Christ should come, in order to prove his right to David's throne. The propriety of this position will be seen. 2. Judah's position during these fourteen generations is one of chastisement; yet it does not violate his God's oath to David. God has to chastise his people, as a parent his children.

Yet, with all God's chastisement of Judah, the following is true, "The tribe of Judah shall not cease to exist as a people, and have a government of its own until the Redeemer shall appear." On this point Calvin thus speaks, "Si quis excipiat aliter sonare verba Jacob, solutio in promptu est quid-quid unquam dens de externo cultu statuit promisit, ita fuisse restringendum, ut judicia non interim exercerel punitendis hominum peccatis fidemque suorum probaret;" which, if liberally construed is as follows:—If any one is disposed to put another meaning on Jacob's words, this reply is at hand, his language is so to be restricted, that whatever God has promised concerning the external condition of the Church, in the meantime he claims the right of punishment for their sins, and rewarding for their fidelity.

"The temporary cessation of the national subsistence, therefore, as for example, during the Babylonish exile—granting that the tradition of the Jews, that they still existed as a people, and had governors of their own; during that period, is not to be believed—can as little disprove the truth of this prediction, as the period of unbelief and apostacy which is passing away destroys the truth of the promise which Christ gave to his New Testament church. If we take this into consideration, we shall see that history most strikingly confirms this part of the prediction; while the ten tribes have never had a national existence, since they were carried away into captivity, the tribe of Judah returned, and continued to subsist till the appearance of the Messiah, while the other tribes, with their institutions and privileges, had long before passed away. If any one is disposed, with many interpreters, to go further, for which however there is properly no sufficient reason, and find in this verse a prediction, not only of the continuance of the national self-subsistence of the tribe of Judah until the coming of the Shiloh, but also of its superiority over the other tribes, history will supply him with the evidence of its fulfilment. Even during the journey through the wilderness, and afterwards in the times of the Judges, this tribe maintained a certain pre-eminence; with the elevation of the house of David it obtained the regal dominion. After the division of the kingdom, it had the advantage of possessing Jerusalem, the legal capital and the temple; after the return from the captivity, it gave the name to the whole nation; and the high council was established within its limits, which decided in temporal and spiritual affairs. Even under the dominion of the Romans it retained no inconsiderable power."—Hengstenberg.

BAPTISM INTO THE NAME.

It is with astonishment that I have read of late much that has been published both in tract form and in periodicals, about the "formula" of baptism; baptism into the three names, baptism into the name of Christ only, "trine-immersion," etc. There appears to me to be a lack of light, and a misapprehension of the mind of the Spirit, as well as of the words of Christ and the apostles on those subjects, to some extent. As there is "one God and Father of all," "one Lord," "one Spirit," "one faith," "one hope," "one, or not another gospel," "one body," "one baptism," so there is one name—"the name." "Neither is there salvation IN any other: for there is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved." Acts iv. 12. This one name is "above every name" and was "given" to Christ, that at the name of JESUS every knee should bow." Phil. ii. 9. "He hath by inheritance obtained a more excellent name than the angels"—the name of his "Father—unit," "being an exact impress of his Father's substance." Heb. ii. 1-5. (Dia.) The Spirit also bears the same one name—"GOD's Spirit"—"Spirit of GOD." "God is a SPIRIT." John iv. 24. God, Jesus, and Spirit are ONE in substance and name. Hence it is unscriptural and improper, so to talk of three names—the names of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. Christ did not say baptizing them into the names, but "baptizing them into THE NAME." Therefore to be baptized "into (eis) the name of the Lord Jesus," as in Acts viii. 16; xix. 5, was, and still is, exactly the same as to be baptized into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. It was into the same one name.

It is evident that the writer of Acts, in his account of the baptisms by Philip in Samaria, Acts viii. 16, did not consider it necessary to mention what Christ had stated once for all in the commission, Matt. xxviii. 19, that the name of the anointed Jesus was the same one name of his Father and of the Holy Spirit. Neither did any of the apostles consider it necessary, and for reasons which will hereafter appear. But in Acts x. 48, we are informed that Peter "commanded them to (en. that is, by the authority of) the name of the Lord, to be baptized;" but, in that place, he did not even say into any name: although it was doubtless understood by those to whom he spoke, that he, by the authority of the Lord, commanded them to be baptized into the one NAME, as Christ had told them to do: for, Peter had previously said, as in chapter ii. 38, "Be baptized every one of you in (epi, that is, for, or with a view to) the name of Jesus Christ." This one name signifies more than can be comprehended and expressed by any word in the human language. It includes all the eternal Spirit substance and attributes of the Supreme Being. It is called "this glorious and fearful name, THE LORD THY GOD," Deut. xxviii. 58; (although not a correct rendering as will hereafter appear.) All the members of the "one body," like Paul, "bear" that one name. Acts ix. 15. Having been taken out of the Gentiles "for his name," by the preaching of the one gospel, and the name having been called, or placed or named upon them at baptism, by being "baptized into the name," (see Acts xv. 14-17, Greek text, Diaglott; Acts i. 5; 2 Chron. vii. 14, margin; Gen. iv. 26, margin; Num. vi. 27;) they have thus "put on Christ," Gal. iii. 27, or become constituents of his "body," members of that "whole family in heaven and earth," Eph. iii. 14, to whom the following language may be applied, namely, "that they might be unto me for a people ("peculiar people," 1 Peter ii. 9) and FOR A NAME, and for a praise, and for a glory." Jer. xiii. 11.

But as to a "formula" of words for baptisms, there is no such thing given or taught in the Scriptures. There is a "form of doctrine," Rom. vi. 17, and a "form of sound words" by which to express the doctrine, 2 Tim. i. 13, and also a "form of godliness," chap. iii. 5, but no such thing as a formula of induction into the one name. Our Savior, in sending forth his disciples —his chosen ones—to save the people, and giving them their orders or commission, as recorded by Matt. xxviii. 19, and Mark xvi. 16, simply commanded them to "teach or preach to all nations the gospel," and them who heard and believed, to "baptize into the name (not names) being particular to show them by his language, that it was the one name of the Father, and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit—the one and only name "given among men whereby we must be saved." He did not tell them what words they must make use of to thus induct the believers into the name, nor that it was absolutely necessary to make use of any words. He told them what to do. He instructed them as to what they must teach and preach, and then what they were to do to them that believed. His instructions relative to baptism were as to the act and not as to any "formula" of words in the performance of the act. He told them that those to whom they preached, must believe and be baptized, in order to be saved. He told them that the thing to be done, the act to be performed by and for the believer, was immersion in water, in "obedience to the faith," Rom. i. 5; and xvi. 26, which the apostles understood to be a burial "in the likeness of his death," Rom. vi. 4, 5, which he had suffered and just then risen from; and likewise a representation and pledge of their own resurrection in the future.

As before said, he gave them no instructions, as to what should be SAID either by the one being immersed, or by the immerser, when the act was being performed. Neither have we anything in the writings of the apostles, requiring any "formula" or words of any kind to be made use of. But we are distinctly taught faith in Christ—faith in the gospel—and confession, must precede immersion, so that baptism may be "obedience to the faith." Rom. i. 5. No person can possibly obey the faith before he has the faith. Hence to talk about being "baptized into the faith," as some both talk and write, is to talk without a proper understanding of the matter. Baptism is clearly a representation of Christ's death, burial and resurrection, but not of the act of his dying. Hence to talk about immersing with the face downward or forward, because it is said of Jesus in the act of dying, "he bowed his head and gave up the ghost," looks to us as betraying a lack of attention to the Word, and a consequent misapprehension of the fact that baptism does not represent Christ until he was dead—until after he had bowed his head and died. And some think, the whole of "trine immersion" can be clearly shown to be destitute of Scriptural foundation.

When the "one body," of name-bearers, which are now being "taken out of the Gentiles for the name," shall have been completed—shall have arrived "unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ," Eph. iv. 13; then the ONE NAME, as applied to the full complement of divine joint rulers with Christ in his kingdom will also be complete.

A name is intended to be significant of the nature and constitution of the thing named, including every feature of its entire make-up, and the object for which it is made, or the work it is to accomplish. To illustrate: The name "Threshing Machine" at once suggests to the mind all this, the materials of which it is constructed, its form and make-up as a whole, the work it is to do, etc. So, although no word can fully express it, yet the name of the Deity—the name which is above every name—embraces everything attributable to him. It is significant of his uncreated, self-existent spirit nature, and all his infinite, immaculate attributes. It includes everything attributable to the Father, Son and Holy Spirit. He has the power to cause himself, that is, his spirit substance nature, and attributes to be manifested and developed in many future beings, as in Jesus anointed; one in many and many in one; hence his name as rendered in our version, Jehovah, or more correctly as in the Hebrew, Yahweh, and Yahweh Elohim, indicated and memorialized, his future manifestation in a multitude, or "one body," of which Christ is the "beginning" and "head," which one body will comprise the "first fruits" (James i. 18; Rev. xiv. 4) of a numberless multitude (Rev. vii. 9) a "new creation." Rev. iii. 14.

According to the best Hebrew scholars the name "Jehovah," or more properly Eheyh, or Yahweh, (Ex. vi. 3) which was made known to Moses at the burning bush, and rendered in our version "I AM," and "I AM THAT I AM." (Ex. iii. 14, 15), should be rendered, "I will be," and, "I will be who I will be," and Yahweh, as a noun of the third person, future tense, signifies "He who will be," of which name God said, "This is my name forever, and this is my MEMORIAL unto all generations." Ex. iii. 15. This memorial name, reminds his people that he will be manifested in a multitude, a multitudinous manifestation of the one Deity, that his name shall become a great people in whom his own divine nature shall be manifested, who shall be in name, character and motive, the Elohim, the one Yahweh, in spirit manifestation—Yahweh Elohim—that his children, his family shall possess his nature, signified by his name. This multitude body will be essentially one, because one in natural attributes and character. The one name of this body being significant of the spirit nature and character of all its members—the nature of "the Father, of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named." Eph. iii. 14, 15. As before said, the name means the nature. Christ now has that divine or spirit nature. When they are baptized into Christ, they become name-bearers mentally and morally and will ultimately be so physically. As a son takes the name of his father, and upon the principle of "like begets like," also the same nature, and generally to a certain extent, his character, so Christ said, "I am come in my Father's name." He and the Father are one. Not one person, but, in the words of Moses, "one YAHWEH"—one spirit substance, one in character, purpose—name. He is the first and chief Elohh of the Elohim body or name. "Jesus,—Heb. Yahweh-Shua, i. e., Yah-Shua or Joshua. Yah or Jah, I shall be; and SHUA, Powerful—hence the name signifies, "I shall be Powerful." "Thou shalt call his name JESUS," for this reason: "Because HE will save his PEOPLE from their sins." Dio. Matt. i. 21.

This NAME of Deity is now being taken out or made up of individuals out of "all nations, and kindreds, and peoples, and tongues," by the one faith in the one gospel, in order to constitute a "seed of Abraham," who become one constitutionally, by being baptized into the name. This name though essentially one, will comprise a numberless multitude. This one in many, or multitudinous name, is the great name by which the world is to be ruled and saved in the age to come. It is to be the great Yahweh-Elohistic name of the future; in "that day when there shall be one Lord, and his name one." No person can be made a partaker of the divine nature and eternal life, who does not, by the appointed means—faith and obedience in and to the gospel—become a constituent of this one sin-covering and saving name. The Heavenly Father of the divine family, has appointed that the very first step of obedience—baptism,—shall introduce the believer into the name; in that act his sins shall be remitted, he become a begotten son, and the name be placed or named upon him; by that act he shall become an element of the great saving name, in mind and character; ultimately to become so in nature upon condition of "patient continuance in well doing, thus seeking for glory and honor and immortality." Rom. ii. 7.

I have said that neither our Savior nor the apostles commanded the observance or use of any formula of words in performing the act of baptism; that Christ simply taught, once for all, and the apostles doubtless understood, that the great saving name into which the believers were to be baptized is the one name of the Father and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit: and therefore, that baptism into Christ is baptism into the name, because he is the name—the "beginning," the "Head."

This understanding on their part accounts for the absence of anything further on the subject in their record, and for their various ways of expressing even what they did say.

However I don't see any objection to the use of the words of our Savior, Matt. xxviii. 19, in performing the act of baptism. Indeed I think it best to use them, and that uniformity be thus preserved. But the main thing is the proper understanding of the name, and the entire subject, by both the immersed and the immerser, especially the former. It should be borne in mind that the apostles must have done just what Christ told them to do; that was, to baptize into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. But it does not appear that they used that form of words even once, in doing so. Hence the irresistible conclusion that it is not positively necessary to do so, that Christ did not tell them to use those words in performing the act, and that baptism "into the name of the Lord Jesus" is the very same thing.

Report of the Michigan Annual Conference,

The church in Michigan met in annual conference, according to appointment in the School House three and one half miles north of Mendon on Thursday Evening, May 31, 1883. The meeting was called to order by the President. After prayer by Brother Hoyt, the President appointed W. McCrodan, H. S. Miller, and I. H. Chesebrough as committee of arrangements. Brother H. R. Carter delivered a discourse from 2 Tim. iii. 16.

Met for social meeting at 9 a. m. on Friday. At 10:30 a sermon from Brother Hoyt; text, Heb. vi. 18, 19. After a short intermission, Brother W. B. Woodward preached from Gal. iii. 8; subject, The Gospel. In the evening Brother J. S. Hatch spoke, using for a text, "Understandest thou what thou readest?" Acts viii. 30.

Saturday met at 9 a. m. for social meeting, which was opened by Brother Chaplin who read an appropriate selection from the Scripture and offered prayer. He was followed by the brethren and sisters present for one and one-half hours in interesting social meeting.

The business meeting was called to order at 11 a. m. The secretary and treasurer reports were read and accepted. The Evangelist reports were accepted and adopted. After the reports from churches, the election of officers was taken up and resulted as follows: For President, D. F. Spencer of Pine Creek; for Secretary, H. S. Miller of Mendon; for Treasurer, Wm. McCrodan of Dutton; for members of the Executive Board, H. C. Hammond, C. H. Richardson, W. S. Kent G. B. Myers, L. C. Chase, J. Lemon, G. W. Coats, I. H. Chesebrough, and J. S. Alderman. The President read a communication from Brother Simonds of Chicago, formerly of this Conference. On motion a vote of thanks was extended to Brother Simonds. At 12:45 Brother James Watkins spoke from 2 Tim. iv. 2, "Preach the Word." In the evening Brother Chaplin gave a discourse from Gal. i. 11, 12.

Sunday, June 3, met at 9 a. m., when, instead of social meeting, Brother Chaplin gave one of his excellent practical discourses, using 2 Tim. iii. 14 as a text. At 10:30 Brother Hatch spoke from Numbers xiv. 21. At 12 m. Elder Ferris of Galesburg spoke upon "Christian Love," text Rev. ii. 4, 5. In the afternoon a number of the brethren and friends assembled at the water, when one young lady put on Christ by baptism. Met at 7 p. m. for social meeting, which continued one hour, when Brother Chaplin spoke upon our relationship to Christ. The conference closed by partaking of the Lord's Supper.

The Executive Board appointed J. S. Hatch of St. Joseph, Berrien Co., Mich., as State Evangelist. Those desiring his services will address him at that place. The Board also appointed local evangelists as follows: W. D. Woodward of Watson, E. Hoyt of Grand Rapids, I. C. Chase of Adrian, James Watkins of Clayton, and W. McCrodan of Dutton. The attendance at this meeting was fair, the interest good, and the meeting was enjoyed by all present.

How to Test Theories.

We may test theories as we do eye-glasses—put them on and read through them. If the texts or objects appear natural and clear, and the meaning easily understood, we may use that theory till we find a better one. But if the language appears unnatural and the sense not clear, if we must deny the usual sense of one word, ignore the meaning of another, and add to a third a sense seldom or never used by the author or his contemporaries, no doubt the fault is in the theory.

THE RESTITUTION.

E. A. Corwin, Editor.

Plymouth, Indiana, June 20, 1883.

An elegant chart of the Great Pyramid has just come to hand. It is issued by The International Institute for Preserving and Perfecting Weights and Measures. Wilford's Microcosm and Phrenological Journal for June both before us, and both well-filled numbers with articles of interest. Also No. 7 of Biblical Expositor and People's Commentary, from Toronto. We heartily commend this work to Bible students.

In our present number is a letter from Jerusalem by a new correspondent, P. H. Winterstein. We hope to hear from him often and also hope for the continued correspondence of Mrs. A. E. Davis. Our readers will also find a letter from India in another column. We hope the writer will favor us with other communications in the future from Hindostan. We call attention also to a selected article on the present condition of Palestine. Prophesy will be literally fulfilled, "For I will take you from among the heathen, and gather you out of all countries, and will bring you into your own land. And the desolate land shall be tilled, whereas it lay waste and desolate in the sight of all that passed by. And they shall say, This land that was desolate is become like the garden of Eden; the waste and ruined cities are become fenced, and are inhabited." Ezek. xxxvi. 24, 34, 35. The stern logic of events will soon convince the most sceptical that God has not cast away Israel. We subjoin a short clipping from another paper, in connection with a prophecy from Jeremiah: "Fear thou not, O Jacob my servant, saith the Lord: for I am with thee; for I will make a full end of all nations whither I have driven thee; but I will not make a full end of thee, but correct thee in measure; yet will I not leave thee wholly unpunished." Jer. xlvi. 28.

THE WHOLE WORLD BECOMING JEWISH.

Instead of dying out, the Jewish body shows increasing vitality. They cannot be stamped out or swallowed up. They pass from country to country to become practically masters wherever they go. They got the land in Germany and Hungary, and grow rich in Russia; they are the great bankers in London and Paris and the centres of European commerce. In ten (recent) years the Rothschilds furnished £100,000,000 in loans to England, Austria, Prussia, France, Russia, and Brazil. They increase faster than Christians, and of every 100,000 persons only 89 Jews die to 143 Christians.

We take the two following items of interest from the June number of the Glasgow Messenger. The first is significant that the time has come for Palestine to come to the front, and the second that old dead creeds must give place to the living truths.

PROPOSED RAILWAY IN PALESTINE.

It is stated, on good authority, that the first sod of a railway, running from Acre to the River Jordan, just below the Sea of Galilee, will shortly be turned, and that extensive works for opening up Southern Palestine will before long be inaugurated. The Lisaan-al-Hal, of Beyrout, as well as several other Arabic journals, announce that the Porte has granted to a Syrian syndicate a concession authorizing the carrying of a line of railway from the Port of Acre to Jisr-el-Mejami on the Jordan, and thence through the Hauran to Damascus. The principal members of this syndicate are the brothers Sursock, who farm the Plain of Esdraelon. The concession is said to be for a term of ninety-nine years; and the necessary works are to be undertaken at once. The line, it will be seen, runs through the finest agricultural district that could be selected, and when opened up by the projected line of intercommunication with Damascus, will offer unrivalled advantages to settlers, as well as advantageous sites for industrial undertakings and manufactures. At Beisan, once a noted place and a prosperous, there is a water supply abundant and powerful enough to work any kind of machinery, and its situation on the great high roads to the Jordan Land, Southern Palestine, and Egypt, is such as to render its progress and prosperity almost a certainty in the event of the railroad to Damascus becoming an accomplished fact.—Jewish World.

THE LIFE QUESTION IN RELIGION.

The Christian World, of April 26, contains the following paragraph regarding Mr. Byse's congregation, formerly mentioned in these pages:—The adherents to the Rev. Mr. Byse, removed from the pastorate of the church in the Rue Belliard, Brussels, owing to doctrinal differences with the Synod of the Evangelical Society on the question of "Life in Christ," have hired a hall, capable of accommodating about 600 worshippers, in an establishment called the Le Petit Paris, 11 Rue Ducale. The opening service took place on Sunday, and was enumerously attended. Addresses were delivered by Mr. Byse and Mr. E. Petavel, and a letter was read from the Rev. Edward White, expressing the sympathy of the Church in Rawley Road. A correspondent writes—"The fortitude displayed by Mr. Byse's little flock is particularly touching, on account of the fact that they mostly belong to the comparatively poor. The fraternal sympathy of more wealthy fellow-believers will surely be moved in their favor."

Editor Restitution:

I desire to acknowledge your kindness in giving my appeal a place in your columns, and I desire to thank some unknown friend for the copy of THE RESTITUTION, as it appears to be coming regularly (Dear friend, I thank you very much for your kindness), and the perusal of the three numbers (8, 10 and 11) has been very instructive. I like the high tone of the paper very much, and the expository portions have been read by me with great profit. I have no idea as to how you are connected with regard to other papers in sympathy with Life only in Christ, and at his appearing, but I am so glad to have the paper. I sent it on to Bro. Col. Armstrong, and he likes it much. I should like to see copies of Wiley Jones' works. I should think his Key Words ought to be very instructive. If any of your numerous readers would favor me with a copy I shall be obliged; or if you would rather I pay for it, I will write to Bro. Brown, on receipt of the book, and ask him to pay the amount, debiting the same to me."

From the three papers I have read I opine that you believe in the restoration of the Jewish kingdom on the earth. Now I do believe that is a Scriptural position, though many of the American brethren cannot see it. To my mind the question put to the Lord just prior to his ascension can bear no other construction. The question is: Wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel? They had for three years believed that Jesus was the Christ of God, even the King whose right it was to reign, and to my mind the Lord's reply was equivalent to, "You are right as to what you believe about my being the anointed King, to reign in David's place, but you are wrong in supposing that the time for setting up that kingdom has now come."

I am thankful in being able to state that Mr. H. L. Hastings has written to me and proposes doing something in India in the way of publishing here the "Inspiration of the Bible," and I have had a very kind letter from Mr. I. Leslie, of Canada, who is much interested in the work, so I trust that in a few months I shall be able to report progress. At present I am only publishing the Tamil Bible Banner,—as many copies of it as this will bear I enclose. I am still doing all I can to propagate the truth, but the prospect is not encouraging; still there is a spirit of inquiry abroad, that no sect can keep under. I am glad to say that I belong to no sect or party. I am a believer in the Lord Jesus. I call none master but the Lord Jesus, and I love all that love the Lord in sincerity. I am simply learning of the truth, and may hold views that are not scriptural, but I don't do it willingly. Seeing, then that I am so ignorant, I can bear with those who do not see eye to eye with me; but I cannot see how some Christians believe that their friends are alive when they have buried them out of sight in the grave. If those dear children of God do believe even this, that passage about "delusion" and "believing a lie" seems to suggest something very unpleasant to me.

The "Salvationists" have come to Madras, and I believe that in spite of their many errors of doctrine that they are doing a good work. They have crowds of both Europeans and natives to listen to them, their drums, tamborines, etc. One thing they do—they preach a perfect Savior, a present Savior, and a willing Savior, and I certainly bid them God speed.

Mussulmans writes that the truth is spreading rapidly in South Travancore, and that he is going on a preaching tour to Ceylon shortly.

Hoping that the Lord will bless you abundantly in your position of Editor, and your readers in perusing THE RESTITUTION, I remain, dear Sir, yours very sincerely.

J. SPENCE.

THE TRUTH ABOUT PALESTINE.

THE COUNTRY RAPE, FERTILE, AND RELATIVELY VERY PROSPEROUS.

JEWISH FARMERS.

HAIFA, May 10.—Considering the number of tourists, both American and English, who annually visit the Holy Land, I have been much struck with the erroneous impression which still continues to prevail in regard to its availability as a field of colonization, and as an opening for foreign enterprise and capital.

For some time past a discussion has been taking place in the Jewish papers on both sides of the Atlantic, in which the merits of Palestine from this point of view have been canvassed, and I can only account for the extraordinary inaccuracies which have characterized the arguments of the disputants by the supposition that they have derived their information from sources which, owing to the changes which have taken place during the last few years, may now be considered obsolete. A remarkable illustration of this has just come to my notice in the account which Dr. Thomson gives of the Plain of Esdraelon in his well-known work, "The Land and the Book," which fully deserves the high reputation it enjoys, and which when it was published, twenty-three years ago, presented a most faithful picture of the Holy Land and its inhabitants. That anybody who now took this work as an authority upon the actual condition of many parts of the country would be most woefully misled, may best be judged of from a short extract of what he says of the Plain of Esdraelon, on the borders of which I have been living for the last six months, and comparing it with the results of my own observation.

"The Bedouins resort here," he remarks, "with their flocks and camels, and the whole of Esdraelon will shortly be abandoned to them. Their system of desolation is worked out in this fashion: they pitch their tents in the vicinity of a village and in such numbers as to bid defiance to the inhabitants. Of course their camels and flocks roam over the untenced plain, and devour a large part of the grain while growing; and when it is ripe they either steal it or compel the farmers to present them with a heavy percentage as the price of their protection. From the village itself chickens, eggs, sheep, cows, and even horses disappear and can never be recovered. Many of the inhabitants soon move off to escape from their annoyances, and the village being thereby weakened, the Arabs provoke a quarrel, some one is wounded or killed, and the place is sacked or burned. The end aimed at is now reached, and the land belongs henceforth to the lawless Ishmaelite. In ten years there will not be an inhabited village in Esdraelon unless this wretched work is checked, and even now it is unsafe to traverse this noble plain in any direction, and everybody goes armed and prepared to repel force by force. But a small portion of the plain is under cultivation. The lower end is not more than six miles wide, and most of it is too wet and flat for cultivation, but the Arabs delight in it, particularly in winter, and it is even now dotted over with their black tabernacles. Overgrown with thistles and long grass it is the favorite haunt of the gazelle," and so forth.

Your readers will be surprised to learn, in the face of this description, that almost every acre of the Plain of Esdrelon is at this moment in the highest state of cultivation; that it is perfectly safe to ride across it unarmed in any direction, as I can testify; that, so far from plundering and despoiling villages, the few Bedouins, whose "black tabernacles" are now confined to the southern margin of the plain, have, in their turn, become the plundered and despoiled, for they are all reduced to the position of being subject to inexorable landlords who charge them exhorbitantly for the land which they occupy, and for which they pay in hard cash, under penalty of instant ejection, which is ruthlessly enforced, so that the inhabitants of the villages, with which the plain is now dotted, live in perfect security, though more than twenty years have elapsed since it was predicted that "in ten years more there would not be an inhabited village in Esdraelon." It looks today like a huge green lake of waving wheat, with its villages crowned mounds rising from it like islands; and it presents one of the most striking pictures of luxuriant fertility which it is possible to conceive.

When, therefore, I read the other day, as an argument why colonies should not be established in this part of Galilee, a description of the dangers which would attend any such experiment, I was amazed at the temerity of the assertion, until I recognized some of the phrases above quoted, which must be my excuse for making the extract. But as so much attention is just now devoted to the consideration of the agricultural capabilities of Palestine, I think it only right that the delusions which evidently continue to exist on the subject should be dissipated with as little delay as possible. The fact is that nearly the whole Plain of Esdraelon is divided between two great proprietors, the Sultan himself, who has recently acquired a great part of the eastern portion of it, and the Sursocks, the richest bankers in Syria, who are resident in Beyrout, and who own nearly all the villages extending from the foot of the Nazareth hills to the sea. Some idea of the amount of grain which is annually grown on their portion of the Plain of Esdraelon alone may be gathered from the fact that Mr. Sursock himself told me a few weeks ago that the cost of transporting his last years' crop to Haifa and Acre amounted to $50,000. This was said as illustrating the necessity of a railway across the plain, with a view of cheapening the cost of transport, as, owing to the Sultan having property here, it had become desirable in his Majesty's interest. A concession has recently been granted to these Beyrout capitalists for the purpose of constructing a line which shall connect the Bay of Acre and the two ports upon it with the great grain-growing province to the east of the Jordan called the Hauran, from which region thousands of camels loaded with cereals come annually to Acre and Haifa.

As I write the engineers are starting to commence the surveys of this line, which will run right through the centre of the Plain of Esdraelon, and open up a great extent of new country lying in the hills behind it, which will now find an easier access to the sea, while the whole of Galilee will benefit from so important a means of communication. Indeed, it is a remarkable fact that while every province in Turkey has been steadily retrograding during the last few years, Palestine alone has been rapidly developing in agricultural and material prosperity. In Haifa and its neighborhood land has risen threefold in value during the last five years, while the export and import trade has increased with a remarkable rapidity, and the population has doubled within ten years. Indeed, the population of the whole of Palestine shows an increase during that period, more particularly owing to immigration within the last year or two. The consequence is that although, so far as security for life and property is concerned, there is still much to be desired; great progress has been made, and with a more energetic government the country might be rendered as safe as any in the world.

As it is, the Arabs are for the most part pushed east of the Jordan, and it is now becoming more and more rare for an Arab encampment to be seen in the neighborhood of the more settled and prosperous part of the country. There are, of course, villages where the inhabitants have a bad reputation, and, as a rule in the establishment of new colonies, proximity to these should be avoided; but, fertile lands, near peaceable villages, removed from all risk of Arab incursion, and which can be purchased at a low price, abound; and I know of no more profitable investment of money, whether by Jew or Gentile, than is furnished by a judiciously selected tract of this description. In proof of which may be cited the extraordinary wealth which has been accumulated by the Sursocks alone, who now own thousands of acres of the finest land in Palestine, and who purchase numerous new villages every year.

At the same time it must be admitted that, practically, the purchase of land in this country is attended with many difficulties. It is either held by villages in a communal manner or in very small patches, many of which have several owners. In the first case the whole village, with its lands, must be purchased, an operation involving many official formalities, or the co-proprietors of the small patches have to agree upon the amount of the purchase money, and then to show a clear title and the payment of all arrears of taxes. As a rule the purchase of any considerable extent of land involves negotiations extending over several months, and strangers unused to the ways of the country and the method by which official routine may be expedited and obstacles removed are apt to meet with many disappointments. On the other hand, owing to official corruption, immense tracts of land fit for cultivation, but which are unoccupied owing to the sparseness of the population generally, may, through favoritism and backsheesh, be obtained at an almost nominal price.

The same erroneous impression prevails in regard to the barrenness of the country, as in regard to its insecurity. Few travellers see more than the beaten routes, where the hills happen to be unusually stony and barren; but the extent of the population which once inhabited the country, furnishes the best evidence of what it is capable of supporting, and its capabilities in this respects have been most forcibly dwelt upon by the officers engaged in the survey of the country for the Palestine exploration fund, who have enjoyed unequaled opportunities of judging of it, who has recently acquired a great upon the question. The fact that the resident Jewish agricultural population of Galilee alone amounts to over a thousand souls, is probably one which will astonish Western Jews more than any one else; but I have verified it by actually visiting myself the localities in which they are engaged in their farming operations, and am not giving the number without having arrived at it upon sure data.

There are three prejudices which have operated against the colonization of Palestine by Jews and which are all absolutely unsound, and these are, first, that the Jew cannot become an agriculturist; secondly, that the country is barren, and thirdly that it is unsafe. The real obstacle in the way to Palestine colonization does not lie in any of these directions, but in the fact that the Government is most determinedly opposed to it. — N. Y. Sun, June 12.

THE BIBLE A POWERFUL BOOK.

The Bible, more than any other book, wields a sceptre of power over the emotional nature of men. We do not stop to speak just now of its power over the intellectual nature of man, but we say that it has more power to call out the love of those who read it, or the hatred of those who hate it, than any other book in the world. As I said in a passing remark last Sunday, you take up any other book, whether it is the best or the worst; you may admire the genius of its author, you may admire this quality or that quality in its characters; you do not absolutely hate it; you do not particularly love it. It may stir emotions within you, but it is only a temporary movement. I have heard of people crying over Shakespeare. They do not cry from any sorrow or penitence when moved by some of the mighty portrayals of that great poetical genius. I never saw a man, with Shakespeare before him, bowed down with heart broken sobs on account of things in himself. It never strikes men clear down to the bottom. Who ever heard a man crying with tears unto God, because of his past sin, over the pages of Herbert Spencer?

We may admire historical characters; but no matter what the admiration a man may have for a character that has passed out of the world, you cannot say that he loves it. It is said that there are no tears shed over graves that are twenty years old. I think the most impressive sight in all Europe is to stand in the Hotel des Invalides in Paris, by that magnificent mausoleum of the First Napoleon. I have seen some of the old veterans stand there, but I have never seen any of them that would die for the dead man in that tomb. They would have died for him when he was alive, but now he has passed into history. They say it was Napoleon's own remark, when a prisoner on the Island of St. Helena: "There was a time when any one of my Old Guard would have laid down his life for me; but when I am dead and my ashes are laid on the banks of the Seine, where is one that would die for their old Emperor? And yet there are millions who would die for Christ today as readily as they did in the first century." Of course, when we speak of the Bible, we say that what is true of the Bible is true of Christ, and what is true of Christ is true of Christianity; so if we speak sometimes of Christ, and sometimes of Christianity, and sometimes of the Bible, it all tends to the same conclusion. Now, the history of the Bible shows that there have been hundreds of men and women who have stood over this Book and drenched the very pages of it with bloody who have suffered cruel tortures, not accepting deliverance, rather than have the Book wrenched from their possession and trampled under foot by its enemies and blotted out of existence. The enthusiasm of love which has been gathered about that Book is without a parallel in the history of the world. The nearest thing that will compare with it is the fanatical attachment with which a Mohammedan will stand by the Koran. But when you put them carefully side by side you will see a vast difference between the passion with which one man defends his book, and the calm resolution of the other. The Mohammedan gives blow for blow, and passion for passion, but the man or woman who is called upon to defend the Bible, strikes no blow; he says, "I cannot fight for it with carnal weapons, but I can die for it." No one book stirs up the human passion of anger; the other lends man to the very depths of his best nature, and leads him to lay down his life rather than surrender it. The Bible has led men to give up everything they had in the world, for the love of it; to leave their homes and go into heathen countries and fever-stricken climes, at the risk of their own lives, that they might have the privilege of passing on to others the precious boon.

It might not be out of place to read some testimony to the power of this Book; not from Christians, but from men who have spent their mightiest powers in their attempts to discredit the Bible as it stands. I will read the concluding passage in "Renan's Life of Christ," written by a man who has done his best, and is still doing his best, to discredit the Bible as an inspired Book. And yet he cannot help concluding with these words: "Jesus will never be surpassed. His worship will grow younger without ceasing; his legend will call forth tears without end. All ages will proclaim that among the sons of men there is none born greater than Jesus." That is the testimony of one of the enemies of the Bible. And Strauss, the great German rationalist infidel, says: "He remains the highest model.... No perfect piety is possible without his presence in the heart." Now I might increase these without number. They are from the men who have spent their lives in trying to discredit the Divine authority of that Book; and when they have gotten through with their work, before they have dared to lay down their pen they have overthrown everything they have previously said by these unparalleled tributes to the power of the Man who is the life of the Book.

With regard to the power which the Bible has to awaken enthusiasm, I read the other day, in Renan's "History of Religion and Criticism," just these words: 'Even to-day rationalism (and that is infidelity) does not look at him closely except on its knees." In other words, the most cultured and able infidelity in the world, when it comes to take a close look at Jesus, has to fall on its knees in order to study him, because he cannot be studied otherwise than with a reverential spirit; so masterful is the power of the character that is embodied in the pages of that Book. And Lecky, perhaps the greatest historian of rationalism, in his "History of Rationalism" confesses that "rationalism can beget no enthusiasm, and develop no martyrs." Did you ever hear of an infidel dying in defence of his infidelity? Did you ever hear a man saying, "I will give my life to deny that Book?"

And just here the Bible stands pre-eminent in its power of sounding men and finding them at the very deepest of their being. One of the wisest and most acute intellects that our English nation has produced was that great philosopher Coleridge; and he settled the whole question, to his own mind at least—and so far it is a true statement. He says: "I know that the Bible is true, because it finds me at the deepest in my nature." He did not philosophize about it; he simply made that statement. — Rev. G. F. Pentecost, in The Infidel Answered.

OMINOUS OUTLOOK IN RUSSIA.

While the festivities arranged at Moscow in honor of the coronation of the Czar are in course of their completion, news of a different and less auspicious character reaches us from St. Petersburg. On Monday, the day after the Emperor's coronation, serious rioting took place in that capital, in consequence of the public disappointment felt at the contents of the Imperial manifesto. No sane person supposed that the rejoicings, of which Moscow has during the past week been the theatre, would for ever stifle the breath of discontent in the huge dominions of the Czar. Nihilism has its subterranean passages, and experience has shown that when it is quiescent in one direction, it is only to be more furious and explosive in another. It is impossible to deny that there is the slightest yearning for liberty in the breasts of the Russian nation or, in a word, there is such a thing as a Russian nation at all—the manifesto that accompanied the coronation was only too well calculated to cause chagrin and to deepen disappointment. Never were sentences framed more ostentatiously with a view to conveying the idea that the Czar is the fountain of all authority, the sole depository of the national will, which, by some inscrutable power of penetration, he divines without consulting those whom he is supposed to represent. There was not a phrase, not a word, to encourage the hope that either now or at any future time the Russians would be taken into the confidence of the Emperor, or would be asked to enlighten or co-operate with his benevolent intentions for their welfare. In the most complete and absolute sense of the term, the Czar remains the father of the people, he alone knowing what is good for them—he alone being able to dispose their wants and measure their real necessities. That is an old and consecrated political doctrine in Russia, and apparently its sanctions are not yet weakened at Moscow—at least, during coronation time. But at St. Petersburg it is challenged and resented; and the street riots, the cavalry charges, the arrests demonstrate that there are some of the Czar's children who regard themselves as being no longer minors, but, on the contrary, grown to full manhood, and entitled to the rights and self-assertion which manhood brings in its train. Strength will be lord of imbecility, and to grown-up men, bent upon obtaining for themselves the privileges of political maturity, there necessarily seems something imbecile in the unreasoning cheers and gaping admiration of crowds of unlettered peasants, whose chronic attitude is one of unquestioning servility. Just when the Czar and his Court are flattering themselves that all is going as merry as a marriage bell, there is suddenly a melancholy boom, the harbinger of rising dissaffection. The riots in St. Petersburg may not the moment have no visible sequel. But the skeleton of Nihilism has made its presence felt, if not seen, at the Moscow banquet, and reminded the Autocrat of all the Russias of its subterranean existence.

RUSSIA THREATENING INVASION OF ARMENIA.

The Paris Temps of this evening says: "We have reason to believe that the object of M. de Giers' recent journey was to inform the Powers that Russia would feel compelled to seek in Armenia an equivalent for the British occupation of Egypt. Mr. Gladstone by taking Egypt has not only lost the good wishes of France, but has reopened the Eastern Question, and furnished Russia with a pretext for accomplishing her immense projects, the last step in which will be the conquest of British India."

THE EARTHQUAKE IN ECUADOR.

PANAMA, June 14.—The Panama Star and Herald says that the earthquake in Ecuador on May 19 was felt intensely in some parts of the interior. There was great alarm at Quito, where the people, fearing a catastrophe, encamped in the streets. In Latacunga, which is subject to earthquakes, and was utterly destroyed by one in the last century, the shock was very severe, overthrowing several houses, while those remaining threatened to fall any moment. The villages in the vicinity were almost completely destroyed. On the arrival of the diligence at Latacunga the mules were taken out and the vehicle pulled through the streets by men, lest the rumbling should shake down the houses. Cotopaxi is in active eruption and the people in the vicinity are terrified at the probable repetition of the catastrophe of March, 1867.

THE BURNING OF MOSCOW.

The Times correspondent, describing the scene in Moscow at night says: "Without a pot of fire dipped in rainbow colors, it would be impossible to give you an idea of the appearance of Moscow, as illuminated in honor of the coronation of the Czar. Moscow was again burning—that is the only expression for it—every private house, every public building, looked like a frame of rainbow fireworks. Never was anything so complete, so fairylike. Viewed from the walls of Kremlin, the aspect of the city was grand; and viewed from the city, the Kremlin itself looked more than magnificent, with its towers, and domes, and steeples standing out not like structures of stone, but like balls, and pillars, and crowns, and pyramids of variegated fire. In the Cathedral it was noticed that when the Emperor knelt alone to utter the Prayer of Intercession, his eyes were filled with tears, and as he read from the open book he audibly sobbed. His emotion did not fail to be communicated to the congregation."

The panic at a conjurer's exhibition to an audience of young folks in a public hall in Sunderland, Eng., Saturday evening, resulting in the death of nearly 200 little children by being crushed or smothered to death, was one of the most remarkable and heart-rending occurrences of the kind in the annals of human calamities. Its only recent parallel was a similar panic which lately caused a like result on the new Brooklyn Bridge. It appears that at the close of the exhibition the children in the gallery, several hundred in number, were slowly making their way out of the hall through a narrow door of exit, when suddenly one child fell and screamed, and all the others became panic-stricken and rushed over and upon each other pell-mell, with the most appalling and deadly result. It is the most shocking of the many horrors for which the present year so far has been singularly remarkable.

AT THE APPOINTED HOUR.

MRS. J. O. FIELD.

At the appointed hour shall we be ready,
That hour that hastens, though it seems so long?
Do we so trim our lamps that clear and steady
Their light shall shine to prove our faith is strong?
For others see the radience glistening from us,
As through the dark we walk unswerving on,
And feel we surely do believe the promise
That he will come, although for centuries gone.

Yes, he will come! oh more than blest assurance,
To those who truly watch and wait for him.
The only hope that justifies endurance,
The star that shines when all besides is dim;
Still let us not be tired of doing duty,
But take our crosses as they come each day,
And this hard life may round into a beauty
We had not known, if we had marked the way.

From sacrifice of self we gain the sweetest,
Purest, and best, of any joy we know;
And when our work for others is complete,
Then, only then, our natures truly grow.
Then while we watch and wait our coming Saviour,
The way to make the time seem short and bright,
Is to grow daily better in behavior,
And by our shining prove we have the light.

THE AGES (or aeons) OF THE COSMOS.

In a previous article I deduced from the numerical ¼ or 1, 2, 3 symbolic type which runs all through the parabolic teaching of the Scriptures Old and New and from the 40 numerical symbol which is also a remarkably prominent and frequently recurring type, what I conceived to be the grand integer of the ages, viz.: 24000 years (probably true solar years). In this article I purpose from the aforsaid premises to draw some further conclusions in regard to the "ages" of this cosmos we are now in.

Employing the same 1, 2, 3, or ¼ type as a known factor and taking the grand integer 24000 as a deduction which commends itself in very many ways to our enlightened reason, we may safely infer again that there is a correlation of the two types, in other words, that the integer 24000 or the whole of time as related to this cosmos is divided into three great periods or aeons of equal length and that those periods are conjunctive periods, these conjunctions marking great and wonderful transitions. Dividing the integer then we would have three great periods of 8000 years each, progressive epochs as it were in God's plan of development, the conjunctions marking the transition stages from the lower to the higher in the working out of the Divine Architect's cosmic plan which was complete "from the founding of the cosmos."

Then bearing in mind that the number 8 is the numerical symbol of harmonic completion we are naturally led to enquire as to what may have constituted the harmonic complement of each of these great periods. Keeping in mind moreover that all harmony is necessarily organic, the teachings of positive science come to our aid with all the manifold facts now determined in regard to the animate and inanimate creation, and we may safely infer that the first great period of 8000 years was a formative, inanimate, organic period, at the end of which this round earth with its enveloping canopy of atmosphere swung into its conjunctive relation to other heavenly bodies, making animate organic life, as we now understand its conditions possible.

The next great period of 8000 years we infer teemed with countless forms of organic animate life belonging to earth and air and water, many of which have long since become extinct; all these organic creatures moving grandly on the scale of development up to the final masterpiece of the Creator, namely the Adamic man. In this Adamic man we have the organic image, we are told of the divine Prototype, but only the promise of a conformity in likeness or character. In the order of harmonic or cosmic development, therefore, we infer that the remaining 8000 years or ⅔ of the whole integer is a period of conformative character which can only come through an experience or experiment of life under cosmic conditions. These conditions imply moral law, divinely implanted impulses, free agency, a revelation of the divine will, and an apprehension in a greater or less degree of its cosmic purpose.

Let us now further note the remarkable significance of this symbolic 8 in the subdivisions of the integral eighths. Taking our original 1, 2, 3 or ¼ type, let us subdivide again; ¼ of one of these great periods of 8000 years gives us a period of 2666⅔ and ¼ of this gives us 333⅓, an eighth of ⅓, a first-fruits of first-fruits period in its type; and this divided by four gives us the four typical Sabbatic periods of the great passover Sabbath, viz.: The Pro-sabbath, the first seventh Sabbath, The first-fruits Sabbath and the last seventh Sabbath, or four periods of 83⅓ years each. Again the whole 333⅓ or Passover period is evidently a typical conjunctive period, beginning as it does with the typical conjunctive 40 and ending with a double 10 plus 1, this one being typical of continuity or immortality, and corresponding to the ¼ and ¾ represtends of the divisions of the conjunctive periods as given. Again the mortal life period of the Christ 33 1-30 years is a typical conjunctive period, being 1-10 of the 333⅓ conjunctive period. Moreover the whole integer may be viewed as a grand Passover conjunctive period of God's aeons. The first 6000 years being a Preadelphic in which the Lamb slain from the founding of the cosmos was set apart; the second 6000 as the seventh day Sabbath with its manifold significations of cessation and interval; the third 6,000 an 8th (an eighth of a third to) or first fruits Sabbath of another special and manifold significance; and finally the 4th 6000, an ultimate anastasimos and aiosmos Sabbath, which precedes the grand major octave or eighth Sabbatismos of the saints.

Or applying the type to the last 8000 or the human period of the grand integer we have the Preadelphic period, old Adamic covenant or antediluvian ago ending with The Flood, the seventh day Sabbatic period of the law with Moses as the mediator; the eighth day Sabbatic period of the new Adamic Covenant, or First Fruits; and finally another Sabbatic period of law with Christ as its mediator a seventh in type as preceding a final eighth of completed harmony.

Again the 1, 2, 3 type and its conjunctive relation to the 8 is apparent in manifold ways in the organic arrangement and structure of plants and animals as well as in the cosmic order of the material universe. For instance in the latter, see the sun, moon and stars, earth, air and water, the three tropics, the three zones the correlated motions of the sun, earth and moon with all their manifold results of harmony, in the vegetable kingdom the trefoliate plants, in the animal kingdom with man at the head, the 1, 2, 3 arrangement of so many of the parts of the body as for instance in the human arm, the 1, 2, 3 bones of the upper and forearm and its conjunction with the 8 bones of the wrist; man's conception of musical harmony in a correlation of thirds and eighths. Finally God's revelation of himself in a threefold relation which finds its conjunction in an eighth person who exemplifies the ability which belongs to the right arm of the Lord, and teaches how God's people may become as it were God's hand to work out his intelligent purpose.

In a future article we purpose to take up the metric significance of this 1, 2, 3 type in its relation to a cosmic standard of weights and measures, as well as to deduce the origin of the Arabic numerals and their relation to geometry as a science, the object being to show the importance of number as a factor in God's revealed plan of this cosmos.

CHAS. GARDNER.

JERUSALEM, May 10, 1888.

Editor Restitution:

In compliance with Mrs. Davis' request, I will write you, by way of introduction, what we will style a "picked up" letter. As I understand there are many preparing to come here, I think it probable many of your readers would like to know something about the journey, the best route, etc.

We came from N. Y. by the Bordeaux Steamship Line to Bordeaux, France, and across that delightful country of vineyards, flowers, old castles, and towns with narrow streets, with the ever prevailing smell of garlic; by rail to Marseilles on the Mediterranean, 3600 miles from N. Y. Third class, this far is $32. Then by the Messargeries Steamship Line to Alexandria deck $18, third class $25; deck is preferable considering price, accomodations, etc. Then to Joppa $4, deck. 20 days from N. Y. to Joppa, the beautiful shores of Judea. Here we were happily surprised when we were anchored in the harbor, at being among the host of upturned Arabic faces an American, Mr. H. Floyd, who has been in Palestine some seventeen years, most of the time engaged as guide to tourists. I understand he has no equal in this country, for he is a man well versed in the Word, can explain all places of interest in the languages of Europe, can talk to the natives (and is well liked by them) with as great ease as he can to his own countrymen, and that too in a gentlemanly way. Parties needing anything in his line would do well to postpone arranging for this part of their tour, till they arrive here, otherwise they are liable to be placed in the hands of a native in the employ of Cook & Son, who will take them the rounds and show them nothing; this has proved to be the case in many instances. Parties procuring tickets for this part of the journey before starting East will not do so the second time; a word to the wise is sufficient. Well after our long journey with but once in a while one we could speak to, it did cheer our hearts to see one of America's sons. We went home with him, and it was home indeed, we found in his companion one of those motherly bodies that is sure to brace up and rest tired "pilgrims," as I assure you we were on our arrival April 30th, 1888.

The next day we came on to Jerusalem, I was not a little disappointed in the country both there and here,—as I supposed it was a bleak, sandy desert: on the contrary, for the first few miles it was orange and lemon orchards (called here gardens) on both sides of the road that we passed through, this part of the trip was in the early morning, and the perfume that was wafted to our nostrils was most delicious, only to be appreciated by those who have the privilege of looking at the golden fruit as it grows, and inhaling its fragrance.

Just here I would go back a little and warn all who travel this way, don't stop at what is called the "English hotel", in Marseilles. I paid for this experience. After passing out of the fruit-growing country we find ourselves in what appears to be an exceedingly fertile, and fine laying country, saw herds of cattle and sheep grazing by the way, but the hundreds of goats in the mountains were reserved till later in the day. We reached the foot of the mountains about 2 o'clock p. m., rested an hour, then commenced winding, and climbing, and kept it up till 7 o'clock, at which time we reached the top, and Jerusalem, and now after two weeks sojourn here I write you.

In what I have to say, I do it regardless of what others may have written on the same subjects. There is one point however that I wish to speak very plain on: and that is the idea of Americans coming to this country to make money; if that is your object don't come, and I would advise those who have other motives in coming to do so in colonies. Don't come here expecting to make your living at day's work. Natives can be had for 20 cts. per day, and live on what a Chinaman can. Now this may be a little discouraging to some, but I am satisfied that there is existing in the minds of many a very great error, concerning this gathering time. How unjust you would make the Father if he would—as some say—only save those who are able to come here at this time, just be patient a little while,—"He will not tarry"—but bring his reward with him, if your dear reader is a spiritual body, then perhaps you can come without expense; however I believe the Lord is choosing servants from American soil to be used by him here soon. Such as those will come, and the powers of earth can not prevent, for the Eternal Father will provide ways, and means, and none can hinder.

But, while the Lord has been training his servants in the way of truth, Satan, you may depend, has not been asleep. He too looked to America for his agents, and the grandest and most to be dreaded system of error in existence, it comes from America's Sodom,—Chicago.—This people are known here as the Americans who give away considerable money to the poor Jews, and are noted for their good works, etc. They have been here about two years, and have in this way done much good, and to the uninitiated in the way of truth, they would appear to be the most saint-like of all creation. What they claim for themselves they keep pretty close till after their dupes are firmly entrapt in their teaching, one Mr. S. claims to be the branch, his wife claims to talk with God, and in their meetings if any one of the members is in doubts as to whether the Lord would have them speak on what is in their minds they refer the matter to her, and she communes with God, and he tells her yes or no, she is the prophetess Anna; while a Mrs. L. has claimed to be John the Baptist, Elijah, Moses and Aaron, and she and S. are the two witnesses of Rev. xi. 7, to be killed in the streets of Jerusalem; etc. Others of the company have received or taken to themselves very high and exalted positions; poor souls filled with pride and self-love and can not see it. It pleased the Lord in a wonderful way to place (self, wife and child) in their house, for about ten days, in fact we left them three days since, the proceedings last Sabbath was all I could stand, and the next morning bright and early we left them. On the day referred to a Mr. S. who was once a captain in the English army, had a wonderful revelation from God. God had shown him that they as a people, were the body of Christ, that they were part of the Divine Being and that they were with him before the world was. This will show those who realise that they are perishable creatures,—out of Christ—to what terrible depths of blasphemy, that must to be dreaded error "natural immortality" will lead fallen humanity. Corrupt creatures, brute beasts, would make themselves equal with their Creator. I wonder if they don't imagine sometimes that they will take the throne and God humble himself at their feet.

Now this people claim to have power to "heal the sick," etc., this I think is a fact, and I shall not be at all surprised at any time to hear of greater works than this being done by them, for one of their prophets (?) said to me in our talk on Bible truths that God was soon to answer by fire, that their teaching was truth. They hold that the Millennium period commenced nearly two years ago, and that they are and have been waiting here since that time to be "endowed with power," to go forth to convert the world to what they call truth; one point of it is the final, full and complete restitution of all creatures to God. Universal salvation, no such thing as second death, in the light that rational men understand it, none to be destroyed. Their kind, or what they call [illegible] Ghost, comes with such force [illegible] it shakes them up in such a way as to appear to some like a very bad case of [illegible] ague. After we had been in their house a few days, Capt. S. was "overcome" with this in one of the meetings, and was led to where I was sitting, he placed both hands on my head, I received a pretty lively shaking but sat perfectly quiet till he got through, claimed to have received power to impart to me the H. G., and in a tone of almost thunder demanded of the Almighty God that I should receive all the truth; but I, a lump of perishable clay, had power to resist the power of God; how blind are they who fail to see in this the work of Satan. And why should we wonder at this, I am very sure I do not, on the contrary it strengthens my faith, I see in this a fulfilment of prophecy. "And he doth great wonders, so that he maketh fire come down from heaven on the earth in the sight of men." Rev. xiii. 13. (This they say is soon to be done). For there shall arise false christs, (they are according to their teaching the body of Christ, and claim he is not to come till after the 1000 years, save in them), and false prophets, and shall show great signs and wonders; insomuch that, if it were possible, they shall deceive the very elect. Matt. xxiv. 24. Yes, many will say to me in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name? and in thy name have cast out devils? and in thy name done many wonderful works? Matt. vii. 22.

Now these texts plainly show what we might expect, for the Lord has told us that such things should be prior to his coming, and as I believe the law, the teaching of God and his Christ in its purity, is soon to go forth from here, is it any wonder that Satan is on the ground, with his colors flying? Not at all. And what kind of agents do we find he has chosen? I will tell you; they are men and women without question of sound minds, most of them well, and nearly all highly educated; nearly all have come out of some of the popular Churches, four I believe, of the Church of England, i. e., mother and daughters; they are so kind, and attentive to those who come in their way, always, and for everything praising the Lord. Now would it be possible for Satan to use any other kind of people than these, and deceive all but the class our Lord mentions: the elect. I think not.

The time has never been, when the Lord was about to bring about some great work in fulfillment of his word, but what Satan was on hand. And he is much more familiar with God's word than many who imagine they are "wholly saved." That idea is another manifestation of his power to deceive poor, frail mortals, not satisfied to wait till he comes with our reward, but must partake on "climbing up" some other way, I would advise all to try, to strive, to enter in at the gate, for if we may think of the present wall as a type of the new one, that shall come down from God out of heaven, how much nicer it will be to go straight in, than up a flight of steps and gather flowers on the top. (I enclose on, from top of this 70 feet high). For I assure you, dear reader, it would be an exceedingly "up hill business" to get into this city of filth, save by the gates, much more so the one to come. Some may think that I have written in this way of this people, because of personal difficulty with them, but this is not the case, I have talked these things with them in a great deal plainer way than I have been able to write them, they know just where I place them. They have everything about their house in shipshape, everything in order, servants to do the work, the Lord does not permit them to engage in any kind of employment, to earn money, etc.; all of their time is his, but not to get their bread by the sweat of the brow. Believing that they are soon to "go up and down through the earth" with this teaching, and that the world and church, is ready for something of this kind, I have written this, for his "coming is after the working of Satan with all power and signs and lying wonders."

So let us all try and make our "calling and election sure," that we may not be enticed into this parlor, that Satan has draped in purple and fine linen; with this I leave them for now. I will just add that if Mrs. Davis has failed to speak of their true character or mission, it was not because she was ignorant of it; she has had a hard row to hoe, and has done all she could; if some of our friends who have plenty and claim to believe in the restitution of all things and that we are now living in that time, would only send her more money to do with than I think they would be "showing their faith by their works." I don't think there is another place on earth where there is as much wretchedness, squalor, and destitution, according to the population as here. In the first place the natives are the poorest and most miserable lot of creatures on earth. they are numerous, and "hold the ancient high places in possession." Ezek. xxxvi. 2. Then add to them hundreds of poor Jews, whom God is now bringing here from all parts of the world, think of it—it is a fulfilment of his word. And they must be fed, and they are his. Then if we are his, what is our duty? Shall we see Christ suffer for food. (!) why hold onto the things of this world; time is so short, the Lord has need of money here right now, not when he comes, for it is all his, and as our stewardship is now, so will be our reward. Think of this lone woman how she has come here, used all she had in this work, and now she is just compelled to lay down her pen, and put in the time climbing over rocks and the mountains to gather and prepare flowers to send to that land of plenty, and churches, that she may in return get money to give out as soon as received to those of God's poor; who will be the first to lighten her heart now with five or ten dollars, or in such sums as you think is the Lord's share, and by so doing lift a portion of her burden off and give her a chance to do something else than gather flowers; what is to prevent every leader of these lines, from having a part in this work, if you can't send large sums, send what you can.

And now while I think of it, if some one would take the matter in hand, and in some way, by Oct. 1st have money enough sent at one time to pay a year's house rent for her, $50 to $60 would do it; this I think might be done by the readers of THE RESTITUTION divided up, and it would come light on all. Houses here are rented by the year, and Turkish year commences with November. Now who will be first to take this matter in hand; I should like so much to hear by letter that it will be carried out. And may God bless those who undertake it.

In my next I will endeavor to give you, as near as may be, the number of Jews in Palestine, the number of colonies, where located, the different countries they are and have been coming from, etc. Ah! how terrible has been their bondage, far worse than that of Egypt, and Moses looking down to this time told the fathers in Horeb that the Lord would raise up one like unto him, a "deliverer." May it please the though Great God and Father of all to hasten the time when that blindness shall drop from their eyes, and these terrible bands be broken.

Do Gentiles realise what their fulness really means? More on this another time. P. H. WINTERSTEIN.

We Seek a City Yet to Come.

We seek a city where each quiet dwelling
Stands fast upon the everlasting hills;
Where in the song of praises fondly swelling,
Comes not a discord of our earthly ills.

We know that in that city life abideth;
Nor tears nor death can ever enter there;
And One with nail-pierced hands our way still guideth,
Until we come unto the city fair.

We seek a city. Pilgrim feet grow weary,
But we press on; beyond still lies our home;
Though days be dark, and ways be often dreary,
We seek, we seek a city yet to come!

A Beautiful Testimony.

William Cullen Bryant wrote, just before he died:

"This character, of which Christ was the perfect model, is in itself so attractive, so altogether lovely, that I cannot describe in language the admiration with which I regard it; nor can I express the gratitude I feel for the dispensation which bestowed that example on mankind, for the truths which he taught and the sufferings he endured for our sakes. I tremble to think what the world would be without him. Take away the blessing of its advent of his life and the blessings purchased by his death, in what an abyss of guilt would man have been left! It would seem to be blotting the sun out of the heavens—to leave our system of worlds in chaos, frost and darkness.

"In my view of the life, the teachings, the labors and the sufferings of the blessed Jesus, there can be no admiration too profound, no love of which the human heart is capable too warm, no gratitude too earnest and deep of which he is justly the object. It is with sorrow that I see any attempt to put aside his teachings as a delusion, to turn men's eyes from his example, to meet with doubt and denial the story of his life. For my part, if I thought that the religion of scepticism were to gather strength and prevail, and become the dominant view of mankind, I should despair of the fate of mankind in the years that are yet to come."

The Dead Sea.

The Dead Sea fills up the southern end of the Jordan valley. The mountain chains which shut in the valley become here steeper, wilder and bleaker. In some places they rise in lofty precipices of naked rock from the bosom of the waters; in others they retire, forming wild nooks and yawning ravines, fitting homes for the wild goats which still inhabit them. The scenery of the lake is bare and desolate, but grand. The water is clear and sparkling, a deep and beautiful azure when the sky is cloudless, but reflecting vividly every changing hue of the firmament. In summer, when the heat is intense, a thin, whitish, quivering vapor hangs over the surface of the water, and gives a strange, dreamy indistinctiveness to the mountains. At the northern and southern ends, the flat plains are parched and barren, in part covered with fine sand, and in part with a white, nitrous coating like hoar frost. Brackish and sulphur springs occur at intervals around the whole borders of the lake. Some of them are warm, and send up clouds of steam. At one or two places along the western shore and also at the southern end of the lake are slimy pools and morasses, whose exhalations of sulphuretted-hydrogen taint the atmosphere for miles. Strewn along the northern shore, especially near the mouth of the Jordan, lie large quantities of driftwood, brought down by the swollen river, and it is everywhere encrusted with salt crystals. The great depression, the fierce rays of an unclouded sun, the white soil below reflecting the sun's rays, give the whole basin of the Dead Sea a temperature like that of a furnace. Never did I suffer so much from intense suffocating heat as during the days I spent on the shores of this lake.

Yet still it cannot be called a "sea of death," in that sense in which travelers in former ages were wont to represent it. It has been stated that no vegetation could exist along its shores, and that no bird could fly over it; that, in fact, its poisonous exhalations are fatal alike to animal and vegetable life. This is altogether untrue. At every little fountain along its shores, the vegetation has a tropical luxuriance. I have seen the oleander dipping its gorgeous flowers into the lake; and I have seen the willow and the tamarisk, and numerous other shrubs flourishing where their stems were at certain seasons immersed in the waters. The ouzebreaks on the shore abound with fowl; and occasionally flocks of ducks may be seen swimming far out on the sea. The water, however, is tolerably salt and bitter, and no fish could live in it. Yet it is not altogether destitute of living creatures, a few inferior organizations having been found in it by recent naturalists. Its specific gravity is so great that the human body will not sink in it. I have tried it myself and can, therefore, testify to the truth of the fact. This is easily accounted for. The weight of water increases in proportion to the amount of salt it contains in solution. Ordinary sea-water has about four per cent. of salt, whilst that of the Dead Sea contains more than twenty-six per cent.—Messiah's Herald.

The Grave of Colon.

The genius of Columbus was so universal and his fame is so world-wide that it seems strange to hear him spoken of as Colon, and find his grave in a Catholic church in Havana. An American is so accustomed to think of Columbus as the grand discoverer of the new world—his world—that for a moment he feels quite like resenting the exclusive claim of that not over-clean and badly governed city to the custody of his ashes.

Columbus—or Cristobal Colon, as we must say at Havana if we wish to be understood—died at Santo Domingo,* but his remains were subsequently removed to Havana, and interred in the cathedral, where they now repose under a pillar within the altar. And properly proud are the Havanese-Spanish families of their great fellow-countrymen by adoption, whose last resting place is with them.

Beneath a rather doubtful bust of the great discoverer is a marble tablet set in the pillar, and inscribed with the following characteristic Spanish epitaph in the old-time tongue of Castile:

"O, ilustre y preagen del Grande Colon: Mil siglos durad grandiosa en la arena y en la remembranza de nuestro hacion."

O, remains and likeness of great Columbus! Let a thousand centuries hold thee, guarded sacredly in thy urn and in the memory of our nation.

More correct to life, it is asserted, is the statue of Columbus in the patio of the captain-general's palace a few squares below the cathedral. This statue is also of marble, life-size, with the right hand pointing to a globe set by the left foot—that globe which he was persecuted for believing to be round and not flat—and a chart. The head and face are those of a man forty-five or fifty years of age; and the countenance indicates a certain pathetic faith and purpose, half-buried and struggling beneath tides on tides of trouble.

No one can for a moment look upon that face and believe that the life of this man was a happy one. Rather that he suffered and was weighed on by anxiety from first to last; from the day he first set forth to raise funds for his ridiculed expedition, to that last hour in Santo Domingo when his noble life expired under ingratitude and malice. Such a face is a silent and lasting reproach to the age which it looked upon.—Youth's Companion.

*This statement is not entirely correct. Columbus died at Seville, Spain, May 20, 1506, and his remains were deposited in the convent of St. Francis. Some years afterward a marble tomb was erected over them with this inscription:

A Castilla y a Leon
Nuevo Mundo dio Colon.

In English, "To Castile and Leon a new world gave Colon."

In 1513 his body was transferred to the Carthusian Monastery of Las Cuevas, and in 1536 it was taken to San Domingo, and deposited in the Cathedral of that city. Finally, in 1795, it was removed with great pomp to Havana, where it now reposes as stated above.—ED.

Editor Restitution:

Please receive my thanks for sending me your paper after my subscription expired. If upon the reception of THE RESTITUTION each week it gladdens the hearts of all as it does ours how much joy it affords. It seems should we be obliged to do without THE RESTITUTION it would be a sorrowful event. We thank our Heavenly Father that we are enabled to send a small amount from time to time, and continue its coming.

The Church here is slowly increasing. A year ago (in April) Bro. Ramsey met with us. The first time he spoke four times, and baptized four. He came again in July, and baptized six. Conference was held here in August, and two young ladies from a distance were immersed into the Christ.

Bro. Eychaner preached here three times in January. Bro. Hatch arrived here Feb. 19, and preached to discourses. We rejoice that our labor has not been in vain. Some are beginning to manifest an interest in the truth. Brethren let us keep the good work moving. We should never say we are too poor, but freely give what we have.

Last spring we organized a Bible Reading. We met part of the time in our hired hall, and part of the time from house to house, read, sang songs and prayed. In this way some of the young members become interested and acquainted with God's word, all of which is necessary in order to enable us to rightly do God's will. How can we do God's will if we do not study to know it.

Bro. T. J. Whitesitt is engaged to preach for us once a month the coming year. His appointment will be the third Sunday in each month. We invite all who can to meet with us.

Yours in the faith,
ALMUS ADAMS.

I send you two dollars for the paper. I thank you for your kindness in sending the paper so long after my time expired. I like the paper very much. It is the only one I am taking. I do not care to read the political journals, but prefer to read something that will enlighten me in the things concerning the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ.

Your Brother,

FAITHFUL ABRAHAM.

The morning sun rose bright and clear,
On Abram's tent it gaily shone,
While all was bright and cheerful there—
All save the patriarch's heart alone.

While that's command alone to view,
It forced into his eye a tear:
For all a father's love was there,
And nature fondly lingered near.

The simple morning feast was spread,
And Isaac at the banquet smiled;
Joy o'er her face its lustre shed,
For near her sat her only child.

The charge that pleased a monarch's heart,
Upon his brow had left their trace:
His highly aggrieved feeling
Was written on his hoary face.

But he (the father turned away).
And walked the inner tent apart;
He felt his fortitude give way,
For nature whispered in his heart

"I must the son to whom was given
The promise of the blessed land,
Heir to the choicest gift of heaven,
Be slain by a fond father's hand!

Arise, my son, the crime fill,
And stare the strip with due supply:
For we must seek Moriah's hill.
Ah! fet there a sacrifice."

The mother raised a sparkling eye,
For all a mother's love was there;
She feared the desert drear and dry,
She feared the savage lurking there.

Abram beheld, and made reply—
"Go him from whom all blessings flow."
My sister, o'er by faith rely:
'Tis God's command, and we must go.

The obedient son, in haste obeyed.
The strip was filled, the asses prepared,
And with the third day's twilight shade
Moriah's lofty hill appeared.

"I see yon shade at a distance wait—
Also I see the ram and fire,
The wood on Isaac's shoulders laid:
The wood to build his funeral pyre!

While on the mountain brow they stood,
In childish wonder, Isaac cries
"My father, lo! the fire and wood,
But where's the lamb for sacrifice?

No passion swayed the monarch's mind,
Or hear him answer, low and calm,
With steady voice and look resigned—
"God will himself provide a lamb.

But lo! the father bound his son,
And laid him on the funeral pile,
And then stretched forth his trembling hand
And took the knife to slay his child.

While Abram raised the blade full high,
To execute his God's command,
An angel's voice as from the sky,
Cried, Abram, spare thine only son!

Ages on ages rolled away;
At length the appointed hour came,
When on the Mount of Calvary,
God did himself provide a Lamb!

GENESIS THE THIRD: HISTORY NOT FABLE.—Lecture I. Part 2.

THE PLACE WHICH THE MOSAIC ACCOUNT OF THE CREATION AND FALL OF MAN OCCUPIES IN HOLY SCRIPTURE.

"As in Adam all die, so in Christ shall all be made alive." 1 Cor. xv. 22.

Everyone who has followed attentively this complete induction of Bible reference to the Mosaic history of man's creation and fall, must allow that the modern attempt to resolve the early chapters of Genesis into an allegory or a fable, is inconsistent with any rational recognition of the inspiration or authority of Jesus Christ and his apostles. If their inspiration was consistent with the delusion of taking for truth an old world myth on the origin of things, with making that myth (destitute as it was, in every line, of historic reality) the very basis of their system of belief, the very centre of their circle of instruction, the very foundation of the alleged procedure of God in redemption—then their inspiration was not of a quality to command my faith and obedience in any other particular. If the fact really be, that human nature, instead of being a recent and direct creation of God, is an ancient and gradual evolution from the animal race, a specialized form of the anthropoid apes which existed before the glacial epoch, at least a quarter of a million of years ago; then sin in man is not sin, it is the natural and necessary outbreak of his bestial original nature; and death is not the effect of sin, but is the necessary heritage of a being descended from living forms which never had a glimpse of immortality, the earth's mortal offspring; and the Christian doctrine of redemption from a death incurred by sin, through the union of the Eternal Nature with man's, is at once a shocking contradiction to the facts, and a monstrous profanation of the Power which is behind the veil. Dr. Martineau, who has consistently abandoned the whole Bible as a supernatural work, justly characterizes the real effect of what is considered by many the scientific improvement on the Mosaic history. He says:—"And in so far as church belief is still committed to a given cosmogony and natural history of man, it lies open to scientific refutation, and has already received from it many a wound under which it visibly pines away. It is needless to say that the new 'Book of Genesis,' which resorts to Lucretius for its first beginnings, to protoplasm for its fifth day, to 'natural selection' for its Adam and Eve, and to evolution for all the rest, contradicts the old book at every point; and, inasmuch as it dissipates the dream of Paradise and removes the tragedy of the Fall, cancels at once the need and the scheme of redemption, and so leaves the historical churches of Europe crumbling away from their very foundations."—Religion as affected by Modern Materialism, p. 8.

It seems to me quite useless to disguise this conflict between the Bible and—not science, but that which, in the opinion of not a few in our time is thought worthy of the name of science. There can be no doubt that it is held for certain by many, including no small number of able and accomplished persons, that modern discovery has decisively proved the immense antiquity of man, his animal origin, and, consequently, the falsity of the Mosaic cosmogony and Edenic story, so that the fable of "Eve and the Apple" and the "talking serpent"—to use the favorite profane description—is widely received as a test measurement of any man's ignorance and credulity. A man who will believe that is proved to be both ignorant of facts, and undeserving of argument.

Who that reflects on this state of things can fail to conclude that there is some great mistake somewhere? Is the so-called scientific view of man's origin is really scientific, that is, is a matter of certain knowledge, and not of mere guess-work (and nothing less than certain knowledge is science), why, undoubtedly it follows that, not merely Moses was mistaken, but that Christ and all his apostles were mistaken also. Christianity is one complicated mistake, for it founds a doctrine of redemption on the history of the creation and fall of Adam, on the moral and not animal origin of sin; and if the Adam of Genesis never sinned, because he never existed, Christ was certainly not "sent from God," and "died in vain."

And yet one hesitates long before even contemplating this awful alternative of the abandonment of New Testament Christianity. If we speak of scientific evidence, there is other evidence also; that of Revelation, with all its complication of proofs, not lost in the dimness of past millions of ages, but very near at hand. Its prophetic evidence is around us, in the state of the world, in the state of mankind, of the Jews, of Western Asia, of Europe with its corrupted religion. Its moral evidence is before us, in the Bible—a library of books written during 1,500 years and filling for eighteen centuries since with joy and wonder all human hearts that are capable of appreciating charity, or beauty, or tenderness, or truth, or love. Its spiritual evidence is within us, in the response of the soul to its exalted strains, its soothing consolations, its visions of eternal joy. As God said of Israel, so say we of this Book of Life, "How shall I give them up?"—the one sweet ray of sunlight that falls on the midnight darkness of our destiny, the one soft word of pity that seems to breathe on us from the Infinite Realms in our passage to the grave. If it is unscientific to feel this, then so much the worse for the new philosophy.

Is it then possible that this so-called scientific conclusion of the antiquity of man, and of his bestial origin, is only a hideous delusion, notwithstanding the loud tones in which some are proclaiming it? Is it possible that this conclusion is a mere opinion, a mere guess and deduction from the wider hypothesis of general evolution; itself, however, surprising and even probable, as yet unproved to the satisfaction of thoroughly educated reasoners; especially when the possible methods of development are positively asserted to be the ultimate means of creation? Is it possible that this opinion of man's animal descent, so widely received as to be even taught by certain science masters and professors, in boy-schools and Sunday-schools, and workmen's colleges, is really not proved at all, by any evidence which commands the unanimous assent of physicists or careful reasoners of the first rank? Is it possible that this notion of the antiquity of man, and his evolution from the bestial races, so far from being really established on a basis to command the general acceptance of men of the first order of knowledge—much less established in strength sufficient to explode what has hitherto been regarded as divine revelation—is really nothing more than one of those "winds of doctrine," those temporary air-currents of belief, to which especially the English nature seems to be liable; due chiefly, as Dr. Dawson affirms, to an idolatrous and almost fanatical admiration for one or two leading English theorists,—to a fashion of plunging into a desperate partnership, without regard to the state of the evidence, to which second-rate workers in art, in politics, in religion, and in science, seem specially disposed, when the evidence is obscure, and the theory is favorable to other and deeper antagonisms?

Is it possible that, when closely examined, this theory of man's immense antiquity, however boldly affirmed by some, is resting at this moment chiefly on a sub-structure of so-called inferences from the growth of stalagmite and the age of gravels; which rouse nothing more than the indignation of men of the very first rank in knowledge, who grieve to see a mere succession of changing guesses represented to the multitudes as ascertained European science? Is it possible that statements which were put forth a few years ago in support of this theory have, one after another, been compulsorily withdrawn? Is it true that, in general, ordinary men's assurance of the truth is in inverse proportion to their detailed acquaintance with the state of the evidence? And, lastly, is it a fact that, if it were attempted at this moment to make it a test of membership in any of the great scientific societies of Europe, to confess the truth of the evolution theory in general, as universally and irrevocably established—much more the evolution of man from the animal races, as proved with any show whatever of positive evidence—or even the remote antiquity of the present race of man, as supported by any decisive evidence at all,—there is not one of these societies—English, French, German, or American—which would not be rent asunder by a violent convulsion of opposing conviction, from the Royal Society downwards—so deep, so strong, so indignant is the revolt of many of the leading lights of biology and archæology against the notion that anything has been demonstrably settled to shake the public faith in the recent and direct divine creation of the human race?

Professor Stokes, one of the secretaries of the Royal Society, a man closely conversant with the principal scientific men in Europe, in a paper recently read before the Church Congress, and repeated in a revised form elsewhere, said that in the absence of biological knowledge of our own, what must be done in order to test the value of opinions involving such momentous issues for all mankind is to examine the mode of argument of these writers in departments with which we are more familiar; and to compare the utterances of biological leaders in Europe and America with one another; so as not to be carried away by the authority of one or two considerable names. Science signifies absolute knowledge, not the opinion of some distinguished scientific men. What is absolutely known for certain is accepted by properly-qualified investigators in all lands. Tried by this test, the widely diffused notions of the animal origin and remote antiquity of the human race break down instantly. There is scarcely a single fact in the interpretation of which the leading biologists and archæologists of the world are agreed—certainly not one which can serve as a basis for a theory solid enough to overthrow the teaching of Divine Revelation.*

The work of examining the contradictory testimonies and opinions of the writers who have mixed into public favor the hypothesis of man's remote antiquity, and animal descent, has been recently performed with great care by several distinguished hands. It is sufficient to mention a few of the best publications; the first by Dr. Southall, in his work, "The Recent Origin of Man"; the second and third by Vice-Chancellor Dawson, in his two works on the "Origin of the Earth and Man," and on "Fossil Men." The two ablest and briefest popular compendiums of these and similar arguments are perhaps the anonymous "Chapters on Genesis and Evolution," and the Rev. B. G. Young's "Remote Antiquity of Man not Proved," in which last exceedingly valuable and laborious work, Mr. Young has briefly exhibited, with chapter and verse for every statement, a picture of the assertions and changing inferences of so-called science of the last twenty years on these subjects, which will, perhaps, enable every one who studies it to breathe freely again over the questions of the book of Genesis and the Christian Revelation. Canon Rawlinson, possessed, perhaps, of as much archæological knowledge as any living Englishman, has approached the subject of human antiquity on the positive and historical side, and has shown, from that point of view, that there is just as little reason to doubt the recent origin of the Adamic race Genesis, as from the scientific point of view treated in the other works to which I have just referred. If theologians have sometimes been tempted, as is justly said, into partiality of judgment by religious fears, it is at least equally certain that some students of natural history have of late been tempted into hasty conclusions on very insufficient evidence

* "Not a single fossil skull of an ape or ape-man has yet been found that could really have belonged to a human being." "Every addition to the amount of subject which we have obtained as materials for theorising has removed further from the hypothesis of continuity," "On the whole we must really say that there is a complete absence of any fossil ape of a lower stage in the development of man."—Professor Huxley's Problem of Anthropo.

"If that line which is supposed to have remained unbroken in man, and the first link between the lowest living creature from has yet been found. If the links ever existed their annihilation without trace is so exceedingly improbable it may be pronounced impossible. . . . We never can find evidence can never assert the contrary."—Professor Owen's Anatomy, vol Mamm.

ORIENTAL SKETCHES.—Second Series. Number 16.

MICHMASH.

Much pleased with the result of my visit to the site of Ai, I rode down the rocky glen through which the Israelites fled, and then over bare undulating table-land to Michmash, one of the ancient strongholds of Benjamin. My chief object now was to inspect the scene of Jonathan's singular and successful adventure. The village stands near the summit of a ridge which descends in rugged banks and broken cliffs to a deep valley. On the south side of the valley is a corresponding ridge, crowned by the buildings and ruins of the ancient Geba—about a mile distant, and in full view from Michmash. Half a mile further down eastward the valley contracts into a ravine, with high naked cliffs on each side; and above the cliff toward Michmash are a few acres of table-land. Riding down to this spot, and examining the features of the glen, the cliffs, and the opposite ridges, I felt convinced that here was the scene of Jonathan's exploit.

The Israelites under Saul were in Geba, and the Philistine army held Michmash. 1 Sam. xiii. 14. The Philistines, resolving to force the pass, left the town and advanced to the edge of the ravine (vs. 23). The Israelites, few in number and dispirited by long oppression (ver. 19–22) retreated to Migron, near Gibeah of Saul (xiv. 2). Jonathan, seeing the harassed state of his country, and the despair of his father's troops, resolved to make a bold attempt to surprise the enemy's camp. The cause of his sudden resolve and his hope of success he explained to his armor-bearer:—"It may be that the Lord will work for us, for there is no restraint to the Lord to save by many or by few" (ver. 6). "To all that is in mine heart," was the reply of his devoted follower; "I am with thee according to thy heart" (ver. 7). The nature of the ground favored the enterprise. At the point where they had to cross the ravine, "there was a sharp cliff on the one side, and a sharp cliff on the other" (ver. 4). Stealthily and cautiously they descended the southern cliff, screened from view by projecting rocks. They then climbed the north bank to a place where, by stepping out on some projecting ledge, they could be in view of the Philistines and yet sufficiently distant to escape if requisite. Advancing from behind a crag they showed themselves to the enemy, who naturally said to each other, on seeing them so close to the camp, "Behold the Hebrews come forth out of the holes where they had hid themselves." "Come up to us," cried the Philistines. The desired omen was thus given (compare verses 10, 12). "Upon their hands and upon their feet" these brave men scaled the rocks, and rushed upon the foe. A sudden panic seized the whole host. The Lord fought for Israel. The strange and unexpected attack, and the simultaneous shock of an earthquake, created such terror and confusion, that the Philistines madly fought with each other (ver. 16). From the heights of Geba Saul's watchmen saw the Philistine army melting away; and Saul's own ear caught the din of battle (ver. 16, 19). Collecting his men he crossed the pass and joined in the slaughter. Swiftly the tidings sped over hill and dale—through city and village—"The Philistines flee;" and swiftly the men of Israel rush from cave, and rock, and stronghold, and join in pursuit (ver. 21, 22). The battle of Michmash was the first of those fierce conflicts carried on at intervals through the long reigns of Saul and David, and which eventually resulted in the final expulsion of the Philistines from the mountains of Israel.

The modern inhabitants of Michmash seem to inherit something of the fierce and predatory spirit of the Philistines. They dogged me wherever I went muttering threats and curses, at first sullen, but in the end demanding bakhshish. I took no notice of them further than was absolutely necessary. When at length, having finished my survey of the battle-field, and a sketch of the "pass," I mounted my horse to go to Geba, they drew up before me in formidable array, and swore by "the life of the prophet" I should not move. I insisted, however, in breaking through their ranks; and fortunately for me their valor did not go beyond presenting a few old muskets at my head, and a noisy brandishing of swords and daggers. The goat track by which I had to descend the glen bank was, perhaps, quite as dangerous to life and limb as the lawless ragabonds of Michmash. I have traversed many bad roads in my Syrian wanderings; I have ridden my Arab horse to the very highest peaks of Hermon and Lebanon; but the pass of Michmash was the worst I had ever encountered.

Geba, the ancient city of Canaan, the stronghold of Benjamin, is now represented by a few ruinous huts, in which some half-dozen families of shepherds find a home. A shattered tower, and the foundations of an old church, with heaps of hewn stones and rubbish, are the only vestiges of former greatness. Standing there all solitary on its bare rocky ridge, looking down over barren hills and naked ravines, upon the scathed valley of the Jordan, it is the very type of desolation. The curse has fallen heavily upon "Geba of Benjamin." When Elisha came up the defile from Jericho to Bethel, forests clothed the surrounding heights; now there is not a tree. 2 Kings ii. 24. Vineyards then covered the terraced sides of glen and hill, from base to summit. They have all disappeared. Cities and fortresses, in the days of Israel's power, crowned every peak and studded every ridge; shapeless mounds now mark their deserted sites. From the side of Geba no less than nine ruined towns and villages were pointed out to me. How wonderfully have the predictions of Moses been fulfilled! "I will destroy your high places.... I will make your cities waste, and bring your sanctuaries into desolation.... And I will bring the land into desolation; and your enemies which dwell therein shall be astonished at it." Lev. xxvi. 30–32.

ANATHOTH.

Anathoth is barely three miles south of Geba, and yet the road is so bad, and the intervening glens so deep and rugged, that I was a full hour in reaching it. Were it not for its sacred associations, no man would ever dream of visiting Anathoth — a poor village of some twenty houses, built among white rocks and white ruins, on a bare, grey mountain side. No trees, no verdure, no richness, or grandeur, or beauty; and yet here, in this ancient city of priests (Josh. xxi. 18), the prophet Jeremiah was born (i. 1). Here he received his first commission to warn and threaten a rebellious nation (i. 5–19); and here, amid mountain solitudes and rocky dells, he mourned and wept over the forescen calamities of his beloved country. When I looked out over that of which Anathoth commands a prospect wide and wild, his words seemed linked with a double power and pathos: "Oh that my head were waters, and mine eyes a fountain of tears, that I might weep day and night for the slain of the daughter of my people! Oh that I had in the wilderness a lodging place of wayfaring men, that I might leave my people, and go from them!" Jer. ix. 1, 2. One can trace, in nearly all the images and illustrations with which his writings abound, the influence of those wild scenes amid which he passed his boyhood. Mountains, rocks, wild beasts, shepherds, are again and again introduced; and when predicting the utter ruin of Israel, he says, with characteristic allusion to his home,—"The spoilers are come upon all high places through the wilderness." Jer. xii. 12. The view from Anathoth is dreary and desolate, but it is singularly instructive to the thoughtful student of Jeremiah's prophecies.

"thirsty desert, fountainless and dry,"

GIBEAH OF SAUL.

Looking westward from the village, my eye caught the white top of a conical hill, rising over an intervening ridge. "What is the name of that hill?" I said to an old man at my side. "Tuleil el-Ful," he replied. Seven long hours I had already been in the saddle, under a cloudless sun, and I had not enjoyed even for a moment "the shadow of a great rock" in that "weary land;" yet the surpassing, all-absorbing interest of holy sites and holy associations made me insensible to fatigue. Tuleil el-Ful, I knew, was covered of yore with the buildings of Gibeah, the city which, by its crimes, brought such calamities on the tribe of Benjamin (Judg. xix.); which gave Israel its first king (1 Sam. xi. 4); and which witnessed the unparalleled maternal tenderness and devotion of poor bereaved Rizpah. 2 Sam. xxi. 8–11.

Half an hour's hard ride brought me to its base, and in a few minutes more I was on its summit. A rude cairn on the hill-top—a few massive foundations now supporting little terraces along the sides—some scattered ruins at the western base—these alone mark the site of the royal city of Benjamin. Its very name has long since gone, unless indeed the Arabic Tuleil ("little hill") be a translation of the Hebrew Gibeah.

SAUL IDENTIFIED.

Riding towards Jerusalem, another conical hill attracted my attention. It is about half a mile from Gibeah. I found on its sides and summit traces of a small but very ancient town, cisterns hewn in the rock, large building stones, portions of the hill levelled and cut away, and the ruins of a small tower. It commands a distinct, though distant view of Mount Zion; Moriah and Olivet being hid by an intervening ridge. I felt convinced that this is the site of the long lost Nob; and I here saw how graphic was the whole description of the march of the Assyrian host upon Jerusalem, as given by Isaiah. I had followed the line from Ai; and on the top of this hill I understood the full meaning of the last sentence, "He shall remain at Nob that night, he shall shake his hand against the mount of the daughter of Zion, the hill of Jerusalem." Isa. x. 28–32.

Between Nob and Gibeah is a deep retired vale, which must have been the scene of the affecting interview between David and Jonathan, recorded in 1 Samuel xx. David seeing that his life was threatened at the court of Saul, went to Nob, got Goliath's sword from Ahimelech the high priest, and fled to Gath. David's visit sealed the fate of Nob. A base Edomite betrayed the innocent priest; and when no Israelite dared to carry out the savage commands of a tyrant king, Doeg proved a willing executioner.

Abimelech and his whole family were murdered, and "he smote Nob with the edge of the sword, both men and women, children, and sucklings, and oxen, and asses, and sheep." 1 Sam. xxii. Sitting on the desolate site I read the story of that terrible massacre; and I shuddered as I looked around and saw the rocks once stained with the blood of the helpless victims. Can we wonder that Ezekiel was commissioned to pronounce a curse upon Palestine, when he could with such truth assign as its cause, "for the land is full of bloody crimes" (vii 23).

Another hour brought me to my home on Olivet, and to the end of one of the most interesting and profitable excursions I ever made in Palestine.—J. L. Porter, A. M.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

There will be a debate held 7 miles southeast of Delcon, Texas, beginning on the 2nd day of July, between W. H. Wright of the Disciples and J. P. Todd of the Brethren of Christ. Propositions to be debated,

1. Does the consciousness of man wholly cease between death and the resurrection? J. P. Todd affirms, W. H. Wright denies.

2. Does the kingdom of God or the kingdom of Christ exist on the earth at this time? W. H. Wright affirms, J. P. Todd denies.

To the Friends of "The Restitution."

The cost of publishing THE RESTITUTION for the year just closed exceeded the receipts over $360. To repay this deficiency and secure means to publish the paper another year, we must raise, outside the regular subscription, at least $500. To secure that amount, the Board of Directors have requested me to appeal to each subscriber to contribute at least one dollar extra. This is not asked as a donation, but brethren are requested to send names of persons to whom they wish the paper sent, with their contributions and the paper will be sent to such persons in payment for the amounts sent by each.

There are a large number of brethren and sisters in different localities who are unable to pay for the paper, and who would be very glad of the privilege of reading it. These are known to Brother Chaplin, the Editor. I would suggest that brethren who have no one to whom they specially desire to send the paper, send their contributions to THE RESTITUTION office with a request that the paper be sent to some worthy Christian who will appreciate it, but who is unable to pay for it. In this way brethren will be able to gladden the hearts of many poor but le ment good Christians, and at the same time help to furnish the means to keep the paper going.

The fund will be known as "Free Will Offerings." Let each reader of THE RESTITUTION make a small sacrifice, and contribute at least one dollar, always remembering that the many persons to whom the paper will be thus sent will thank and bless you, and your Heavenly Father will reward you.

The Restitution.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXII. Read PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, JUNE 27, 1883. NO. 24.

THE RESTITUTION.

TERMS—TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR; Payable in advance. Three and six Months at the same rate.

Address all Letters and Communications to THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates "the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints associated with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

THE LAND OF THE PHILISTINES.

"Thus saith the Lord God; Behold, I will stretch out mine hand upon the Philistines, and I will cut off the Cherethims, and destroy the remnant of the sea coast."—Ezek. xxv. 16.

We rode down from Jerusalem on Saturday, hoping to spend a quiet Sunday in the Franciscan convent of Ramleh. The good fathers received us with even more than ordinary hospitality, and quartered us in their choicest cells. They supplied our table, too, with the best their larder afforded, and as we were all well inured to Eastern life, we were able to enjoy the fare. In the early part of Sunday we were left alone, and the deep silence of the convent was most impressive. At intervals the solemn chant of the Latin service in the chapel swept through the cloistered courts and along the corridors, now swelling forth in full harmony, now dying away in a plaintive wail, and again awakening like an echo. In the afternoon an Italian monk, who had been previously acquainted with one of my companions, joined our party. He had seen much of the world, and was a man of polished manners and extensive information. He seemed anxious to promote the cause of education in Syria, but spoke despondingly of this work, to which, he told us, he had devoted his life. His doubts and fears arose mainly from the difficulties thrown in his way by his superiors, and from the limited means at his command. After some general conversation, we all sat down to read together the various passages of Scripture referring to Philistia and its old war-like inhabitants.

The Philistines, we are told, were an Egyptian tribe, descendants of Ham, who, at some unknown period before the time of Abraham, left their native country and settled on the southern coast of Canaan. Singularly enough, though always called, even by the Israelites, "strangers," (for such is the meaning of Philistines,) they gave to the whole land the name it bears to this day—PALESTINE. Abraham and Isaac lived in peace with the Philistine chiefs; and though their dependants had occasional quarrels, yet they led their flocks on the same pastures and watered them at the same wells. But in after ages the Philistines became the most determined foes of the Israelites.

Philistia is the garden of Palestine. It is about forty miles long from Joppa to Gaza, and about fifteen wide from the Mediterranean to the mountains of Judah. Along the whole seaboard are white sandy downs. Within these is the broad undulating plain, with its deep rich soil, and low mounds at intervals, over whose summits the grey ruins of great cities are now strewn in the dust. On the east the mountains send out their roots far into the plain, carrying with them their rocks, and brave, and jungles of dwarf trees and shrubs; and leaving between them picturesque winding vales. Such is Philistia, the Shepelah ("low country" or "valley") of the Bible. 2 Chron. xxvi. 10; Deut. i. 7. It is a noble region, and it was defended by its old inhabitants with a heroism and devotion which has been rarely equalled. The Philistine warriors could dash across the unbroken plains in their chariots of iron, and drive all their foes before them; but the moment they attempted to penetrate the mountain defiles they were overmatched by the active Jewish infantry. The physical character of these neighboring countries solves the mystery of the long, fierce, and undecided struggles of the two nations.

We were deep in our studies, and were becoming rapidly more and more interested in the stories of Samson, the capture of the ark, and David and Goliath, when suddenly the silence that reigned around us was broken by a straggling fire of musketry in the distance. It came nearer. The roll of kettle-drums was next heard, at first faintly, but growing each moment louder and clearer, till at length the ringing shots and warlike music seemed beneath the convent walls. Then there was a hurrying to and fro, and banging of doors, followed by polyglot shouting. The monk started up in manifest alarm, and rushed out. We all followed, supposing the Bedawin were making a sudden raid. On gaining the terraced roof, which commanded a view of the great gate, we discovered the cause of all the din and bustle: a Roman Archbishop was on his way to the Holy City, escorted by a troop of irregular cavalry, who showed alike the importance of their trust and their reverence for the Sabbath by making as much noise as their guns and drums were capable of. Unfortunately for our peace, his Eminence resolved to pass the night at Ramleh. To escape for a time from the tumult, I proposed a walk over to Lydda, and my companions gladly acquiesced.

LYDDA.

The sun was already low in the west when we entered the broad avenue-like road that leads to Lydda. It was a beautiful evening—the sky cloudless, the atmosphere transparent as crystal. The sunbeams fell slanting on the dense foliage of the orange and apricot trees, here gilding the topmost leaves, and yonder shooting in lines of gold through the openings. The sea breeze was just setting in. Now it played among the rustling branches of the tall palms, and now it seemed to come down for a moment and breathe its balmy breath in our faces. The road, covered deeply with red sand, is lined with orchards, in which we saw orange, lemon, peach, pomegranate, and carob trees, intermixed with the palm, walnut, and sycamore; and the whole enclosed by huge hedges of cactus, whose luscious fruit, clinging sparingly to the sides of the great thick leaves, was now almost ripe. An easy walk of three-quarters of an hour brought us to Lodd, the modern as well as the more ancient name of the apostolic Lydda. 1 Chron. viii. 12. I have often been sadly disappointed on approaching an old Bible city, which fancy had somehow decked in the choicest beauties of nature and art, but which reality transformed into mud hovels on a rocky hill-side. It was not so with Lydda. Even now, though its glory is gone, Lydda has an imposing look. It is embowered in verdure. Olive groves encircle it, and stretch far out over the surrounding plain, and their dusky hue is relieved here and there by the brighter foliage of the apricot and mulberry; while, near the houses, vines are seen creeping over garden walls and clambering up the great gnarled trunks and branches of the walnut trees.

The village stands on a gentle eminence, and high above its terraced roofs rise the splendid ruins of England's patron saint. Lydda, tradition says, was the native place of St. George; and England's chivalrous king, the lion-hearted Richard, built in his honor this noble church, the ruins of which now form the chief attraction of Lodd. The walls and part of the groined roof of the chancel still remain, and also one lofty pointed arch with its massive clustered columns and white marble capitals, rich in carving and fretwork.

We climbed to the top of the crumbling wall, and there sat down to read the story of Peter's visit to this place Acts, ix. 32–39. The whole village was in full view, and the great plain around it. Peter was away on one of his missionary tours in the hill country of Samaria, "and he came down also to the saints which dwelt at Lydda." He came down through the defiles of those mountains, and across that broad rich plain of Sharon, or "Saron," and up the gentle ascent to this old town. The saints met him as he entered, and told him of the sufferings of poor paralytic Eneas; and the scene then enacted at his bed-side was such as the people had never before witnessed. "Peter said unto him, Eneas, Jesus Christ maketh thee whole; arise and make thy bed. And he arose immediately." As the words reached his ears, divine power operated on his body. The wondrous tidings sped from mouth to mouth, from group to group, from town to country. All eagerly enquired; some probably at first doubted, but when they saw the healed paralytic, faith triumphed, and "all that dwelt in Lydda and Saron turned to the Lord." The joyful news soon found its way to Joppa, ten miles distant; and then the mourning friends of the charitable Tabitha despatched quick messengers to tell Peter of her death, half hoping that even she might not be beyond the reach of his power. Peter delayed not, but set out across that western plain on another journey of mercy.

As we looked from our commanding position over that wide landscape, we could not but admit that there was a charm in it independent of all its hallowed associations. It was one of those views which, like a picture by Claude, never pass from the memory. On the north lay the vast plain of Sharon, variegated with green meadows and yellow corn-fields; for, though only the end of April, the fields were "already white to the harvest." In the far distance we could just distinguish the pale blue summits of Carmel. On the east, the view was bounded by the long range of the mountains of Israel, their rounded tops now tinged with the ruddy evening light; and the deep purple shadows of their ravines throwing out in bold relief the old ruined cities and modern villages that crown nearly all the projecting cliffs. On the south, a swell in the plain concealed Philistia; but that swell was clothed with the orchards of Ramleh, whose tapering minarets and tall white tower shoot up from the midst of the dense foliage. On the west, beyond the gardens, there was first a stretch of brown sandy plain; then a narrow dark belt, traced by the orange groves of Joppa; and then the Mediterranean, gleaming like a mirror of burnished gold beneath the setting sun.

On Monday morning, before the sun had yet risen over Judah's hills, we were all in the saddle, following a gay trooper, bristling with arms, along the broad sandy road to Philistia. Selim, our new companion, was to fill the double post of guide and guard: and he was admirably qualified for office; for he knew the name of every village, fountain, and wady between Ramleh and Gaza; and he was on terms of close friendship with all the bandits in the province. Our route was at first dreary enough, traversing bleak downs of brown sand, over which a few flocks of sheep and goats followed their shepherds, apparently bound for better pastures. But the morning, as usual, was bright and beautiful, the air fresh and exhilarating, and Selim full of tales of border raids, and wild traditions about Samson and Jalud (Goliath); so we got on cheerily. An hour's ride brought us to the top of the swell which separates Sharon from Philistia. The latter plain now opened up before us, rolling away to the southern horizon in graceful undulations, clothed with a rich mantle of green and gold—harvest-field, and pasture-land. Ruins were visible everywhere; but the villages were few, small, and far between. The distant hill-sides were more thickly studded with them; and Selim told us that though, like the old Danites, the people lived there for security, their possessions and crops were chiefly in the plain.—J. L. Porter, A. M.

GENESIS THE THIRD: HISTORY, NOT FABLE.—Lecture II. Part 1.

THE GENERAL OBJECTIONS URGED AGAINST THE TRUTH OF THE HISTORY OF THE FALL.

In the former lecture I presented an exact statement of the place occupied in the Old and New Testaments by the narrative of the recent creation of man, and his fall from the hope of eternal life through disobedience to God. In a record of Divine Revelation professedly historical, and constituting an organic whole, not only does this narrative stand at the beginning of the history of mankind, but its importance increases with the successive stages of revelation. It is treated as historical truth by the Son of God himself, and is made the basis of the doctrine of redemption by the apostles of the gospel. We then presented a brief view of those ideas of our origin and nature which have recently gained a wide acceptance, and which arise from the doctrine of evolution taken in its application to man; showing that, in Dr. Martineau's words, they are totally irreconcilable with the Biblical doctrines of man's recent and direct creation in God's image, of the entrance of death by sin, and of redemption by the Incarnation. One or the other must be abandoned as untrue. Reference was then made to works of solid value, in which it is argued from evidence, that the mistake lies with the believers in the "new book of Genesis," as Dr. Martineau terms it—not with the believers in the old one. The object contemplated in these lectures will not permit of the detailed presentation of the arguments by which these writers have proved that the new notions of the remote antiquity of man and of his animal descent cannot be truly called scientific, that is, proved to be true, and therefore are to be regarded only as the opinions of some distinguished men of science, in which they are strongly opposed by other at least equally famous biologists and archæologists. For the arguments in question I must refer to the books previously named.

In what follows, declining any opinion on the evolution of animals, I must assume the validity of these arguments; and therefore the unshaken historical reality of the account of man's creation in Genesis. My present purpose is solely to consider the objections commonly urged against the truth and reality of the narrative of the fall itself, chiefly by those who do not reject the general truth of Revelation.

For others, who go further in disbelief, who differ from us in their fundamental principles of thought, I fear that we can expect little advantage from the present study. Those of us who believe in God, in a God omnipresent, active, and morally governing the world, cannot be brought to agree in philosophy or faith, with men who think that there is probably nothing alive in this universe except themselves and the animals,—that beyond this planet there is no thought or sensation. Anything like an inclination towards atheism places a great gulf between itself and those who believe in a living God,—and the narrative of Adam and Eve, explain it as you will, is not likely to prove a reconciling influence. We turn then to those who believe in God, and believe in some sense in Christ as the Son of God, but who find too many difficulties in Genesis to allow their accepting as historical its opening narrative. Before considering any specific objections made to the historical reality of the account of man in Paradise, it is proper to notice two of a more general character, (1) that which arises from the highly supernatural quality of the story, and (2) the anthropomorphic (or manlike) views which it is said to give of the action of Deity. It is said that the details are contrary to all experience, that some of them are grotesque, and that the alleged interventions of God are worthy only of the most primitive and barbaric fancy. These objections, if valid, lie equally against, not only the whole Scripture history, but all intentions of direct divine action in nature.

It is wonderful sometimes to listen to the objections to supernatural Bible history which are made by men who are well acquainted with the work of God in nature. The objection, if it means anything at all, means that you must not associate the idea of Deity with details in the universe, but only with universal laws; that to impute to God minute or definite acts of creation or providence, or to think of him as the "man in the next street" to use Dr. M. Arnold's phrase, is to dishonor the idea of an eternal cause. The notion seems to be that the Infinite mind can be occupied only with general and abstract ideas, and not with the detailed application of laws or forces; as if those abstract and general ideas were anything more than the algebraic symbols required by the weakness of finite minds—or as if we could even conceive of an all-pervading intelligent Deity who did not see all general ideas in every one of their special applications; and, if he worked at all, worked in detail. Now let any man who believes in an intelligent Power behind nature, and working in nature—think of what we know of the interior economy of a spider's nest, an anthill, a bee-hive, as described by Lubbock and Romanes, and then tell us whether Creative Power is too great for details. Why, all natural history proves that God "taketh care" for animals down to the very animalcule—in Christ's sublime language, that "not one of them is forgotten before him." There is no remedy for disbelief in Bible history because of its details of divine action and interference, so effectual as study of natural history both in animal and vegetable life. That a man shall trace out the marvels of the fertilization of flowers, or the economy of ants and bees, and then find a difficulty in the books of Genesis or Leviticus as imputing too much detail to God, is surely to be very unreasonable and inconsistent. The Scripture requires us to believe in relation to man only what we cannot help believing in relation to insects, that some marvellous intelligence is behind nature, and that nothing is too minute for its contrivance or care.

The objection to the supernatural element in the history of Paradise is but one specific example of a wider objection to the supernatural altogether, and lies equally against the whole recorded history of the Bible. Those who are resolved to account for all things by the single action of natural causes will allow of no divine direct agency whatsoever, and against these objectors it is idle to attempt to establish the truth of this particular supernatural history; but those who admit the reality of divine direct agency in the subsequent history of man, are to the last degree unreasonable in objecting to the record of such agency at its commencement. The Bible is one prolonged denial of the doctrine that a uniform course of nature is an adequate description of the history of this world. It is professedly a record, from first to last, of a series of direct interferences of God, both in creation and providence, supernatural, because the end to be attained was above law—the salvation of man—and this series of interferences becomes credible to the mind precisely in proportion as it is studied in connection with nature, studied as a whole, and studied in the light of its alleged object, the bestowment of eternal life on sinful and dying men. Assuredly the earlier chapters of Genesis are full, in every line, of what was likely if man had a beginning in God, of statements of such direct divine operations. In the first chapter we see Almighty God directly creating certain animals at the time of the creation of man. We see him directly "creating woman out of man," the reverse of the subsequent order of nature. In the third chapter we see God placing man in the Paradise, under a special trial of his moral nature, arraigning him for disobedience, and then passing sentence on the man, the woman, and the serpent-tempter. This style of writing is not peculiar to the opening pages of Moses. It continues to the end of the Bible—the assertion of the direct, constant, minute, supernatural action of God in mercy and in judgment.

Now when such statements do not meet with the assent of faith, faith which discerns the truth even in the miracle, the counter-feeling which they raise is that of strong disbelief, and generally of ridicule, ridicule being the expression of the sense of incongruity and total incredibility. Accordingly the Bible is in our time either believed as a supernatural whole, or, quite logically, rejected and ridiculed as a whole. Nothing is easier than to ridicule the Bible by comparing it with common life. The more closely men study the uniformity of nature, and the ordinary course of events, the more will they be struck with the extraordinary quality of the miraculous record of Scripture; and, unless they have spiritual reasons for believing it, the more incongruous and ridiculous will it all appear. But such a sense of the ridiculous offers no solid basis of argument. Moreover, what is true outlives derision. Whatever is serious in purpose and aim, spiritual in feeling, and beautiful in form, vanquishes ridicule at last, even when the event is supernatural. The Bible, with all its miracles, has outlasted a hundred and fifty generations of scoffers; just as Christ's name has survived the derision of all the literati of Palestine, Greece, and Rome, who at first laughed him to scorn as a messenger of heaven.

Besides, some things which like this early narrative bear an insignificant appearance when judged by the eye, or by the first impression, possess a truly majestic importance when more closely examined, and judged by the higher powers of the mind. I have been informed that when Queen Victoria slowly advanced in the procession of statesmen, and judges, and other notabilities of the realm, up the great hall of the new Palace of Justice, in her plain black dress, and with her petite figure, she seemed the most indistinguished person present in that splendid and illustrious assemblage. But when you came to think that same undistinguished figure carried with it a spirit which is the living central force of the world-encircling empire of Britain, the living fountain of honor, the living representative of law, of administration, of naval and military rank and authority over one-fifth of mankind—that in her was made visible the descended authority and majesty of a hundred kings, the result of ages of conflict and progressive liberty; when you further remembered that beneath this outward form shone a character earned by forty years of the most spotless and most triumphant integrity on the throne, a well-tried character, before which Europe with its powerful nations, and Asia with its 800,000,000, and Africa with its dusky potentates, and America with its mighty republics, all bow with reverent affection, and even with enthusiasm—you felt that this is a world in which, if you always judge according to the appearance, you will not judge righteous judgment.

Just so it is, I think, with this narrative of the ancestors of mankind, Adam and Eve, in the book of Genesis. It has been through all ages, it is today, the object of unmeasured merciless ridicule to the unbelieving world. It has, of late, become also and equally the object of contempt, when taken as a literal history, to persons professing themselves to be scientific Christians. We have heard that "conscience stands utterly aghast, and reason utterly revolted at the notion that a miraculously talking reptile persuaded an inconceivably constituted woman, a few thousand years ago, to eat an actual apple, whereby men, women and children of the nineteenth century are guilty and accursed in the sight of God." This is the old scoff expressed in modern language, with perversions borrowed from mediæval painting; and it is, in my opinion, a case of derision which itself tends to become ridiculous; immediately that you bestow on the grand old narration a serious reading. For we have here, in the third of Genesis, taken as historical, at least a succession of lofty and elevating ideas, which must at once redeem it from the contempt of thoughtful readers, even when regarded in its utmost literality.

It requires little candor to admit that any true account of the origin of mankind must be, in its circumstances, exceedingly unlike our modern development, and that to require similarity to our own experience as the condition of belief in such an account is a sign of a somewhat narrow apprehension. Whatever theory of man's origin be adopted, the beginning must have been so unlike the ending that, if unlikeness to our own experience is to bring down ridicule, no theory can escape it. Even if the favorite notion be true that man originated in some collateral ancestor of the anthropoid apes or gorillas, it must have been a day of wonder in "the infinite azure of the past," when that black-faced, long-tailed, hairy monster, recently described for us by Mr. Grant Allen, first thought and spoke as a man; and another day, much unlike our own, when this developed brute first stood upright, and found a half rational help-meet in a similarly developed female anthropoid. If ridicule here is to be the test of truth, ridicule excited by unlikeness to modern experience, the story of Adam and Eve, glowing fresh in strength and beauty from the direct hand of God, will bear comparison with that of the infinitely slow development of this prognathous brute of pseudo-science; whose fierce, dull eye gradually gleamed with reason, and whose bellowings and roarings, during the course of thousands of years spent amidst the post-glacial morasses and jungles (Dr. Max Müller says it is quite inconceivable), gradually subsided into human speech.* It is doubtless difficult, under any theory or any circumstances, to make the two opposite ends of the world believe in, or even understand each other. Adam and Eve no doubt, appear at this distance in their naked beauty as mythical and poetic personages—to men of the nineteenth century; and if some of our freethinking ladies and gentlemen of the present age could have been exhibited in vision to Adam and Eve, in their modern dress and style of speech and behavior they would probably have regarded these persons as bad phantasms of the imagination, and would have rejected with scorn the idea that such strange fantastic beings could by any possibility be their descendants. They might even have fallen back, with some reason, upon the notion that they were allegorical personages, or even descendants of the fur-clad monsters of the woods. The evidence of dissimilarity presses us on every side. The maddest of all hypotheses is that of inelastic uniformitarianism. Genesis the third may very well be true, even although it is much unlike a chapter in the modern history of London or Berlin.

I think, then, that we may well dismiss the objection that the Edenic narrative is too dissimilar to modern experience to allow of believing it, since any account of man's original is open to the same objection, and pre-eminently the pseudo-scientific, while in both cases the objection is futile.—Edward White.

* Dr. Max Müller declares: "There is between the whole animal kingdom on the one side and man, even in his lowest state, on the other, a barrier which no animal has ever crossed, and that barrier is language. By no effort of the understanding, by no stretch of the imagination, can I explain to myself how language could have grown out of anything which animals possess, even if granted millions of years for that purpose."

Light on the situation in the far East has been thrown, by the Secretary of the Chinese Legation at Washington, who, in an interview with a reporter of the Herald last week, stated that there was no doubt that if France should refuse to recognize the sovereign protectorate of China over its dependency of Annam, hostilities would be inevitable; that while the cause of quarrel was strictly between the Annamites and the French, China could not afford to permit any interference of France, even if countenanced by the King of Annam, the vassal of China, and would interpose at all hazards. For this purpose the Viceroy Li had already been ordered to take command of the Chinese troops and a Chinese fleet ordered to Tonquin. He also remarked that although foreign nations had been accustomed to believe in the impotency of the Chinese as a warlike people, she had made rapid improvements in the modern arts and sciences and great progress in the art of warfare. It must be remembered, he said, that China is a different nation to what it was fifty years ago. They have now all the modern improvements in rifles, muskets, light and heavy artillery, mortars, shells, etc., besides well-drilled troops. Besides this France having no near base of operations as Russia or England would have, must necessarily fight at a disadvantage.

DISTURBANCES AT ST. PETERSBURG.

The riots at St. Petersburg revealed a new and most disquieting tendency amongst the lower classes of the capital. The numerous acts of personal violence and the serious resistance offered by the crowd to the representatives of authority are looked upon as foreshadowing trouble of a grave character at no distant date. Every private equipage was capsized by the drunken mob, the police authorities themselves were hooted and mobbed, the Imperial colors were torn down and trampled upon, and the small military force called out to restore order was contemptuously set at naught.

Editor Restitution:

Dear brother, enclosed please find $2.00 for THE RESTITUTION another year. I prize it much and do not like to do without it. It is a source of wisdom, knowledge and truth to me, and therefore I would not do without it. I was up to the Severance conference, and it has been so long since I have been to a conference that it seemed like an increase of a hundred fold in knowledge, strength, love and harmony. It was one of the best meetings I ever attended; we were all possessed of the right spirit. Hope and pray that such meetings may not be few. The spirit of forbearance was well exercised. It is a blessed thing to meet with such

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, June 27, 1883.

A short letter from Mrs. Davis will be found in another column. We have also a quite lengthy communication from P. H. Winterstein dated, Jerusalem, May 29, for the next RESTITUTION.

FROM a friend, a resident of Plymouth, who has been abroad for a year, and who has visited noted cities and localities in Europe, Africa, and Asia during this sojourn, we have received the present of a beautiful cane of Olive wood brought directly from Jerusalem. The word ירושלם, yerushalaim—Jerusalem, in Hebrew characters, is handsomely inscribed on the handle. The donor is not ambitious to be blazoned abroad for any act of kindness; hence we reluctantly withhold the name. To the kind giver we, however, suggest that the opening rose betrays the secret of its existence by the sweet incense it exhales to float on the balmy wings of the summer zephyrs as stilly breeze. We, though past our threescore years and ten, have never used a cane, and are happy to think that the only one we now ever expect to use will always be associated with the names Olivet, Jerusalem, and that of the friendly giver.

THE three numbers of the Hebrew Student for April, May, and June are before us. This serial is published in the interests of "Old Testament Literature and Interpretation," by the Hebrew Book Exchange, Morgan Park, Ill., at $1.00 for ten numbers. To all studying the Hebrew language this work is important, especially to those who are endeavoring to acquire a more perfect knowledge of this grand old language on the "Correspondence plan." in this way we are endeavoring to perfect our imperfect knowledge of this beautiful language of ancient Story, Psalm and Prophecy.

Two numbers of The International Standard have come to hand. In the first number is a fine portrait of the late President, James A. Garfield, and in the second, or May number, is one of the celebrated astronomer, Prof. John Greaves, of Oxford, taken A. D. 1650. This valuable magazine is published by the "International Institute for Preserving and Perfecting Weights and Measures." Price, $2.00 a year or $1.00 for six months. Address 319 Euclid Avenue, Cleveland, Ohio. We heartily commend this journal to all persons of literary taste. A beautiful chart of the Great Pyramid and its interior chambers has also been duly received.

INVASION OF THE HOLY LAND.

The latest proposition is to build a maritime canal through Palestine, and an English company, with the Duke of Marlborough at its head, has been formed for the purpose of making investigations and preliminary surveys. So far as at present proposed, the work will include, in the first instance, a canal twenty-five miles in length, from Haifa, in the Bay of Acre, through the plain of Esdraelon to the valley of the river Jordan. The depth of the proposed canal is to be forty feet, and its width 200 feet. This work will bring the Mediterranean into the heart of Palestine, and go far toward making a seaport of Jerusalem. It is further proposed to construct a canal 100 miles in length from the head of the Gulf of Akabaon to the Dead Sea, and thus unite the waters of the latter with the Red Sea. If these things were successfully performed it is expected that an inland sea about 300 miles long, varying in width from three to ten miles, and deep enough to float vessels of the largest size, would extend from the Mediterranean to the Red Sea. There are some matters besides engineering difficulties which may hinder the execution of this project. The consent of the Porte is indispensable, and certain European Powers would undoubtedly oppose the granting of a firman conferring upon England the exclusive right of way by water through Palestine. The Holy Land also has sacred associations for Christians throughout the world, and a wide-spread sentiment among all churches and sects would doubtless be raised in opposition to the innovation. Speaking of this particular project, the London Times says: "It is possible that the new enterprise may be proved to the satisfaction of many devout men and women to be the fulfillment of the prophecy of Ezekiel, to the effect that there is to be a broad sea in the desert, and that 'the fishers shall stand upon it from En-gedi even unto En-eglaim.'"—London Railway News.

In relation to the above I desire to call attention to an expectation now becoming quite common among students of prophecy; namely, that Jerusalem is destined to become a great seaport and the commercial center of the world.

Some years ago Major Scott Philips, if he did not originate, at least gave considerable impetus to the idea by his tractate on the Colonization of Palestine by the Seed of Abraham. In this work he took the position that the great earthquake valley which is foretold by the prophet Zechariah to take place at the second coming of Christ, will extend from the Dead Sea to the Mediterranean Sea, down which will rush the waters of the latter, filling up the great gorge of the lower Jordan and the Dead Sea; and, rushing with resistless impetuosity toward the south, sweep away the barriers of sand which the desert winds have, in the lapse of ages heaped up across the ancient valley of the Arabah, extending to the eastern arm of the Red Sea, called the Gulf of Akaba, thus forming a natural inlet or arm of the Great Sea through the heart of the Holy Land, and placing Jerusalem upon what would at once become the great water-route between the East and West, and of necessity a great commercial center of the East. I suspect that this rather fascinating picture of political, commercial and altogether earthly splendor, has its origin more in the desires and imaginations of its advocates than in anything the prophets have written. For not only will nothing I have ever read in their writings, by any fair and natural construction, bear out this idea, but at least some things they have written are in direct and even verbal contradiction to it; besides which the entire genius, as it were, of that period, is in open antagonism to the notion. Any careful analysis of the things the prophets have written concerning the future age, will show conclusively that its predominating character is the complete triumph of the religious idea. That religious idea may truthfully be styled "Reformed Judaism," or the true intent of the Judaism of Moses and the prophets as fulfilled in the Christ.

Jerusalem is to be the grand center of this triumph, from which will radiate the forces which will ultimately bring all races into religious subordination to the truth. Thus while Jerusalem will also be the great political center of mankind, yet its political will be entirely subordinate to its religious domination. Its rule will be theocratic; its claim to universal sovereignty will be in the name of Jehovah, and will be enforced by His power. The "law which goes forth from Zion" will be the "word of the Lord from Jerusalem." "His King" will be enthroned there, and in his name all nations are called upon to render obedience.

It is needless to quote specific passages to establish so plain a doctrine. All students of the prophets are familiar with it, and to quote all that they have spoken on the point is to transcribe a not inconsiderable portion of the Old and New Testaments. If, now, this be true that the political is to be subordinate to the religious character of the entire world in that age, and that the character of Jerusalem as the political capital of mankind is entirely merged into its prominence as the religious center of the race, how insignificant must we regard its commercial character! Amid the blazing glories of its priestly kingdom, which, by a strange paradox, is to rescue mankind at once from both priestcraft and kingcraft, not a thought is bestowed upon nor a word said concerning its buying and selling and getting gain in all that the prophets have written. With the other detestable spirits that hold sway over the earth in this, its dark and murky midnight, the cursed spirit of selfishness and the love of gain will be utterly banished from among mankind as in that "day of the Lord" they "fling their idols of gold and of silver to the moles and the bats."

Not that there will be no exchanges in that age; no traveling to and fro; no shipments of the produce of one clime to another. On the contrary these things will go on far more freely and generally than now; but only under the benign influence of the one universal government that has wielded all nations into a universal brotherhood, and directed in its generous purposes by the predominant religious character of the age. Where all are abundantly supplied with not only the necessaries of life but with the luxuries of every clime; greed and selfishness, tyranny, injustice and the love of gain, cannot exist.

Where some are starving and all may suffer want; men will scramble like wild beasts for food, but where they see before them a well-spread board whereon is enough for all, each waits upon his fellow and one vies with all that all may be supplied. Commerce then, as now carried on, will be wholly antagonistic to the spirit of that age, and Jerusalem as a commercial center will have no existence. But neither will Jerusalem be a center of trade or exchange under even a religious administration.

"The City of the Great King" will be sanctified to a far higher purpose. To lead mankind from the animal to the spiritual has been the grand purpose of every dispensation of the past; and it is the crowning glory of the next or the "dispensation of the fulness of times," called "the kingdom of God," that it will fully accomplish the work. The instrumentality for this purpose will be clustered in and around Jerusalem and men must be taught to think and speak of her as the express and perfect imbodiment of this purpose. Everything connected with her, and her rule, and her religion must lead men away from the gratification of the merely animal lusts to the development of the higher moral and from thence to the immortal or spiritual nature for which his Creator has designed him. To bring men to think of Jerusalem as "the throne of the Lord," as the "place of his sanctuary," as the "holy place of the tabernacles of the Most High;" to look to her for instruction in every dark place in life; to rejoice in her as the light of the Gentiles, the glory of the Lord the very gate of heaven; to expect every material and spiritual blessing at her hands, to fear her displeasure more than death, and to court her praise more than life; to look forward to the annual visit to her temple, her healing waters and the fruit of her wonderful trees with absorbing delight; in a word, to regard her as midway between God and man, the medium of his blessings and the disposer of his judgments is the great purpose of that age, itself subordinate to the work of uniting the race permanently and entirely to its Maker.

How utterly incongruous then and subversive of the entire purpose of God is the idea of Jerusalem as the commercial center of the world. The central thought concerning her then is that it is a good trading point, "it is a good market for our wares." And the solemn and glorious annual "feast of tabernacles" is at once debased to a "grand international exposition" and the trip to Jerusalem is for purposes of gain. But not to extend this too far, a very little thought will convince any one, it seems to me, that this is an error, as it is utterly out of harmony with the general spirit and purpose of that age, derogatory to the character of God and subversive of the highest spiritual interests of mankind. But it now remains for me to show that it is also in opposition to the clear and direct statements of the prophets themselves. And first I will notice the fact that all the prophets who have spoken on the subject represent the waters of which they speak in this connection as starting from Jerusalem. They are running waters; "rivers," "streams" and their "fountain" is in Jerusalem. The water is not an inlet or arm of the Great Sea beginning at the coast near Joppa and winding away to the east and thence south to the Gulf of Akaba, furnishing a grand and secure harbor for the shipping of all nations and a channel for trade between the East and West as these enthusiasts imagine, but a wholly different scene and for a widely different purpose is to be observed there.

Zechariah says that an earthquake indeed will separate the mount of Olives in twain when the feet of the returning and glorified Jesus, Lord or Master shall stand thereon, but he does not speak of its extending through to the Great Sea unless it can be shown that "Azal" is or was first a town, and then a town to the west of Jerusalem, and lastly a town on the coast of the Mediterranean: none of which things can with any degree of certainty be established. But he does speak of Jerusalem and the entire country between Geba to the north and Rimmon to the south of Jerusalem, being at that time "lifted up" or elevated and turned into a plain; presumably by the earthquake that severs the mount of Olives in twain from east to west, throws down "every wall to the ground, the "steep places" and "the mountains" upon the frightened hosts of retreating "Gog." Ezek. xxxviii and xxxix.

Now if such is the case, a strip of country from the Dead Sea to the Mediterranean and about 50 miles in width from north to south becomes a high and level plateau or plain, and Jerusalem is the highest place of all; which is wholly incompatable with the idea advanced by Maj. Scott Philips. But the prophet tells us expressly that "it shall be in that day that living waters shall go out from Jerusalem, half of them towards the former (the Dead) Sea, and half of them towards the hinder (the Great) Sea in summer and in winter it shall be." Zech. xiv. 8. Thus the "waters" issue from Jerusalem and flow in opposite directions down a steep incline into the eastern and western seas. Joel speaking of the same period says that "all the rivers of Judah shall flow with waters and a fountain shall come forth of the house of the Lord and shall water the valley of Shittim." Joel iii. 18.

This places the house of the Lord in Jerusalem and the two streams issuing from the same point. Accordingly Ezekiel, who is more full and exact than any other of the prophets, describes in the closing chapters of his book a magnificent temple unlike any of which history has given record and expressly states that the river (margin, two rivers) which he particularly measures issues out from under the fore front of the temple. But the water was not sufficient to float ships great or small, inasmuch as at the distance of about 1500 feet from the temple it was only up to the ankles, yet it was so rapid that when it reached a more level spot about 4500 feet distant it was too deep to be forded but was deep enough to bathe or swim in.

Now a child can see that this is wholly different from the picture drawn by Philips and his disciples. Isaiah, too, writing, of this same period says: (xxxiii. 20,) "Look upon Zion, the city of our Solemnities (not the market for our goods). Thine eyes shall see Jerusalem a quiet habitation (not a busy mart with screech of locomotive and hum of spindle), a tabernacle that shall not be taken down, not one of the stakes thereof shall ever be removed, neither shall any of the cords thereof be broken. But there the glorious Lord (will be) unto us (or will appoint unto us) a place of broad rivers and streams wherein shall go no galley with oars (no war ship) neither shall gallant ship pass thereby," etc.

Here is a point blank verbal contradiction of the very pith and marrow of the idea we are opposing—which is right? But once more. Ezekiel when speaking of the healing virtues of the "two rivers" (margin), states that in one direction (to the East) "these waters go down into the desert and go into the sea, which being brought forth into the sea the waters shall be healed." The healing of the waters of the Dead Sea is ascribed, not to their being overwhelmed by the purer waters of the Great Sea, but to the marvellous virtues of the waters that issue from the temple or sanctuary. But finally he expressly exempts the southern extremity of the sea, which is but a marsh or lagoon, from the healing virtues of the waters, for he distinctly says, "they shall not be healed but shall be given to salt." Now consider what would be the effect of opening a valley through Palestine from sea to sea and letting the waters of the Great Sea fill up the valley of the Jordan till they found a level. The surface of the Dead Sea was found by Lieutenant Lynch in 1848 to be in May 1,316 feet below the Mediterranean at Jaffa. But the river Jordan in its entire length and much of the country on either bank is also below that level; hence raising the waters of the Dead Sea to a level with the Mediterranean would turn not only the whole valley of the Jordan from its source including the Sea of Galilee, which is 663 feet below the Mediterranean Sea, but vast portions of the peninsula of Arabia, and nearly if not quite the entire wilderness south of Judea to the Red Sea into a vast inland sea many thousands of square miles in extent. Certainly very much more than Major Philips has bargained for and in utter contradiction of Ezekiel who leaves the surface of the Dead Sea so nearly unchanged that although the waters are healed the southern marsh not being overflowed remains devoted to the very useful necessity of salt. But the prophet speaks of the fish being in great abundance in the Dead Sea. "According to their kinds as the fish of the Great Sea exceeding many." xlvii. 10.

It is therefore asked how the fish in the Dead Sea are of the same varieties as the fish of the Mediterranean unless the waters of the one sea join the waters of the other, without supposing a direct (and it would seem unnecessary) act of creation? The probability is that the canal spoken of in the above extract and projected in England will be dug and form a grand channel between the east and the west, along whose banks cities and towns will spring up and though whose waters the fish find a channel of communication between the two seas. It is likely, too, that Jerusalem will have a port on the borders of the Dead Sea only 15 miles distant, as such a mart for business removed to one side and out of the reach of the sacred character and sublime associations of the "City of the Great King" would not be inconsistent with the spirit and purpose of that age. The engineering difficulties in the way of such a canal are insignificant and its advantages are so immense that we have every reason to expect that with the decline (perhaps not till the overthrow) of the Turkish power it will be pushed to completion.

GALESBURG, Kan.

Editor Restitution:

Again I want a little space in our worthy paper. I want to tell a little good news. I have just returned from Sumner Co., Kan, where I have been twice before. This trip I met Brother and Sister Chaplin, a nephew and niece of our esteemed Editor. We had a pleasant visit with them. Gave three lectures while there, staying over the fourth Sunday in May. On Monday morning, in company with them, we went to the water, where we buried by baptism two souls in the Christ of the Bible, and raised them up to walk in newness of life—one from the Baptist Church—John W. Huffman, and his wife.

I have been acquainted with Brother Huffman many years. His father and mother, and myself and wife used to attend Methodist meeting together in former days. After we got our eyes and understanding open, we took a step far in advance of the old theory.

We returned home the next day, and found all well.

On the first Sunday of June, I went 10 miles, preached twice to a good number, returned home and preached the same evening at my own school house to a large audience. Text 1 John iii. 8. I referred to Heb. ii. 14, that through death Christ might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil. Then I referred them to St. John viii. 44, showing that Satan was a murderer, or, as the Diaglott has it, a man-slayer. I showed that Satan was a liar and the father of lies. Then we turned to Gen. iii. 4, where he said to the woman "Ye shall not surely die." I showed that the serpent contradicted God's word just by adding one little word—not. I then showed that Christ will destroy the evil or the devil, and when the last enemy would be destroyed there would be no more death, and instead of death being the gate to Paradise, death would be the gate to the grave. That Christ had been in the tomb for three days and nights. But that Christ had abolished death and brought life and immortality to light through the gospel. 2 Tim. i. 7, 10; Rev. i. 18. That Christ holds the keys of death and hell, can't be denied. I showed when the last enemy should be destroyed. So long as one of Adam's children remains in death, on account of Adam's sin, just so long Christ has not done the work he came to do as the seed of the woman.

After closing I got three subscribers for THE RESTITUTION. Brethren let us do all we can for THE RESTITUTION. Let us get it out of debt if we can. Make a little effort and the victory is ours.

Now my dear brethren and sisters, I will close by saying, Make as much effort for the cause of Christ as you do for Cesar's government. If you take one political paper be sure and take THE RESTITUTION also, and if you cannot take but one paper, then take THE RESTITUTION. If your taxes are $20 a year, then pay $20 into the Lord's treasury to spread the good news of a coming kingdom. If you find that you cannot go to the mines and take the paper too let the mines go. It is only the overcomers that shall inherit all things. Well I have been baptized years ago. I go to church once a month. Brother A —— preaches for us, and has for two years. Well what do you pay him? Oh, the gospel is to be preached without money and without price. I myself have been preaching just that way in several places, and that too where men could do better. Brethren let us all try to preach. This is not one man's work; we must all do something. We are all working for a prize or a crown. Behold I come quickly; hold that fast which thou hast, that no man take thy crown.

Brethren in Kansas, let me hear from all, as we are talking about a general meeting somewhere in this state. Let us counsel one another, see where we will have it, if we all live. Such a meeting as this we need, and if we should live to one more such meeting I believe the next station due will be the kingdom of Christ. It is due now, but we will have to wait till Christ comes. May God add his blessing to these remarks is my prayer for Christ's sake.

Yours in hope of eternal life when Jesus comes.

JOHN FRAME.

JERUSALEM, May 29, '83.

Dear Brothers:

In my last letter I wrote all about our affairs here, which I hope has reached you safely. Mr. Winterstein has sent two letters for THE RESTITUTION. His heart is in the cause and I trust that God will bless our efforts. He must depend solely upon me for the support of his family at present, and I am only too happy to be of service to him. It appears that this is my mission, to help the poor Jews when they come to us destitute of means, I see that God has so ordered the matter and it must be wise, somehow. However, I freely confess that I have never before been in a condition to do this work. "It is God that works in us to will and do."

I send by this post cards of flowers for Mr. Underwood also those which you ordered for your friends. Shall send some to Colorado this week. Please excuse the delay as I have had so much to do; my family has increased and I must work harder. Jerusalem is greatly excited over the many rumors, which doubtless have reached you. The attitude of the nations is a premonition of coming events. It is very cool, especially at night it is very cold. Business is very good and there is a hopeful feeling among all classes.

I love Jerusalem and can not realize that I have ever lived anywhere else; and this feeling is strange to me. All my former life has actually faded from my memory. I have talked with many Jews who say their experience is the same. We learn that Mr. Frueslander, who is in London for the purpose of raising money for the refugee Jews, has been very successful, many persons having contributed one hundred pounds each. He intends purchasing a large tract of land for colonization not far from Jerusalem, and this scheme is looked upon with much interest and I have no doubt of its ultimate success.

The world is moving forward most surely, and Jerusalem being the pivot we feel every vibration and watch anxiously every revolution which will surely bring us to that glorious age for which we so earnestly pray.

Sincerely yours,

A. E. DAVIS.

To the Brethren Scattered Abroad.

"Come over and help us."

CHICAGO, Ill.

Whereas this mighty, wicked city which putteth to shame Sodom and Gomorrah is lying in the darkness of the evil one, and the light of God's truth is so dimly shining, therefore it is deemed expedient to make an effort to scatter a few rays of gospel light "that a people for his name may be taken out" In order that the Bride may make herself ready I would herein appeal to the brethren for aid to establish and support a "Blessed Hope Mission" preaching and distribution of tracts and papers. I am here in the city and earnestly desire to work for Jesus. I find a very few who are willing to connect themselves with mission work; that few like myself, are poor, but willing to work in every opportunity and place. Now dear ones can you help in this mission work, will you invest in the Lord's five-twenties, have you one, two, five, ten or more dollars or less, that you can freely, cheerfully and prayerfully give to the work? When the day of making up the special treasure shall come, will not the Master say, "Come ye blessed of my Father?" Remember that bread scattered upon the water will return to you again.

Our plan is to procure a place for preaching and to engage all the talent we can command for teaching. Bible reading, distribution of tracts, cards, papers, etc., teaching the things concerning the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus the Christ, thus making ready a people for the Lord. Reports of progress will from time to time be published; also reports of finance, showing how the money has been expended. Let any, therefore, who feel disposed to aid, correspond with C. C. Ramsey, 259 Randolph St., Chicago, Ill., or C. H. Jones, 230 LaSalle St. Let us hear from you at once.

Yours in hope,

C. C. RAMSEY.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

There will be a debate held 7 miles southeast of Delcon, Texas, beginning on the 2nd day of July, between W. H. Wright of the Disciples and J. P. Todd of the Brethren of Christ. Propositions to be debated,

1. Does the consciousness of man wholly cease between death and the resurrection? J. P. Todd affirms, W. H. Wright denies.

2. Does the kingdom of God or the kingdom of Christ exist on the earth at this time? W. H. Wright affirms, J. P. Todd denies.

R. T. STEVENS.

POSTPONEMENT.

The Arkansas State Christian Conference will hold its next annual session with the Palarm church, 6 miles east of Conway Station, on the Little Rock and Ft. Smith Railway, to convene on Thursday night before the third Sunday in September, instead of August, as formerly announced. By order of the Executive Board,

N. B. ETHERIDGE, Sec.

To the Friends of "The Restitution."

The cost of publishing THE RESTITUTION for the year just closed exceeded the receipts over $300. To repay this deficiency and secure means to publish the paper another year, we must raise, outside the regular subscription, at least $600. To secure that amount, the Board of Directors have requested me to appeal to each subscriber to contribute at least one dollar extra. This is not asked as a donation, but brethren are requested to send names of persons to whom they wish the paper sent, with their contributions and the paper will be sent to such persons in payment for the amounts sent by each.

There are a large number of brethren and sisters in different localities who are unable to pay for the paper, and who would be very glad of the privilege of reading it. These are known to Brother Chaplin, the Editor. I would suggest that brethren who have no one to whom they specially desire to send the paper, send their contributions to THE RESTITUTION office with a request that the paper be sent to some worthy Christian who will appreciate it, but who is unable to pay for it. In this way brethren will be able to gladden the hearts of many poor but honest good Christians, and at the same time help to furnish the means to keep the paper going.

The fund will be known as "Free Will Offerings." Let each reader of THE RESTITUTION make a small sacrifice, and contribute at least one dollar, always remembering that the many persons to whom the paper will be thus sent will thank and bless you, and your Heavenly Father will reward you.

R. S. DWIGGINS, President.

The Lilies of the Field.

The Savior's flowers! How pure and fair
These simple "Lilies of the Field";
How sweet an incense to the air,
Their fragrant snow-white blossoms yield!

Not Solomon in glory bright,
In sumptuous and in gold array,
Was ever half so wondrous sight
As in their modest beauty they!

They weave not the white robes they wear:
They toil not, neither do they spin;
No burden-bea. frail nor weary bear,
For—neither sins—they know not sin.

O emblems fair, O emblems sweet,
Of Christian humbleness of heart!
May we, as pure, at Jesus' feet
Sit low, and "learn of Him" the best part."

Cultivate Family Life.

The bitterest tears shed over graves are for words left unsaid and deeds left undone. "She never knew how I loved her." "He never knew what he was to me." "I always meant to make more of our friendship." "I did not know what he was to me till he was gone." Such words are the poisoned arrows which cruel death shoots backward at us from the door of the sepulchre. How much more we might make of our family life, of our friendships, if every secret thought of love blossomed into a deed! We are not now speaking merely of personal caresses. These may or may not be the best language of affection. Many are endowed with a delicacy, a fastidiousness of physical organization, which shrinks away from too much of these, repelled and overpowered. But there are words and looks and little observances, thoughtfulness, watchful little attentions, which speak of love, which make it manifest, and there is scarce a family that might not be richer in heart-wealth for more of them.—Mrs. Stowe.

The Useless Hand-Wasking.

"Oh, I say, Aunt Sallie, do please tell us a story," said Jamie Horton as he rushed, in boisterous boy fashion, into his aunt's room.

A fair-haired, bright-eyed woman looked up smilingly and said, "Why do you want a story? I thought Robert and you were to spend this rainy afternoon in the play-room, teaching your sister Beth how to use her parlor skates."

"So we did and we all went right up there after lunch, and oh, Aunt Sallie, it was real fun, you just ought to have seen how Beth toddled along," and Jamie burst into laughter at the remembrance of his sister's ungraceful efforts.

"I hope you did not laugh at her and hurt her feelings."

"Of course I did't make fun of her.

Aunt Sallie's stories were always interesting to the children. She was a woman of an honest, wholesome, kindly nature, which was strengthened by a strong religious faith, and so was always ready to do all the good that she could in the world. She kept the warmest corner of her heart for those helpless little mortals, for whom there seems to be not much room in many homes. Often had she made upon children's minds the clearest distinction between good and evil, between the wisdom of a right choice and the folly and unhappiness of a wrong one, simply by an apt story.

"What shall I tell you? Oh, I know," said Aunt Sallie, glancing at Jamie's dirty fingers, "I'll tell you of a man who carefully washed his hands but could never make them clean."

"Who on earth could that be," exclaimed Jamie, all the more astonished as he saw a serious look steal over his aunt's face, "I don't believe I ever heard of him!"

"You will know about that better when you have listened to the story," replied his aunt.

"They must have been very dirty," said Robert.

Soon the children were in their accustomed seats in their aunt's room.

"We must take a long journey first, for this man did not live in America."

"Oh, will we go to Europe?" said Beth, with delight, for Europe had been a fairy land to her ever since she had received a beautiful Paris doll.

"Yes, to Europe, but far away from Paris, and this time we would have found no dolls there; for down in that queer boot-shaped piece of land was Rome, the great city of the world then, and what we call France now, was then only a wild country, which had been conquered by Rome's greatest soldier—"

"Julius Cæsar," said Jamie, "I know all about him."

"Yes, but he had been killed years before this and another Cæsar was ruling the world. He had sent a Roman governor to this small land where we shall stop, still farther to the east. In the largest city of this country one day the governor sat in his judgment-hall and before him stood a prisoner bound. He was a poor man, and all his relations and companions were poor people, but he seemed to have great influence upon his followers, and the people said, 'Never man spake like this man.' He walked about through the streets and fields always doing good. Once a man who had been born blind, met him and begged that he would restore his sight, for he had heard of the wonderful things which he had done. This good man listened, put clay on the poor shut eyes and said, 'Go wash in the pool of Siloam." The man obeyed and came back seeing. Some said that he could heal the sick and could even raise the dead to life, and while many believed on him, there were others who were rich and proud and jealous and wicked, who did not like to hear of these wonderful things.

"Beside all this he had preached in their synagogue, and had explained their holy books as their priests could never have done, and had said that he was the Savior who had been promised thousands of years before. All this was making excitement in the land, so these people who hated him tried to find some way to kill him. They asked the blind man, 'What did he to thee? How opened he thine eyes?' The poor man only answered, 'I know not. One thing I know, that whereas I was blind, now I see. If this man were not of God, he could do nothing.'

"Of course these wicked men could find no answer; for that, nobody can. The simple truth can never be conquered. So they tried in many ways to take him, and at last found that a thief had joined with the company who followed this good man, and for a few pieces of silver he told them where he was. Even then they had to get the Roman governor's permission to kill him, and they brought him to the judgment-hall.

"The governor asked, 'What accusation do you bring against this man?'

"They said, 'If he were not a bad man we would not have brought him to you.'

"Then the governor said, Take him yourselves and judge him."

"But they had no power to kill him, and they were determined that he should die, so they shouted to 'Crucify him, crucify him,' like a wicked, cruel mob. The governor 'knew that for envy they had delivered him,' and he saw 'no harm in him.' His wife, too, sent to him in his judgment-hall, and said: 'Have thou nothing to do with this just man, for I have suffered many things in a dream this night because of him.' Yet it was all of no use. The people were strong in their hate, and they cried, 'If thou let this man go thou art not Cæsar's friend.' This man had said plainly, 'My kingdom is not of this world; for this cause came I into this world, that I should bear witness of the truth.' But what if a false story should go to Rome, and Cæsar should take away his power, perhaps punish him? Ah, then the Roman governor was a coward, and he dared not protect the innocent, godlike man, but he pitifully took water and washed his hands before the multitude, saying, 'I am innocent of the blood of this just person.'

"Now, can you see how his hands might be forever washed, yet never clean?" said Aunt Sallie to her group of listeners.

The children quietly bowed their heads, silenced by the sad old story.

"And was he innocent?"

"No, no, no," were the earnest answers; "he knew better."

"Yes, he knew better. And what was the name of this wicked, cowardly man?"

"Pontius Pilate," said Jamie, soberly. "Of course I knew about him, only somehow I never thought of his washing his hands before."

"In all these eighteen hundred years since it happened, many people have thought about it, Jamie. In Switzerland, from the shore of the beautiful lake of Lucerne, there rises a mountain so grim and stony it has been called Pilatus. There is a story, too, that in the stormiest nights, when the thunder rolls and sharp lightning flashes around its summit, from the lake near by there rises a pale, human form that seems to be washing and rubbing its hands in agony."

"Oh, Aunt Sallie, do you s'pose really it does?" whispered Beth fearfully.

"No, my dear, that cannot be, but let us all remember that we also do wrong when we know better, and the stains of our sins can no more easily be washed away than were Pilate's. It is only through repentance and faith in that same prisoner, the Lord Jesus Christ, and by the renewing of his Holy Spirit, that we can be made clean.—Bittersweet.

A Few Reasons Why I Cannot Give Up Looking For a Literal New Heavens and New Earth Wherein Dwelleth Righteousness.

1. The grammatical construction of the whole passage requires a literal interpretation. The last day's scoffers would scoff at the 2d coming of Christ, (not the first), saying, Where is the promise of his coming?—Meaning the promise was a failure, and would be, because all things continue as they were from creation. Although the Lord was long suffering, not willing any should perish, yet the day of the Lord's coming would be as a thief in the night to the wicked. In that day of 1000 years, whether at the beginning or close we are not here told, the heavens shall pass away with a rushing sound, the elements melt with intense heat, the earth and its works be burned. The original word (katakwis) here rendered "burned up" is rendered "burned" 7 times in the N. T., and three other passages "burned up." Hence, we are authorized to render it "burned" here. We are not informed that the whole surface of the earth will be burned, or that all its works will be consumed,—much less that the heavens and earth will be annihilated, or even melted and molded over, so that a residue of the tribes of Israel and the nations may be spared, though the conflagration be at the beginning of the millennial period. But if the fiery ordeal and great change be at the close of that period, the entire surface need not be burned. Perhaps all the land promised to Abram, including Jerusalem and 3000 square miles of territory may escape. We are not obliged to say, in the absence of testimony, how much of the earth's surface will be burned, or just how God will fulfil all the prophetic word. I fully believe that he will greatly bless an obedient remnant of the tribes of Israel, together with a "fulness of the Gentiles," "and all the ends of the earth will remember and turn unto the Lord," because he shall then be "Governor among the nations," and "King over all the earth in that day." I believe he will come for the "restoration of all things" spoken of by the prophets, and yet I believe just as firmly that the heavens and earth, which are now, are reserved unto fire against the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men. Nevertheless I look for new heavens and earth wherein the righteous shall live forever.

Whatever figurative use may be made of heavens and earth in some portions of the ancient prophets, that are highly poetic, I think, in this very prosaic letter of Peter, the words should be understood literally, especially on account of the connection. It seems to me that the argument that is called reductio ad absurdum, may be applied in this case. Suppose the new heavens and earth where Peter says the righteous will dwell, are not real sky and earth, but are figurative or spiritual, then of course the heavens and earth which are reserved unto fire are figurative and kept unto a spiritual fire against a figurative perdition of ungodly men. (The Universalist idea). But, if the present heavens and earth are figurative, the Antediluvian world was figurative and overflowed with figurative water, — a flood of wickedness, (Swedenborg says). Go back still further and "the heavens that by the word of God were of old, and the earth standing out of the water and in the water" — i. e. the heavens and earth which "God created in the beginning" were not literal but spiritual) heavens and earth, which is the climax of absurdity. On this theory the idea that we have cherished so long, that we and our ancestors have lived on a real terra firma earth with a literal heavens above us is a gross delusion. Here then are three heavens and earths—the first God formed in the beginning by his almighty word, and pronounced it very good. On account of the sin of the first pair, the ground was cursed, and afterwards on account of the great wickedness that prevailed, the earth and its people were wrecked and perished by a literal flood. The second earth in the series is now reserved unto fire as the first was reserved unto water. This will be the time of the perdition of ungodly men. The last terrible plagues will come upon them, while those represented by the beast and false prophet will be "cast alive into a lake of fire burning with brimstone." At the end of the 1000 years reign, "Satan will be loosed out of his prison" and gather a deceived host of wicked men around "the camp of the saints and the beloved city," when fire from heaven devours them, and the devil who deceived them is cast into the same lake of fire.

The third in the series will be the new heavens and earth where God's will shall be as perfectly obeyed as now by the angels in heaven. Thus we may literalize the three heavens and earths and the coming of the Lord spoken of in the connection, and make good sense. But we can't spiritualize them without denying a literal flood, and the creation of the real heavens and earth at first, and the personal coming. If at the destruction of Jerusalem, A. D. 70, the Mosaic constitution of things passed away, and the Jewish heavens, being fire, were dissolved, and the elements melted with fervent heat, and this was the day of the Lord, and the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men, then, it must follow, that there is no future day of judgment and perdition of the wicked, for there is no penalty threatened them in the Bible except at the coming of the Lord, that was fulfilled at the fall of Jerusalem in the year 70 of the Christian era. This is notably the exegesis of the Universalists.

Another necessary inference from the above statement is, that, if the heavens and earth of Peter's day represent the Jewish economy, that passed away at the destruction of their city by the Romans, the new earth must have then begun taking the place of the old, and we have been living in the new earth for more than 1800 years! But where is the "righteousness." We have no objection to the "Mosaic order of things," having passed away, and that the present Christian order of things will soon be succeeded by the millennial reign of Christ and the saints, but we want a "habitable earth to come," where the "kingdom under the whole heaven" shall be given to them. Jesus says, the "meek shall inherit the earth," and the prophet David says that this inheritance shall be forever. Peter had a lively hope that the inheritance would be "incorruptible, undefiled and unfading." This implies that our sin-cursed earth shall experience a great change,—then it "will abide forever." The promised new earth is not figurative, but its passing away is. The change from old to new will be as great as if the old passed away. Since we can find no promise in the Bible of going to heaven at death or any other time, we must continue to hope for a literal "new earth." I propose to show in another article that Paul and John fully corroborate Peter's testimony on this subject.

Report of Annual and Quarterly Assembly for 1882.

As the report of our annual assembly was not printed in The Restitution, we would just say, as it is in place before giving the last quarterly report—To the household of faith, it was like the manna in the wilderness, and the water that gushed from the rock in Horeb to the children of Israel. A few faithful witnesses for the whole truth were permitted to assemble together, as it were, in the great wilderness of the people, and by attending to the things wanting in the house of God, feast together upon the heavenly manna, or bread which cometh down from heaven, which if a man eat thereof he may never die, and drink of the water of life flowing from the Rock Christ, which as it is written, if any man drink thereof it will be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life.

And dear brethren, wherever you may be, it was also a like feast for the few names, as it was in Sardis, who we trust have not defiled their garments, to assemble together in Bro. Spaid's grove, on the fourth Sunday of this month, according to announcement, and participate together in the rich memorials of a Savior's love, and thus show forth the death of our once crucified but now risen and exalted Redeemer, which he has taught us by transmission to do, until he comes again, not a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief, but to have given unto him by the Great Architect of the Universe, dominion and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages, shall serve him, when the saints of the Most High shall jointly take the kingdom, and possess the kingdom forever, even forever and ever. As our quarterly meetings are preparatory to the annual assemblies, the meeting closed with the understanding that our next annual assembly be held as usual at the House of the Brethren, in Winchester, Va., of which timely notice will be given in The Restitution, and that that meeting take the place of the proposed meeting of committees preparatory to a more general organization of the Old Faith in the East, as proposed some time past by the Church of God in Philadelphia, and thus co-operate with the brethren in the West, who seem to be in a more working order than we are, for which we bid them God speed, and all the more as we believe the time to work for the Master is short, and when he will say to his faithful ones Come ye blessed of my Father, as you have been faithful over a few things I will make you ruler over many things. Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord

Our Visit to Antioch.

At the close of our Michigan conference, at the earnest solicitation of Brother Chaplin, I promised to attend the Indiana conference with him, beginning the following Friday. According to promise on Thursday I started for Plymouth, where I received a hearty welcome from Brother and Sister Chaplin. On Friday we rode over to Antioch, not Antioch of sacred story, but of Indiana, where I had often wished to go. And here I was meeting faces strange to me, but familiar to the eyes of the Father, hearts full of love for the blessed hope. Never have I had the pleasure of meeting a more cordial, genial people then I met here. The brethren have a house of worship 40 by 60 feet, well finished and furnished, and when first entering its doors I was at a loss to know where the people would come from to fill so large a house. But Sunday morning solved the problem; from all directions they come, like sheep gathering into the fold, and, happy thought, the majority of listeners were of that "little flock." It was not necessary to be told that many lovers of God listened on that Sunday morning, for on every lineament of face an intense earnestness of manner did his great love shine forth from hearts that are looking for their king. From the opening to the close of this meeting nothing but rich feasts of brotherly love, kindly wishes of future good, and deep manifestations of Christ's holy spirit breathed out and pervaded his sacred sanctuary. More forcible language to express God's love, the unity and simplicity of the gospel, the necessary love of prayer and faith, the perfect unison of spirit in the grand truths of his word, we never heard; it filled our souls with gratitude, and lifting our hearts to him who knoweth the inmost secret of every heart, we prayed that this spirit might permeate the church in this and our own loved state, where we have tried so hard to bring light and truth before house hearts ready to receive his Word. God grant that this, our first meeting with the brethren at Antioch, may not be our last. May God's blessings rest down upon you all, is the prayer of your brother in Christ,

What the Jewish Papers are Saying.

The Jews of Siberia.

The Wiener Israelit of Vienna quotes from a work recently published by Herr Wilhelm Jost, of Cologne, the following remarks on the Jews of Siberia: "For traders it is a very easy thing to get on in Siberia, because most of the landowners are Jews, every one of whom speaks German. It is remarkably strange that here, in the very heart of Asia, German and Polish Jews are the representatives of German customs and manners, whilst in Germany itself there are so many people who deny the fact of the Jews being Germans. I would advise any rabid anti-Semite to undertake a journey through Siberia. If his mind be not entirely blessed and his judgment warped by religious and natural hatred, he will find himself most agreeable impressed by hearing here in the far distant north the accents of mother-tongue, in which almost every Jew is able to converse.

"No doubt the vernacular spoken by these Jews is not the German of Goethe and Schiller, but it is Judäschdeutsch, a very corrupt mixture of German, Russian, Polish, and a few lumps of Hebrew. Still, whenever I spoke High Dutch slowly, I was understood perfectly well; and as I went on residing in the country, I also learned to speak the vernacular. While in European Russia the Government shut their eyes when the Jews are robbed, massacred, and assassinated; it protects them to the best of its ability in Siberia. In this northern land they enjoy all civil rights; they are only disqualified from dealing in brandy—a very sensible restriction—and from becoming officers in the army—a very absurd one.

The consequence of this difference in the treatment of the Jews on both sides of the Ural Mountains is, that many Hebrews emigrate from Poland and Russia into Siberia. In the course of the last rising in Poland, many Jews were transported to this country, and afterwards, when an amnesty was proclaimed, they preferred to stay in Siberia rather than return to their native places. Most of them are honest and industrious merchants, shop-keepers, and artisans, who are general favorites, owing to their intellect and their constant temperance; and the German merchants frankly state that they very much prefer dealing with the Jews to doing business with the Russians."

It is also stated that there are two distinct classes of Jews living in Siberia—viz., those who trace their origin to Poland or Russia where they and their parents were born, and who settled in Asiatic Russia in the course of the last two generations; and these who originally immigrated from Central Asia and who, on their own showing, have been settled there "from time immemorial." They differ in every possible way from the European immigrants; and there is a general notion that they must be descendants of the Ten Tribes, commingled, however, to some extent with the descendants of those Jews who had to leave Palestine subsequent to the memorable destruction of the second temple.

German and Portuguese Jews.

The new temple of the Portuguese Jews of Paris, situated in the Rue Buffault, has lately been opened. In connection with the inauguration, a French Jewish paper gives the following particulars respecting the differences that exist between the various sections into which the body of Jews is divided:—

"The dogmas of the Portuguese rite are the same as those of the German rite, but there is a difference in the pronunciation of the Hebrew language as well as in the use of some prayers. This difference arises from the fact that the exiled Jews were driven in two different directions after the fall of Jerusalem. During the protracted persecutions of the Middle Ages, those of the North lost sight entirely of those of the South, and the former contracted habits, traditions, and even a pronunciation of the sacred tongue which are entirely distinct from those of the latter. The German and Portuguese rites denote, therefore, two distinct developments of one and the same race.

"In France there exists a third Jewish rite, known by the name of Comtadin, which is still followed by the old Jewish families of the Comtat Venaissin, which has Avignon for its capital. This district belonged to the Popes until the end of the last century, and several of the "anti-Popes,"—that is to say, Pontiffs elected in opposition to the Pope established in Rome—took up their residence there. The Jews of Avignon, being pent up together in the ghetto, and kept by law apart from the outside world, adopted a kind of language as well as a ritual distinct in many respects from those of the other Jews."

As regards the differences in the pronunciation of the Hebrew tongue which prevail between the German and the Portuguese Jews, they are fully as great as those which exist between English and broad Scotch, if not greater. As a rule, the German Jews say os and the former say ow where the latter say on. Again, the German equivalent of the consonant B is often V, and when the Portuguese say B, the German Jews often say F. The name of the patriarch Jacob is pronounced by the Portuguese Jews "Yaakob," by the Germans "Yakoof."

As to which of the two pronunciations is the correct one, there can be scarcely any doubt. Almost all the Hebrew names are reproduced in the Greek of the New Testament as nearly as possible according to the pronunciation now known as Portuguese; and among Gentiles the Hebrew tongue has been taught from time immemorial in accordance with the same pronunciation. In the Greek of the Septuagint, of Josephus, and of Philo also, the Hebrew words are always rendered in a shape corresponding to the Portuguese, not to the German pronunciation. This fact alone is a proof positive, at least, of Hebrew having been pronounced in the age of Christ in the way in which the Portuguese, and not in the way in which the German Jews pronounce it now.

The Jewish Emigrants in Syria.

The Hebrew paper Hammagid publishes a letter, signed Josef Masel, and giving an account of the doings of a party of Jews who had been sent from England to Syria under the auspices of the Syrian Colonisation Society. The letter was written from Latakia, in Northern Syria, and has only just been published. The journey from London via Paris, Marseilles, Naples, Alexandria, Jaffa, Beyrout, and Tripoli to Latakia lasted three weeks. The emigrants, on arriving in the port of Latakia, were received with great affability by the local agent of the society, and by the British consul; and suitable accommodation was provided, all the necessary provisions being supplied to them. The writer goes on to say:—

"The Pasha sent for some of us, and inquired through an interpreter, whether we wished to become subjects of the Sultan? In that event he would protect us: if not, he wanted us to show him our papers, so that he might know what consulate we belonged to. We showed him the by-laws of the colony which we had received in London. He at once declared himself satisfied, and dismissed us most affably.

"The air in this place is pure and healthy, the climate is not too warm, and the soil is very fertile. Pomegranates and figs are plentiful in all the gardens; lemons and oranges are abundant, and there are also some very good ethrogims. Wine is grown at a little distance from the town, and sold very cheap. There are vegetables in abundance; and fowls, eggs, and milk are to be had at a very low price. We have computed that wheat would stand here in about one silver rouble per pood. In this part wheat is good and heavy. However, I am told that everything is plentiful and cheap this year. The fruits of the country are carried by asses and camels to the port, and shipped twice a week for Marseilles. There are a good many currants, too.

"As yet we cannot make ourselves understood by the natives otherwise than by signs, because we speak neither Arabic nor Turkish. But we are gradually getting into the way of learning the most usual phrases, and this is not very difficult, because Arabic is very similar to Hebrew and Chaldee. Our people are getting into the way of sitting and sleeping on the ground, and also of eating according to the manner of the East."

The writer goes on to say that there is a difficulty in the purchase of ground; that one Greek more particularly, on being asked to sell a very suitable plot of land, would double the amount of money for it that the land was really worth. Still he expresses a hope that this difficulty will soon be overcome, and on the whole, he declares himself not only well satisfied with the way in which the emigrants had been treated until then, but also sanguine of the future in store for them. At all events, the Syrian colonisation scheme seems to have thus far given much better results than the shipment of hundreds of destitute Russian Jews to the United States. — Prophetic News and Israel's Watchman.

IT IS WELL.

"Is it well with thee, and with thy husband, and the child? And she said, It is well."—2 Kings iv. 26.

Yes; it is well! The evening shadows lengthen;
Home's golden gates shine on our ravished sight;
And though the leader lies we strove to strengthen,
Break one by one—at evening time 'tis light.

'Tis well! The way was often dull and weary;
The spirit fainted oft beneath its load;
No sunshine came from skies all gray and dreary,
And yet our feet were bound to tread that road.

'Tis well that not again our hearts shall shiver
Beneath old sorrows, once so hard to bear;
That not again beside death's darksome river
Shall we deplore the good, the loved, the fair.

No more with tears, wrought from deep inner anguish,
Shall we bewail the dear hopes crushed and gone;
No more need we in doubt or fear to languish:
So far the day is past, the journey done!

As voyagers, by fierce winds beat and broken,
Come into port beneath a calmer sky,
So we, still bearing on our bosom the token
Of tempest past, draw to our haven nigh.

. . . west air cometh from the shore immortal,
Inviting homeward at the day's decline;
Almost . . . are where from the open portal
Fair forms stand beckoning with their smiles divine.

'Tis well! The earth with all her myriad voices
Has lost the power our senses to enthrall;
We hear, above the tumult and the noises,
Soft tones of music, like an angel's call.

'Tis well, O friends! We would not turn—retracing
The long, vain years, nor call our best youth back;
Gladly, with spirits buoyed, the future facing,
We leave behind the dusty, foul worn track.

THE PERSONAL AND VISIBLE COMING.

Great was the solemnity of the parting scene on the mount of Olives, where the risen Savior stood with his apostles around him. A thrillingly happy association of three years and a half, was to end in that sad hour. Doubtless each of the heroic and faithful ones around him could look upon the dear Redeemer and say,

"All that my mind or heart can crave,
In thee doth richly meet."

Oh the inexpressible majesty and sweetness of his presence and discourse! Their influence was illustrated in the devotion of Thomas, who, when the Master was about to go where his life would be endanged by the fury of enemies, said, (with an affection which, without its object, has no heart for life), "Let us also go, that we may die with him." John xi. 16. Rough "officers" sent to take him by force, having paused a moment to catch a few sentences of his discourse, durst not lay hands on him, but returned to those who sent them, and said, "Never man spake like this man." Jno. vii. 46. And even when the hour was come for him to "be delivered to the Gentiles," and the fierce armed men were brought face to face with the heavenly Lamb, they were overpowered with the veiled effulgence of his majesty, and "went backward and fell to the ground." Jno. xviii. 6.

But, when for the last time gathered around this glorious Redeemer on mount Olivet, the sorrowing apostles found that the sweet converse and personal association of years was about to be broken in upon by a long parenthesis of absence, during which the bereaved church would have to weep, and wait, and watch, and pray. Weary centuries had to roll by, and marble tombs of waiting saints crumble to decay, before meeting him again. A long dark night of apostacy was to set in, until, at last, bold scoffers were to arise in the darkness and deride the waiting church, saying, "Where is the promise of his coming?"

After a few but weighty words to the apostles concerning their holy mission, and as if to strengthen them for the separation, "He lifted up his hands and blessed them." Luke xxiv. 50. Without this benediction, dripping from his hands like heavenly balm upon their agitated hearts, how could they have borne the parting! And does not this remind us of similar sustaining grace in that other kind of parting which some of us have experienced at the newly-made grave, when, through the inspired page, we seemed to "hear a voice from heaven" as of "this same Jesus," assuring us that the form borne not up to the courts of light but down into the dust of death, "shall rise again;" and that the beloved one taken from us "is not dead but sleepeth?" Jno. xi. 23. Matt. ix. 24.

With grief and awe the apostles were intently gazing upward after the Savior, but were startled from that posture by two heavenly beings at their side, clothed in white apparel, and saying, "Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? this same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven." Acts. i. 11. Remember, they did not console them by any such modern phrase as "Ye shall soon follow him as disembodied souls into heaven." The Master himself had plainly informed them on that point while yet with them, saying, "The Son of man shall COME in the glory of his Father with his angels; and THEN shall he reward every man according to his works." Matt. xvi. 27. On another occasion also he had said, "Thou shalt be recompensed at the RESURRECTION of the just." Luke xiv. 11.

I have heard that in the catacombs of Rome some of the early Christians were buried in a standing posture as if "gazing up into heaven," "looking for the blessed hope and appearing of the glory of our great God and Savior Jesus Christ." Titus ii. 13. R. V. Confessing by their attitude that they "died in faith, not having received the promises" of God, but "waiting for his Son from heaven" to revive their withered frames, and speak them into life and joy eternal. Heb. xi. 13. 1 Thes. i. 10.

It is remarkable that the same number of white-robed messengers who stood at the sepulchre and testified, "He is not here but is risen," stood on Olivet and testified to his second coming. Thus we see that both his resurrection and his future coming are angelic themes. As the one event was personal and visible so will the other be.

His coming was preached from Enoch to John. Job yearned for it. Job xix. 25–27. and margin. Isaiah says, "Oh that thou wouldst rend the heavens and come down, that the mountains might flow down at thy presence, as when the melting fire burneth." "And it shall be said in that day, lo! this is our God, we have waited for him, and he will save us: this is the Lord; we have waited for him, we will be glad and rejoice in his salvation." Isa. lxiv. 1, 2; xxv. 9.

Death is not his coming, for among the early Christians to say that one of the disciples should tarry till he come, was the same as to say "that that disciple should not die." Jno. xxi. 23. An old colored man once told me that his wife, when very sick and expected to die, said she saw the Lord Jesus and the angels coming for her; and it made a great impression on those who heard her, but she very soon got well again, and in that way they found she was mistaken. If she had died at that time, however, it is probable that her friends would to this day have solemnly believed that he did come and carry her soul off to heaven: for some people seem to think that what a dying person testifies must be true. But facts prove that millions not only live in error and delusion but die in the same. The unenlightened Papist, Pagans and Mohammedans die not confessing the truth as it is in Jesus, but exulting to the last in the delusions of their respective creeds. When the holy martyr Stephen was about to die he had a true vision of the Lord Jesus, in which vision he did not, like the old colored woman, see him "coming" but "standing." Acts vii. 56. Surely if we seek a Scriptural pattern for death-bed rejoicing we should infinitely prefer Stephen's to the old colored woman's. The Lord's coming, so far from being the time for a living saint to die, is the time for dead saints to live. Death brings into the grave, his coming brings out of it.

When shall the righteous be recompensed? "Thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just." Luke xiv. 14.

When is "the resurrection of the just?" When "the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God." 1 Thes. iv. 16.

When will he give the crown of glory? "When the Chief Shepherd shall appear ye shall receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away." 1 Pet. v. 4.

To whom will he give the crown of righteousness? "To all them also that love his appearing." 2 Tim. iv. 8.

Whom will he save? "Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many; and unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time without sin unto salvation."

For what purpose were we turned from our sins? "To serve the living and true God and to wait for his Son from heaven." 1 Thes. i. 9, 10.

By what power and unto what destiny are we kept in that serving and waiting attitude? "Kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation ready to be revealed in the last time." 1 Peter i. 5.

For what are we commanded to hope? "Hope to the end for the grace that is to be brought unto you at the revelation of Jesus Christ." 1 Pet. i. 13.

Thus, through the sacred pages of Scripture I have briefly pointed out some of the precious and golden lines of our religion that meet in the personal and visible coming of Christ.

The Future Inheritance for the "Meek."

Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth.—Matt. v. 5.

This is one of that catalogue of blessings that Jesus propounded to his disciples when he sat on the mountain and taught them. Just imagine what the feelings of those disciples were, when they heard so many blessings flow from the lips of him who spake as never man spake; and each expression filled to overflowing with a precious promise to be given to that people who will qualify themselves to receive these blessings.

The one I wish to speak of in this paper, is the promise of an inheritance which is in reserve for the "meek."

This promise is not made to the high and haughty aristocrat, nor is it made to the millionaire who boasts of his many acres. The earth is theirs only temporarily; they die and turn back to dust. Neither is this promise made to the poor of this world who reject the meek and lowly Jesus (who is "meek and lowly in heart"), and learn of him.

We say of the disciples who lived in the days of Jesus that they had a good opportunity to learn of him, for they heard his words as they fell from his lips. But we also have these words recorded for our instruction, that we, too, may learn of him, and establish that meek and lowly character which was manifest in Jesus.

When Jesus made this promise before his disciples he did not say when the meek should inherit the earth, but like the other promises in the same catalogue he leaves them in the future tense, and although more than eighteen hundred years have passed away since Jesus made this promise, it is yet to be fulfilled in the future. The time may not be far distant when this promise shall become a reality.

What a beautiful thought! How delightful it is to meditate upon God's plan! He who laid the foundations of the earth is holy; so in the fulness of time this earth will be inhabited by holy people. God created the earth for the habitation of man, and filled it with such things as are best to make man happy. He then made man to dwell upon it, and pronounced his works not only good, but "very good." How beautiful was that paradise (garden of delights) where God placed our first parents, and gave them the fruit thereof for food, and talked with them and made them the rulers over his creation.

But when man transgressed God's holy law, he was ejected from that delightful spot, and with sorrow he went forth to eat bread in the sweat of his face till he return to the ground from whence he was taken; and the earth was cursed and brought forth thorns and thistles; and the glory of the garden of Eden faded away. But God has not left us without hope. For, in the fulness of time, "The God of glory appeared unto our father Abraham," and "preached the gospel beforehand unto Abraham, saying, In thee shall all nations be blessed;" and God said to him, "Unto thy seed will I give this land." "Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not, And to seeds, as of many, but as of one. And to thy seed, which is Christ." Then Paul says, "For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ. . . . . And if ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise."

Now in the promise that God made to Abraham, there was a parcel of land that he could look upon, and walk over and examine; this land God promised to give to him and his seed forever; and the land extended "from the river of Egypt unto the great river, the river Euphrates." I think Abraham understood God's plan, that he would not inherit this land according to the promise until some future day. For when Sarah, his wife, died, he went to the sons of Heth and said, "I am a stranger and a sojourner with you. Give me a possession of a burying place with you, that I may bury my dead out of my sight." And he weighed out to them, "four hundred shekels of silver, current money with the merchant." And when Abraham became old and died he was buried in the same place. So we see that Abraham did not inherit that land in his day according to God's promise—therefore that promise is yet to be fulfilled.

This promise was renewed to Isaac; for God said unto him, "Sojourn in this land, and I will be with thee and bless thee; for unto thee, and unto thy seed, I will give all these countries, and I will perform the oath which I sware unto Abraham thy father," etc.

Again. This promise was renewed to Jacob. God told him he would bless him and make him fruitful. Then God said, "And (I will) give thee the blessing of Abraham; to thee, and to thy seed with thee, that thou mayest inherit the land wherein thou art a stranger, which God gave unto Abraham. . . . And behold the Lord stood above it (the ladder) and said, I am the Lord God of Abraham thy father, and the God of Isaac; the land whereon thou liest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed. And thy seed shall be as the dust of the earth; and thou shalt spread abroad to the west, and to the east, and to the north, and to the south; and in thee and in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed."

Thus the promises of God are linked together as a chain. They were first made to Abraham, then to Isaac, afterward to Jacob. And when David was king over the literal descendants of Jacob, he well understood the whole matter, for if we turn to the thirty-seventh Psalm, we read: "Trust in the Lord and do good; so shalt thou dwell in the land, and verily thou shalt be fed. . . . For evil-doers shall be cut off; but those that wait upon the Lord, they shall inherit the earth. . . . But the meek shall inherit the earth, and shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace. . . . The Lord knoweth the days of the upright, and their inheritance shall be forever. . . . . For such as be blessed of him shall inherit the earth, and them that be cursed of him shall be cut off. . . . The righteous shall inherit the land, and dwell therein forever. . . . Wait on the Lord and keep his way, and he shall exalt thee to inherit the land; when the wicked are cut off, thou shalt see it." In Proverbs, second chapter, the wise man says: "For the upright shall dwell in the land, and the perfect shall remain in it. But the wicked shall be cut off from the earth, and the transgressors shall be rooted out of it."

God speaks through Isaiah and says: "He that putteth his trust in me shall possess the land, and shall inherit my holy mountain." So when Jesus said, "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth," it was a confirmation of what God had spoken before by the mouth of his holy prophets, and is another link in the chain of promises concerning the future inheritance of the meek (saints).

When Jesus renewed this promise which God made beforehand, he did not propose to convey the idea that the saints should inherit this earth immediately; for Jesus himself had not where to lay his head, and his disciples that followed him then were poor; and even in the early history of the church we find that some who did own a little property sold it for the benefit of the poorer members of the church. But this inheritance is yet in reserve for the meek. The possession of this earth by the meek will not be till Jesus shall come and gather them together, and the curse shall be removed and the face of the earth shall be renewed. In the 104th Psalm we read: "Thou hidest thy face, they are troubled; thou takest away their breath, they die and return to their dust. Thou sendest forth thy spirit, they are created; and thou renewest the face of the earth."

I believe, then, the time will come when the meek will inherit the earth, and delight themselves in the abundance of peace; but not until they are raised from the dead, and immortalized or changed at the coming of Jesus when he shall descend from heaven, and the curse shall be removed from the earth, and the wicked shall be cut off or rooted out of it. This is not the age for the meek to inherit the earth, for things now are largely under the control of "the prince of the power of the air, the spirit now worketh in the children of disobedience," and a very large majority of people are walking "according to the course of this world." But when Jesus shall descend from heaven, and Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, the prophets and apostles, and all who sleep in Jesus shall be aroused from the slumbers of death, and the living meek and lowly followers of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ shall be changed from mortality to immortality, and the age to come shall be ushered in, and the saints shall reign with Jesus on the earth, and subjugate the nations.

At the beginning of this age, many of the wicked will be cut off and buried in "the valley of Hamon Gog. And seven months shall the house of Israel be burying of them, that they may cleanse the land." Ez. xxxix. 12. And in that age "the child shall die a hundred years old; but the sinner being a hundred years old shall be accursed." Isa. lxv. 20. And "the everlasting Gospel (is) to be preached unto them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people." Rev. xiv. 6. And an angel shall come down from heaven and lay "hold on the dragon, that old serpent, which is the devil, and Satan, and bind him a thousand years." Rev. xx. 2.

And Jesus shall be the King of kings, and the "saints shall reign (with him) on the earth." But "when the thousand years are finished, Satan shall be loosed out of his prison, and shall come forth to deceive the nations which are in the four corners of the earth, Gog and Magog, to gather them together to the war, the number of whom is the sand of the sea. And they went up over the breadth of the earth, and compassed the camp of the saints about, and the beloved city; and fire came down out of heaven (or from God), and devoured them." Rev. xx. 7–9. Here is the final cutting off of the wicked, and "the last enemy shall be destroyed." The earth shall be restored from under the curse, "for he (Jesus) must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet," and Jesus will give "up the kingdom to God, even the Father, when he shall have put down all rule and all authority and power." Then "shall the meek inherit the earth, and delight themselves in the abundance of peace." "And there shall be no more death."

But I think I hear objections to these positions, for some will say, How can these things be? for Peter says: "The earth, also, and the works that are therein shall be burned up." So if the earth is to be burned up, how can the meek inherit it? Therefore we must find some other meaning for the language of Jesus, and also that of David. "I believe," says one, "that it means a spiritual land up in heaven, where the souls of the righteous ascend at the death of the body." But if we examine the Scriptures carefully, we shall not find anything said about a soul separating from the body at death, and going to heaven; besides this, if such a thing could be, how much better off would we be in heaven, if this literal earth is to be burned up? for the whole verse reads: "But the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night; in the which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat, the earth also and the works that are therein shall be burned up." 2 Peter iii. 10. The 12th verse reads: "Looking for and hasting unto the coming of the day of God, wherein the heavens, being on fire, shall be dissolved, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat."

In selecting texts from the word of God, we should always observe the context. So in the texts alluded to, showing that the actual earth will be the future home of the saints, in God's own time, to this the contexts will agree. But in the case where Peter speaks of the earth burning up, we shall discern the thoughts of the apostle by reading the fifth to the seventh verses: "For this they willingly are ignorant of, that by the word of God the heavens were of old, and the earth standing out of the water and in the water. Whereby the world that then was, being overflowed with water, perished. But the heavens and the earth which are now, by the same word are kept in store, reserved unto fire against the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men." No one will dare to say that the actual heavens and earth that existed in the days of Noah, before the flood, passed away into oblivion, for we read that the ark rested on "the mountains of Ararat," and the same earth again became inhabited.

It was, then, the wicked and their works that perished and passed away to destruction. But when the world became repeopled wickedness again began to show itself before the God of the heavens. So he has ordained that all the wicked and their works shall be destroyed from the face of the earth, and it will be purified and renovated by fire. So the apostle then says: "Nevertheless we, according to his promise, look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness."

So when this sin-cursed earth shall be purified by fire, (and thus recreated anew), then will the "meek inherit the earth, and delight themselves in the abundance of peace." It will be a fit home for all the redeemed, for more than its pristine glory shall be given unto it. For, behold the tabernacle of God shall be in it, and God will be their God, and they shall be his people. "For, behold the day cometh that shall burn as an oven; and all the proud, yea, and all they that do wickedly, shall be stubble; and the day that cometh shall burn them up, saith the Lord of hosts, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch. But unto you that fear my name shall the sun of righteousness arise with healing in his wings; and ye shall go forth and grow up as calves of the stall. And ye shall tread down the wicked; for they shall be ashes under the soles of your feet in the day that I shall do this, saith the Lord of hosts." Mal. iv. 1–3. And "thy (God's) people also shall be all righteous, they shall inherit the land forever." Isa. lx. 21.

Beautiful home for the saints on earth!
Where they in glory will shine forth.
God and the Lamb with them will dwell,
Their happiness and joy forever to swell.

P. S.—Since writing the above I have read with much pleasure Bro. B. Wilson's article on the subject, "Will the Earth be Burned?" published in THE RESTITUTION June 6, 1883. I highly recommend it to the readers of this paper; it serves as a full explanation of Peter's prophecy, as briefly referred to in the closing part of the above communication. J. B. C.

ABIDE IN ME.

How forcible the advice of the Master to his disciples just before leaving them to depart out of the world, to go unto the Father, how forcible the illustration, the vine and the branches: how soon does the branch wither when severed from the vine. "I am the vine ye are the branches, says the Master to his people; they have been chosen out of the world. If the world is to be saved by virtue of the blood of Christ; then the work of calling out a separate, distinct and chosen people is a work of supererogation; the world is not in Christ but are in Adam which is death, as in Adam all die so all that are in Christ shall be made alive. The first man, Adam, was made a living soul; the second man, the Lord from heaven, was made a quickening or life-giving or vivifying spirit.

How do we get into Christ, is an important question. It is plainly revealed and made plain by the Word of God. Study carefully the teaching of Christ; read carefully the parable of the wheat and the tares, Matt. xiii, it is very plain, we need not make any mistake; and also in the proclamation of the gospel, the good news of the kingdom of God, the requirements are plainly stated and are to be literally believed and obeyed. Be careful in laying the foundation, the Master has given the directions very clearly; hear him, "Go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature; he that believeth (the gospel) and is baptized shall be saved." It is always safe to follow Christ. He has set us the example, blessed be his holy name. How shamefully do men quibble at and deny the plainest teaching of Christ. Said an Orthodox minister to the writer when we quoted the words of Christ to him, "O I did not know that baptism consisted in the amount of water," and another, "We don't know how deep Christ and John went into water, perhaps ankle or knee deep, and then sprinkled a little water on the candidate." This certainly is willful blindness, and if the blind lead the blind, both will fall into the ditch.

We take it for granted that the readers of THE RESTITUTION are well posted upon the first principles of Bible Christianity and need no further instruction as to how men are made Christians. We say to all such: Abide in Christ. Paul is good authority; he says, leaving the first principles of the doctrines of Christ, let us go on unto perfection. The mechanic when he has put in the foundation, does not longer work about it, but rears his building, finishes it, and has it ready for occupation.

After we have put on Christ in baptism, we are in him; from this point we are to go on unto perfection, by adding to our faith all the Christian graces. Here is a lifetime work: we cannot shun the responsibility. We are virtually called into the Lord's vineyard; here is no place for idlers; the Master has entrusted us with talents and they must be improved. The time of reckoning is at hand; how fearful the day. Do you see that beautiful young forest or orchard, how vigorous, how healthy, covered with green foliage, yea loaded with precious fruit; how delightful to behold. Stop! there is one tree that [illegible] attention; do you see that [illegible] is attached to the tree, it [illegible] foliage, it bears no fruit, it is a withered branch. Perhaps it is the seed sown by the wayside, or it may be among thorns or on stony ground.

How apt and how illustrative are the parables of our Lord, truly he spake as never man spake. Alas, how large the proportion of nominal professors to the humble, devoted, live members, even in the body of Christ. The dead limb or withered branch aptly illustrates the worldly-minded or the covetous. He is in his seat every Sunday, he prays long and loud, he can preach with eloquence, but there is a lack of fruit. What is the matter? By their fruits ye shall know them; we don't gather figs from thistles nor grapes from brambles. Perhaps it was a discontented, fault-finding brother. Unstable as water thou shalt not excel. It may be a brother or a sister who has been gratifying the old man of the flesh in a little tale-bearing or a little evil surmising, or it may be an Achor who covets the wedge of gold or that Babylonian garment. Did you see that sister with her cardinal red jacket on reading Dicken's novels? Suddenly in a moment the curtain drops, an alarm is sounded, Beloved the Bridegroom cometh, go ye out to meet him; that costume and that state of heart is truly a poor state or condition to be in to meet him whose eyes are as a flame of fire and his garments as white as wool or the clean linen. Our dress, our actions and our manner are index of the heart; out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh. If we would abide in Christ and bring forth fruit, we must be like him, holy, harmless, undefiled and separate from sinners. We must keep the motive power of the gospel prominently before our minds; with faith it must be the main spring to action, viz.: the kingdom and coming of our Lord Jesus the Christ.

How little do we realize what a mighty change will come over the children of the kingdom and the planet which we inhabit. Christ says all the tribes of earth will mourn when they see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory. Oh what a sight to behold that immortalized host of holy ones as they stand before the city; hear that commanding voice, "Lift up your heads ye age lasting doors that the King of glory may come in." What a host of redeemed ones; they come from the east, from the west, from the north and from the south; what shouts of happy greetings; hear that welcome applaudit "well done good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

Beautiful Bride in heaven to dress,
Fitted [illegible] bright promised rest.
[illegible] Bridegroom's coming great,
[illegible] heavenly home.

Oops, [illegible] well prepared,
By the [illegible] will be shared.
Earth accepted in royal palace,
Marriage of the Lamb.

How blessed to abide in Christ, to draw sap and nourishment from such an overflowing fountain that never will run dry; drink oh beloved, drink abundantly. We have anticipated the result of the faithful who abide in Christ. But we have not got our discharge; faithful watching is our lot for a little while only; a little while and he that is to come will come and will not tarry. There is no mistaking the signs, the crisis is swiftly approaching, if there remains anything for us to do it must be done quickly. There is a noble example for us to follow in the case of Zacchous; he was little of stature, but he had a big honest heart; he was wealthy and very likely had not got his money exactly honest. It is barely possible for a man to become rich if he deals upon the Golden Rule laid down by the great Law-giver. We do not believe that Christ in his teaching ever intended that his people should become rich and hoard up money against a rainy day; it is out of harmony with every principle of the gospel of the kingdom of God. He comes directly to the point, the half of my goods I give to the poor, and if I have taken anything by false accusation from any man I restore him fourfold. Noble, genuine repentance and restitution; well and truly did the Master say, this day is salvation come unto this house.

We only ask even justice onefold of what has been so unjustly and unlawfully taken from us; that is even denied us; we have to live on short allowance and are hard pushed to make the ends meet, while others have their thousands and never know or feel want. We feel an abiding assurance that God will provide for us, his promise is sure, no good thing will he withhold from them that walk uprightly. The day is at hand when it will be most blessed to be in Christ or abide under the covert of his wing when the blast of the terrible one shall be as a storm against the wall. Careless, heedless one, consider well what is before thee; what a fearful condition to be in; no hiding place, no refuge, none to help or deliver. Oh haste, flee to Christ, lay hold on eternal life. All will be well; you cannot say you have not been warned and admonished and entreated; no excuse will avail. We reluctantly leave you praying that God in his mercy may lead to deep and unfeigned repentance and the embrace of the truth in the love of it.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXII. Read PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, JULY 4, 1883. NO. 25.

THE RESTITUTION.

TERMS--TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR, Payable in Advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.

Address all Letters and Communications to THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all His holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of Kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

GENESIS THE THIRD: HISTORY NOT FABLE.—Lecture II. Part 2.

THE GENERAL OBJECTIONS URGED AGAINST THE TRUTH OF THE HISTORY OF THE FALL.

A second difficulty which has been felt in the reception of the Edenic story as historical, is what is spoken of as its childish tone, in which the Almighty Creator is represented as working with his hands as a potter or sculptor; walking, talking, professing ignorance of the hiding-place of Adam: and then condemning his new-made creatures to death when tempted to make progress in intelligence by a speaking serpent. That is one way of putting the case. Now let us try the effect of another. This narrative presents a succession of the sublimest ideas of which the human mind is capable. The expression of them is indeed childlike, in the simplest language, language suitable to the childhood of the world; but there is nothing childish, nothing unworthy of the faith of the manliest intelligence, and nothing unworthy of the Infinite Lord of Nature dealing with mankind in its beginnings. The Bible as a whole is credible and defensible, partly because it offers a history of humanity from its infancy to mature age—the race having, as a matter of fact, passed through the stages of individual life from childhood to maturity; so that the early portion of the Bible, professing to record revelations of God in the earliest stages of man's life, wins credibility from reflective readers, just because its opening pages are unsewnable in style to the opening ages of the world. Had they been less childlike in tone, they would have lacked one necessary note of genuineness in the adaptation of the Divine Father's voice to the early understanding of his sons. Besides, if we may form an idea of the character of the Divine Mind from the study of natural history, from the actual procedure of the Power which is behind nature in the production and management of his innumerable creatures, including insects, (and this is much likelier to be a true idea of God, than that which you gain from the string of abstract attributes, described in long Latin words, by St. Thomas Aquinas, or Pope Leo XIII.) it results that no conception that can be formed of God is farther from reality than that which represents him as too great to attend to and delight in the management of little and elementary things. The one essential condition of intelligent intercourse between God and his rational creatures must be the coming down of the Creator to the level of his infant progeny.

The books of the nursery are indeed childlike in tone, but often embody the maturest wisdom; and no wise man dreams of deriding his own childhood, or of burning the library of his children's nursery. Judged by these canons, the histories of Genesis assume a place of high importance in the annals of the world. As a record of early religious literature, compared with the deciphered rubbish of Egypt and Chaldea, it is a pre-eminent example of the survival of the fittest.

Let us now point out some of the noble thoughts which underlie the Edenic story. 1. Here, then, first of all we find the sublimest possible conception of man's origin. Man is Deiform, the image of the Infinite Being on earth, the direct creation of the eternal mind and will. He is formed of the dust of the ground, Adamah, from which he takes his name of Adam, or Earth, dust and ashes, in the language of Abraham. He is formed as the last link in a series of animal lives, and on one side of his nature strongly resembles those beasts which perish. He belongs to the Vertebrata. His form has been typified and foretold in a long succession of old-world prophecies, in the structure of previous animals. But he does not spring from the earth, or from previous forms, as they did. He is specially fashioned by the Almighty Hand; God is represented as moulding him, working out in living art the eternal idea; and then as breathing into him, by direct afflatus of divinity, the breath of life. In this luminous ancient page man does not appear as a developed animal, an evolution from anthropoids, the lineal descendant of brutal races—but, while akin to these in inward structure of the body and mind, as possessed also of a higher nature, a nature resembling that of Deity—rational, moral, and royal; a nature which gives him the power of tracing up all effects to the eternal cause; of knowing his Maker, of communing with his God, of obeying and enjoying him; a being inhabiting both worlds, of matter and spirit, holding intimate relations with both time and eternity, with both earth and heaven. The seal of the living God, of the infinite life, is on his forehead, and though capable of dying, he is not made to die. There is no idea in the modern books on the "Descent of Man" so grand as this.

2. An equal splendor and originality characterizes the relation or the creation of woman. As if foreseeing the debasing gorilla-philosophy of the last days, here, in the very dawn of history, the strongest possible contradiction is given, while humanity was still in its beginning, to the notion of human derivation from the animals. "And the Lord God said, It is not good for the man to be alone. I will make him an help-meet for him. And out of the ground the Lord God formed every beast of the field, and brought them unto Adam to see what he would call them. And Adam gave names to cattle, and to every beast of the field; but for Adam there was not found an help-meet for him." Man was not a "beast of the field," no "beast's heart was given to him," therefore no modified anthropoid or simian could serve as his wife. For a modified gorilla, a modified simian would have served well enough. But Adam was of a Divine original, "made in God's image," and therefore Eve, in her glory and beauty, is the direct work of the Supreme Sculptor, Painter, Poet, and Life-giver; fashioning out of Adam Himself the woman who should be one with him in life and love for ever and ever. Here is the strongest possible denial of the bestial original of humanity. He could not pair with the lower races, for his origin was directly from the sacred foot of Deity. He was "the Son of God."

The building up of the frame of Eve out of materials of bone and flesh taken from the entranced form of Adam, is only a specific difference under the general principle that living beings descend from each other, under the plastic agency of God; and in this case the form of the action was specially fitted to lay the foundation of spiritual marriage, the only true human marriage, in the consciousness of their deep unity in him. It is God who "joins together" man and woman in a unity which is no mere partnership or trading company with limited liability, but a unity consecrated by the bond of God's Spirit, and which, therefore, "no man may put asunder." The influence of this account of the creation of Eve was to throw a glorious light on womanhood through all the ages of the patriarchal and Mosaic religions. It was a solemn protest, as Christ himself declares, at once against the gross bovine polygamy of the East, and the looser unions of harlotry. It consecrated woman as the daughter of the Lord God Almighty, it wrote "Holiness to the Lord" upon her forehead, and taught her for ever her true vocation as the mother of the sons of God, and man's helper in the service of heaven. Compare these ideas as civilizing and ennobling agencies, first with the incredible theories of recent years, that the mutual adaptation of the sexes in all their intricate relations was the work of blind nature; and then that woman was a development out of the hairy and tailed monsters of the anthropoid type, meeting, in the darkness of a world without God, her predestined partner in brutality and death.

3. Next observe that the man and woman thus formed are designed for immortal life. Those who speak so confidently of the absence of the idea of immortality in the Old Testament, must have failed to note its earliest pages. So long as Adam abstained from the forbidden tree he is free to take of the tree of life, the effect of which is to cause him to "live for ever." To take of one tree was death, but to take of the other was life eternal. What can convey more clearly the sublime idea that man was originally designed for a dependent but endless life in God. Its enjoyment depended on union with God by faith, but the original purpose of God was that man should never die—that his existence should run parallel with that of the Divine Being throughout eternity. Here surely is a conception beyond the shafts of ridicule even from extreme evolutionists.

4. But if man is not a "beast of the field," and if a "beast's heart is not given him," neither is he here represented as an automaton. He is free, and is placed at once under the necessity of choosing between good and evil, truth and falsehood, right and wrong, God and self-will—in an immediate trial. This trial is ultimately to determine whether the higher or the lower nature shall rule, the spiritual nature which unites man with the infinite God, or the lower nature which unites man only with the creation by the attractions of sense and passion. This trial is represented as coming to the first man, as it comes to every one of us, in the earliest stage of our intelligence. The chief and determining trial of character is in childhood and youth. The trial of Adam was at the commencement of his history. He must, by a deliberate choice under temptation, against all lower seduction, declare his allegiance to the Eternal, as the condition of the endless life. It was a trial of faith, that is of intelligent voluntary choice of the infinite life and perfection as Ruler and Lord, precisely in the same sense which we are tried in the contest between faith and unbelief.

How could this faith be tested? The law of the ten commandments was, as Mr. Henry Rogers has pointed out in one of his memorable letters, inapplicable. The law of the fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth and tenth commandments was unsuited to a creature who had but one single earthly relationship. There must, therefore, be appointed some positive external trial, by which the question of allegiance might be determined at once and forever. The test selected was the taking of the fruit of a tree which was called the "tree of the knowledge of good and evil," which was good for food, desirable to the eyes, and in some mysterious sense described as a "tree desirable to make one wise." This tree appealed by its complex qualities, to the whole nature of man on its un-moral side, to the lower senses of taste and smell, to the sense of beauty, above all to his intellectual curiosity and ambition, as carrying with it some awful mystery of "knowledge of good and evil," which should liberate him from dependence on the Creator's word—in fact from a life of faith in God. It was a test which brought out the whole strength of the two counter attractions by which their being was drawn in two opposite directions, towards God the Infinite, or away from him. Between these two the choice must be made for eternity of loyal obedience, or of empirical rebellion.

And the lower attraction was supplemented by the permitted assistance of a living Tempter, enforcing the seduction of the inanimate object, since the rejection of animated evil was as much due to God as the rejection of the inanimate. In Adam's case, the still further fidelity was required of deafness to the voice of his wife, when she became an auxiliary to the seduction.

What is there of ridiculous in such a trial? It precisely resembles in its exercise the trial to which every man in the world is still exposed—the trial of faith and fidelity to God, to right, to duty as against created forces of seduction. How shamefully is this lofty trial now misrepresented! Here is not the word of "an actual apple"—the fruit is not named; the material attractiveness is scarcely noticed, in the emphasis given to the intellectual attractions of the "tree of the knowledge of good and evil"—the temptation to know good and evil experimentally, apart from the will and work of the Creator. These perverse attempts to replace serious thought by ridicule are, I think, unworthy even of intelligent sceptics, much less of Christians. The tree by which they were tempted was no mere bait for the palate; it presented a mysterious appeal to all that was within them—just as the modern love of knowledge, when animated by a spirit of conceit and rebellion, offers the deepest temptation to the abandonment of God and religion by those who love truth and duty less than what they wrongly call science and freedom. It was a test of the root-principle of obedience to the eternal mind and will, the prime condition of co-existence in eternity with God; since such obedience of faith is, and must be in all worlds but the fulfilment of the primary law of created free agency. Her pride is the sin through which "fell the Angels."—Edward White.

ORIENTAL SKETCHES.—Second Series. Number 13.

EKRON.

Akir soon came in sight; and a quarter of an hour's gallop along a beaten path, through fields of corn, brought us to the village. We dismounted, and sat down beside the only antiquity of the place, a large deep well; such a well, probably, as the servants of Abraham dug at Gerar and Beersheba in olden times. A crowd of villagers collected to gaze at the strangers. The men were chiefly conspicuous for the huge daggers in their girdles, and their enormous turbans, which seemed out of all proportion with the rest of their scanty wardrobe. The women were in rags, and most of the children stark naked. Akir is a wretched village, containing some forty or fifty mud hovels; its narrow lanes encumbered with heaps of rubbish and filth. It stands on a bare slope, and the ground immediately around it has a dreary and desolate look, heightened by a few stunted trees scattered here and there round the houses. Yet this is all that marks the site and bears the name of the royal city of Ekron. There is not a solitary vestige of royalty there now. With feelings which it would be difficult to describe, we took out our Bibles, and read the doom pronounced upon it by the Hebrew prophet while it yet stood in all the pride of its strength and beauty: "Ekron shall be rooted up." Zeph. ii. 4.

We read also the interesting narrative of the restoration of the ark to the Israelites, when it was conveyed on the new cart from Ekron to Beth-shemesh. 1. Sam. vi. The position of the latter city was pointed out to us by Selim. It is beautifully situated in the side of the deep valley of Surar, the ancient Sorek; a short distance above the place where it opens from the mountains of Judah into the plain. It is about ten miles from Ekron, and a broad vale, or rather depression, winds down from it to the Mediterranean. On the northern slope of this vale Ekron stands. Up that vale ran the ancient highway, "straight to Beth-shemesh," along which went the "lowing kine," bearing the ark, and "turned not aside to the right hand nor to the left." It was just about this season of the year too; for the "men of Beth-shemesh were reaping their wheat-harvest in the valley"—that very valley of Surar which now waved with ripening grain. The chief of the Philistines followed the ark to the border of Beth-shemesh—that is, to the foot of the mountains; and there, having given up their charge, "they returned to Ekron the same day." We were all deeply impressed with the simplicity and, at the same time, graphic power of the narrative.

Again we mounted, and led by our active guide, struck at a dashing pace down the gentle slope, then diagonally across the meadows and wheat-fields of Wady Surar. The sun was already high in the heavens, and not a cloud as large as a man's hand to shade us from his fierce beams. The rainy season was past in the low plain of Philistia. A single cloud would now have been looked on as a wonder; and as for a shower, the peasants would have been as much terrified at it as the Israelites were, when, in answer to the prayer of Samuel, the Lord "sent thunder and rain" in the time of wheat-harvest. 1 Sam. xii. 17. Through the center of the wady, deeply furrowed in the alluvial soil, winds the torrent-bed of the Sorek, already dry, except here and there where water lay stagnant in little pools, half concealed by the dark foliage and gorgeous flowers of the oleander. The rivers of this southern land are mere winter torrents; the summer's sun dries them up, scorching the reeds, and rank grass, and bright flowers of early spring; just as Isaiah describes it: "The river shall be wasted and dried up; the reeds and flags shall wither. The paper reeds by the brooks, by the mouth of the brooks, and everything sown by the brooks, shall whither, be driven away, and be no more." Isa. xix. 5–7. But when the autumn rain falls, the streams return to their beds, and the waters flow murmuring over the pebbles, and the dead plants burst forth into new life and verdure. How beautiful the prayer, and how appropriate the allusion of the Psalmist:—

"As streams of water in the south.
Our bondage, Lord, recall."—Psa. cxxvi. 4.

Skirting the base of a low limestone ridge we opened up the plain of Yebna, extending away on the right to the shores of the Mediterranean,—almost as smooth as the surface of the sea itself, and having a little hill, like an island in the centre, covered in part with the ruins of ancient Jabneh (2 Chron. xxvi. 6), and in part with the humble houses of its modern representative; in part, too, with the remains of a crusader's church. The plain was all astir with bands of reapers, men and women; and close behind them the gleaners, mostly young girls, reminding one of the faithful Ruth. The great proprietors were there too, moving about, like Boaz, from field to field among their laborers, clad in their scarlet cloaks. As we passed each group Selim saluted them with an Ullah makum, — "The Lord be with you;" and they returned the invariable response, "The Lord bless thee." Not only are the manners and customs unchanged in this land, but the very words of salutation are what they were three thousand years ago. Ruth ii. 2, 4.

Leaving this low-lying plain we ascended the bleak downs, where vast flocks of sheep and camels were browsing; and away on our left, nearly a mile distant, we saw the black tents of their Arab owners. They saw us also; and a party of ten or twelve splendidly mounted came upon us at full gallop, their spears glittering in the sunbeams, and their braided hair and flowing robes streaming behind them. Selim rode out to meet them, and I followed to hear the parley. Before a word was spoken, Selim and the Arab chief threw themselves from their horses and joined in a cordial embrace. The sight was not new to me, yet it was most interesting. Each rested his hands upon the shoulder of the other, and laid his head upon his neck; or, to use the expressive words of Scripture, "He fell on his neck, and kissed him." Gen. xxvii. 33. We were now invited, and pressed with genuine Arab warmth to go to the camp. "O my lords," said the chief, addressing us, "pass not away, I pray you, from your servant. The sun is high; the day is hot; honor his house with your presence; let him kill a sheep, and eat bread before you, and then depart in peace." We respectfully declined, pleading the distance we had yet to ride, and the absence of our servants. Amid all their wildness and waywardness, a hospitality worthy of the old patriarchs is still practiced by these sons of the desert. I have narrated the incident, and accurately translated the language used, because it illustrates such passages as Gen. xviii., and xix. 2.

ASHDOD.

On approaching Ashdod we were all charmed with the beauty of the site, and the wonderful richness of the country immediately around it. We had left the line of the great caravan road to Gaza and Egypt, and had turned into a beaten track, leading straight to the village. It crosses a vale, some three miles wide, and extending far to the eastward;—perfectly level, and one unbroken expanse of golden corn, the richest I had anywhere seen in Palestine, rivalling even the best parts of Bashan. There was not a fence, nor tree, nor house upon it. Our path was bordered by the tall ripe grain; and our attendants plucked the ears as they rode along, "and did eat, rubbing them in their hands." Luke vi. 1. We could here see how true to nature was the illustration in the parable of the sower,—"And as he sowed, some fell by the wayside." Mark iv. 4. When the husbandman sows such fields as these, some seeds must necessarily fall upon the unfenced, beaten tracks, which traverse them in every direction.

The plain sweeps the northern base of the low, rounded hill on which once stood the royal city of Ashdod. The temples, palaces, and houses are all gone. The dust of centuries has covered them. Terraced orchards of figs and olives, apricots and pomegranates, now occupy their places, clothing the hill-side from base to summit. The modern village of Esdud, a confused group of mud hovels, lies embowered on the eastern slope. It bears the ancient name; but we might truly change it to Ichabod, for its glory is departed.

We rode to it through winding lanes, hedged with the giant cactus, round whose shapeless stems, and quaint branches and leaves, the convolvulus and honeysuckle had woven garlands of bright flowers. The village is wretched in the extreme. Groups of hungry-looking men and squalid women lounged lazily in the dirty lanes, and on the dusty roofs, gazing listlessly on the strangers, and scarcely able to muster energy enough to curse the infidel Frank. As we looked on them and their miserable dwellings, the words of Zechariah flashed upon our memory: "A bastard shall dwell in Ashdod, and I will cut off the pride of the Philistines." We climbed to the top of the hill. The temple of Dagon, in which the ark of the Lord was put, must have stood here; for the sea is visible, and Dagon, "the fish god," was doubtless placed where he could look out over the element he was supposed to personify. Not a vestige of the temple is there now. Along the southern declivity old building stones, with fragments of columns and sculptured capitals, are piled up in the fences of little fields, and in the walls of goat and sheep pens, showing how time, and God's unchangeableness, have inverted prophecy into history: "And the sea-coast shall be dwellings and cottages for shepherds, and folds for flocks."

How sad, and yet how glorious is the view from the top of that hill, beneath which the dust of a mighty city lies dishonored! On the one side the noble plain, stretching away to the foot of Judah's mountains, here and there cultivated, but mostly neglected and desolate, yet all naturally rich as in the palmiest days of Philistia's power. On the other side a dreary, hopeless waste of drifting sand, washed away yonder by the waves of the Mediterranean, and here, at our feet, advancing with slow and silent, but resistless step, covering, and to cover, flower and tree, ancient ruin and modern hut, in one common tomb.—*J. I do not want the paper to go down so I send you my own subscription and for another. I hardly know what I would do without THE RESTITUTION. I hear no preaching, and am nearly alone, and my Bible and the paper are nearly all my reading, so I feel glad when I get my paper. It is a great comfort to an old man in his 80th year. I think THE RESTITUTION is well conducted, and it is the best religious paper I ever read.

May the Lord bless you, dear brother.

Editor Restitution:

I love the truths presented in our paper, and wonder that any of the Household of Faith should do without it, or be indifferent to the signs of the times, as I know some are. I said Household of Faith, but when one becomes so cold and heedless, I fear he has gone out to the world. If one begins to preach the gospel of the kingdom and then halt or look back, what says the Scriptures? "No man putting his hand to the plow, and looking back is fit for the kingdom." I know some that are able to proclaim the truth to an apostate world, who have started, but the cares of this world and the deceitfulness of riches doth hinder. What will it profit such an one if he should gain much riches, and then lose himself or be a cast away. History informs us that one of England's queens just before death, cried out "Millions of money for one hour of time." What was wealth to her at that time? Happier would she have been had she have had the calm, strong faith of an apostle, and been all her life past a pauper. And so we think of any other person.

Let the brethren and sisters everywhere renew their strength by clothing themselves with the power that is mighty and able to uphold. God be merciful and forgive our iniquities, we pray, and in the soon coming kingdom crown us heirs, we ask in the name of our Lord and Master, our Savior and Redeemer. Amen.

The weekly visits of THE RESTITUTION are like an oasis in the desert to me, as I am too old and feeble to attend church. It cheers me to read its precious truths, and while I am in the furnace of affliction, for I have suffered severely for two years with rheumatism, I know it is all for the best. My prayer is that I may be refined and reflect the image of my Master in my heart and life. I feel that all is on the altar, all I suffer is sweetened by his love to me, and I can rejoice that we have such a loving Savior. His mercy endures forever.

The Convention at Walden--Promotive of Holiness--Preparing for the Second Coming.

The call to this convention embodied two of the most profound and far-reaching thoughts that can occupy the minds of men or angels. The second coming of Christ Jesus our Lord, the Judge and King of earth, will constitute the grandest crisis that creation has ever known; and the preparation for its enjoyment, enthronement, and crown of life, embraces the loftiest aspirations of the sons of God.

With this conviction I set out with Brother Kramer to shire in the smile of Jesus, our coming King of glory, and with the brethren to seek "an abundant entrance—the gracious welcome and a full reward—in the everlasting kingdom." Amen.

Those most accustomed to such gatherings pronounced it "the best they ever enjoyed." But as I must be brief, I will sum up mainly by emphasizing that and kindred exclamations. Brother M. C. gave us luminous lectures on prophecy, and confirmed our faith in the near coming by his splendid chart.

Brother R. A. S. gave us "Jesus—the resurrection and the life," with numerous and unmistakable proofs of the personal, bodily rising again from the dead, which Christendom might largely profit by.

Brother G. R. K. gave us three special themes of our transcendently "glorious gospel of the blessed God." As inspiration employs all the most beautiful and blessed scenes of creation to portray the gorgeous visions of grace and glory in the coming reign of Christ, so he grouped them into the one entrancing Gospel view, and laying all nature under contribution to his purpose, he instructed, delighted and edified his audiences. "Scenes surpassing fable," yet all divinely true. Amen.

Brother J. H. gave us Eph. i. 10, "That in the dispensation of the fulness of times, he might gather together in One, all things in Christ." But this subject demands a further notice; because of its bearing on all faith and Christian hope—hence I will close the present notice.

The place at Walden was charming, and the general sense of the convention, as expressed openly, was that we had the blessing of the Lord. Brethren Griffin, Hook, and others besides, will be remembered, I trust in the kingdom. We were "nourished up in the words Logos, pl.) and good doctrine."

Praise ye the Lord.

Book Notices.

When Shall These Things Be? — is the title of a neat little pamphlet of about 40 pages written by Henry Bowman, and published by C. H. Jones, Chicago, Ill. Price 25 cts. One aim of the writer is to show a connection between some prophecies and the institutions of the United States—with how much success is for readers to determine. We have it on sale at this office.

Atheism and Theism is a new book written by John G. Wilson, editor of Prophetic Times and Watchtower, and issued by the publishing house of J. B. Lippincott & Co. of Philadelphia. As this work has only just come to hand, we are not prepared to say much from personal examination, but from the well known ability we shall expect to find its topics handled in a masterly manner. We shall keep the work for sale. Pp. 239, Price $1, neatly bound in cloth.

The Prospectus of a large work entitled—The Theocratic Kingdom of our Lord Jesus, the Christ, as covenanted in the Old Testament and presented in the New Testament—has reached us. The design is to publish this work in three large octavo volumes at $3.00 per vol., cloth; carriage free, when a sufficient number of names shall have been obtained. As we are about to go to press we defer more particular notice.

Notes of a Prophetic Conference Held at Wimbledon, England.

Meetings were held in Emmanuel Church, at Wimbledon, on May 30th and 31st, to confer on the glorious coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. Various aspects of the subject were unfolded.

Mr. Augustus Churchill, who presided, said: It is just four years since we met to consider the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ, and those who were then present will recall the spiritual refreshment enjoyed. With reference to the second coming of the Lord, many of us may have different views; but that does not matter so long as we are looking and longing for his appearance. For myself I do not see anything to prevent our expecting the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ at any moment, remembering his word, "I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto myself; that where I am there ye may be also."

Canon Garratt said: We have, in Luke xxi., definite information that after the destruction of Jerusalem it would be trodden down of the Gentiles for a period called "the times of the Gentiles," which will not terminate till his coming is close at hand. Luke xxi. 24.

The treading down of Jerusalem by the Gentiles has been a continued fulfilment of this prophecy. It has been trodden down by Romans, Persians, Saracens, Crusaders, Turks; and will, I doubt not, just before its reoccupation by Jews, be trodden down by united Christendom. But this and many other signs of the coming, scattered through the centuries and daily unfolding, must be sought in other prophecies, and lie outside my present subject.

SIGNS OF CHRIST'S COMING.

There are, however, signs of Christ's coming, those immediately preceding it, which form a most distinctive feature of our Lord's preaching. There is a general agreement that as what was looked forward to as a single event in the Old Testament times has, since the crucifixion, resurrection, and ascension, divided itself into two—his first and second advent—so his second advent (though in the perspective of prophecy, seen in the distance, it may be regarded as a single event) will eventually unfold into various distinct stages. But there is reason for thinking there are other stages besides these. For in the description of the first of these events, which is that most dwelt upon in our Lord's prophecy of the twenty-fourth of St. Matthew, the fourteenth of St. Mark, and the twenty-first of St. Luke—the appearing of the Son of man in the clouds of heaven, and the gathering of his elect to him with a great sound of trumpet from the uttermost parts of heaven—which can be nothing else than the resurrection and translation of his church as described in 1 Thess. 4—there is no mention of his actually taking the kingdom. The saints go to him, instead of coming with him.

In the close of the following chapter of St. Matthew we see him coming in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, and also his brethren, and sitting, doubtless with them beside him, on the throne of his glory, and all the heathen gathered before him. His appearing in the clouds to gather his church is prior in time to his coming with his church to judge and reign.

What those special signs of Christ's second advent are, we are taught, if I mistake not, in the gospels.

COMING OF "THE TIMES OF THE GENTILES."

First, the closing of "the times of the Gentiles" by Jerusalem being once more under Jewish rule. "Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." I do not think from other parts of Scripture that the Jews will as a nation be converted till that appearing to translate his church. And I do not think they will be an independent nation till the short triumph of the union of Christendom in apostasy has been consummated in the Holy City, and the last conflicts and the last persecutions of the church have been undergone. But I believe that the two counter-streams which will result in both these states of the world—in the union of Christendom in a General Council at Jerusalem, and in the setting up of an independent Jewish Republic in that city—are both flowing deep and strong. And when this last event takes place it will be a sign that he is at the door.

Secondly, certain physical phenomena: "The sun shall be darkened and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven," not necessarily, as I think, miraculous, but very likely capable of being accounted for on scientific principles, and therefore, not signs to the world at large, but only to Christ's people. Thirdly, an impression made partly by the signs just mentioned, and perhaps in some other way corresponding to the Master's knock in one parable and the midnight cry in another parable, which will so awaken all believers as to make them all arise and trim their lamps, when it will be too late for others to make ready.

CORRESPONDING SIGNS OF THE FIRST ADVENT.

There were corresponding signs of the first advent: political—the threatened passing away of the sceptre from Judah; astronomical—the phenomenon called the Star of the East; and that universal impression among godly men and women which made them known as waiting for redemption in Jerusalem. When these three signs are given it will be certain, and felt to be certain by all faithful servants of God, that the Master may come any day. And all of them may happen very soon.

A great deal in prophecy is clear to us which was not clear to those who have gone before us. In God's wisdom the prophecies were so arranged that Christians all through the ages might be kept in expectation, like travellers toward a distant mountain with ridges of lower hills between. The snowy summit seems to be separated from the travellers by a single range. But when they have reached the top of the nearest hill, another appears beyond, and then another and then another. At length a time comes when the last range has been reached, and nothing but a valley is seen between. I think we are nearing the final stage of the long journey, that most of the signs written in the world's previous history are behind us, and few before us; and that when the three I have mentioned, and on which such emphasis is laid in the gospels, appear, we shall know that our course is all but ended, and listen for the sound on every breath, "Behold, the Bridegroom cometh!"

Dr. Alder Smith said: we must always remember that there are two stages in our Lord's second coming, and though the second part when his feet shall stand on the Mount of Olives, and he shall come with all his saints must be during the last days of the final portion of the great tribulation mentioned in Daniel and in Zechariah, yet the first portion for his saints will probably be before the great trouble, or at its commencement. We find the lightning flash of the rapture, "For as the lightning comes out of the east, and shineth even unto the west; so shall also the coming of the Son of man be," is mentioned in Matthew, before the verse which commences with "immediately after the tribulation of those days."

I firmly believe the two stages of the Lord's second advent are mingled in this prophecy, and so concealed from the eyes of the world, in the same way that the two advents of our Lord were blended, in the accounts given of them, in the old prophets. In Luke xvii. we read: "For as the lightning, that lighteneth out of the one part under heaven, shineth unto the other part under heaven; so shall also the Son of man be in his day. I tell you, in that night there shall be two men in one bed; the one shall be taken, and the other shall be left."

THE RAPTURE, THE TRIBULATION, AND THE ADVENT.

This is the rapture; but we read in Matthew: "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light. And then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven, and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory. And he shall send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet, and they shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other." And in Mark: "But in those days, after that tribulation, the sun shall be darkened and the moon shall not give her light." Then follows the description of the coming, and "the gathering together of his elect from the uttermost part of earth to the uttermost part of heaven." Then in Luke, "And there shall be signs in the sun and in the moon, and then shall they see the Son of man coming in a cloud with power and great glory."

ALGIERS, June 30.—The Governor of Algeria has issued an order prohibiting the usual pilgrimage to Mecca this year on account of the cholera in Egypt.

LONDON, June 30.—In the House of Commons last night Lord Hartington, the War Secretary, stated that every precaution had been taken to guard the British troops in Egypt against the cholera.

ALEXANDRIA, June 30.—An inspection of the fresh water canal shows that the water is good. There is no cholera there. The panic over the cholera reports is subsiding.

A Sanitary Commission has been appointed here, composed of Consuls, doctors, and engineers.

DEATHS AT MANSURAH.

There were six deaths from cholera here today.

LONDON, July 1.—There were 109 deaths from cholera at Damietta Saturday. The cholera appeared at Samanoud, a small town fifty miles southwest of Damietta, on the Damietta branch of the Nile. There were four deaths there.

The News says: During the twelve hours ending at eight o'clock Sunday morning there were 119 deaths at Damietta. It also says that most of the doctors have fled from Damietta.

It is officially denied that there is any cholera at Cairo. The sanitary cordons of Egypt have been ordered to shoot all persons attempting to pass through the lines.

The total eclipse of the sun on May 6 was successfully observed by the expedition sent out for that purpose on Caroline Island, in the South Pacific, and many photographs of the corona and spectrum were obtained. Vulcan was not seen.

A Colporteur has made a trip to Khartoum, which is far up the Nile, and found there ready purchasers for his entire stock of nearly 500 Bibles. It was, however, a rather perilous journey, as the false prophet's forces were committing havoc in Soudan.

The condition of Queen Victoria continues to cause anxiety. The London Truth says: The Queen has for two months been in a state of mild melancholia, which, in the course of time, if not relieved, would probably become very difficult to treat. Her condition has naturally caused great anxiety, because of the tendencies of her family. Her Majesty and Princess Beatrice will, in the autumn, go to the vicinity of Florence, Italy, where they will remain two months.

LONDON, July 3, 3 a. m.—The Daily Telegraph's correspondent at Paris says a telegram received reports the Count de Chambord as being in his death agony. It is stated that the Count has been suffering from inflamation of the intestines, and that he had a relapse Friday.

Brevities.

MRS. Anadibai Joshee, a Brahmin of good social position, has embarked at Calcutta, in company with several missionary women, for America, with the purpose of entering the Philadelphia Women's Medical College. She necessarily violates many injunctions of the Brahmin creed, such as those which prohibit crossing the water, eating food not prepared by Brahmins, and many others. She says that her object in coming to this country is to prepare herself to aid efficiently in the elevation of her sex in her native land.

Parties of Jews are gathering at Cyprus under British protection awaiting the opening of Palestine by the Turkish Government. The Committee of the Syrian Colonization Fund have recently received news of the safe arrival of the second party sent out by them to the East. The party consists of eighty-six Jews, men, women, and children, and they are now settled at Cyprus, where they will be established, by permission of the government, until the difficulties which at present hinder Jews from settling in Syria can be removed. The committee are providing implements, dwellings, and all other necessaries for the people. Thus it is evident the prophecies are nearing fulfilment, and as was recently shown in an article on prophecy in this journal, it is under British guidance that the return of the Jews to Palestine will be accomplished.

Earthquakes and volcanic outbursts in Central and South America continue to occur with unusual frequency. Within the last six months the disturbances of this nature along the chain of the Andes have been remarkable. Last winter there were many earthquake shocks in Central America, and during one of them a small island sank out of sight. About the same time news came that Lake Titicaca was drying up in a surprising and alarming manner. Other earthquake shocks followed, destroying villages and doing other damage. Next the volcano of Cosetepe, in Lake Nicaragua, suddenly burst into eruption for the first time since the discovery of America. Recently there has been a violent earthquake in Ecuador, and the great volcano of Cotopaxi has begun to hurl forth smoke, ashes, and melted rock. The latest disturbance of the kind we have heard of is a sharp shock of earthquake felt along the coast of Chili Saturday morning June 21.

According to a cable despatch from Egypt cholera is raging to an alarming extent in Damietta, where forty-two deaths, all supposed to have been caused by that disease, occurred on Monday. The history of cholera epidemics plainly shows the necessity of prompt and strict quarantine measures in order to check their advance. The manner in which the disease, when once started from its last bed in India, follows the lines of travel and traffic toward the West is very curious and interesting. With the introduction of steamships and railroads cholera epidemics began to spread with surprising rapidity, and they have several times crossed the Atlantic. The present outbreak in Damietta may be the effect of a local disease, and not of the true Asiatic cholera, and probability is lent to this view by the fact that it does not appear to have spread from Hindostan, as all great cholera epidemics have done. Still, it is better in all such cases to be forearmed, and a watchful eye should be kept upon every avenue by which the disease could be conveyed to this country. So far we have had the promise of an exceptionally healthy summer here.

An extraordinary charge against the Jews has been made in Hungary, and four men of that race have been placed on trial at Nyiregyhaza. A boy, the son of one of the prisoners, alleges that on April 1st his father and three other Jews enticed a Christian girl named Esther Solymosi into their synagogue, where they cut her throat, and caught the blood in a pail and used it to mix with the flour for their passover bread. The boy states that when he witnessed the crime he was outside the synagogue, but peeped in through the keyhole. The girl in question is certainly missing, but the body of a dead girl wearing the clothes of Esther Solymosi was taken from the river near the town in which she lived. It had been in the water so long that identification was almost impossible, and while some of her friends assert that it is Esther Solymosi, others who knew her deny it. The boy, who is the chief witness, is known to be under the influence of the Roman Catholics, who are savagely hostile to the Jews. The whole region has been affected by hydrophobia, and there is little probability that the men will have a fair trial. The correspondent of the London Times states his conviction that the boy witness is a maniac. Whether he be a maniac or only the dupe and instrument of the Papists, it is certain that his statements have excited the Hungarians to a pitch of frenzy little short of madness, and that the whole Jewish race in Hungary is in danger of massacre. The Hungarians of the locality are ignorant and superstitious, and they give ready credence to charges which would be scorned in a more enlightened community.

SELECTED MISCELLANY.

Lord Wolseley travelled in the Duke of Edinburgh's suite to the coronation of the Czar in his ordinary attire, and the astonishment of the Russians was intense when they learned that the quiet looking man in the gray ulster was the victor of Tel-el-Kebir. It seems to have been in the midst of so much splendor a capital advertisement. Like the Frenchman whose ribbonless buttonhole made him distinguished, Lord Wolseley's ulster marked him out for special observation where a blazing uniform would have been lost in a crowd of similar trappings.

The fifty-third annual conference of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints has been held in Salt Lake City. No other religious body in the land musters so many adherents under one roof as at these gatherings. For weeks beforehand the whole Territory is astir. The railroads offer one-fourth fare, and run extra trains. Though the conference is the centre of attraction, business and pleasure mingle strangely with religion. The streets and stores are crowded, the theatres, too, are thronged, nor are the saloons forsaken. Of the adults, the bulk are foreign born, and in features and utterance are evidently English and Scandinavian. An unfriendly observer declares that their faces are without expression. "All signs are lacking of brain power. They have had long and dire training in obedience, and no longer care, or are able, to act for themselves in matters high or low." The sessions are held in the Tabernacle, in which 10,000 persons find sittings.

The persecutions of Jews in various places is awakening a new interest in Palestine. Many refugees have sought a home in that land, and receiving no sufficient help from brethren of their own faith, have looked in other directions. The agents of the London Jews' Society have found both their work and their influence greatly increased. A proposal to found Jewish colonies under Christian direction is now being discussed. There are at the present time 20,000 Jews in Jerusalem. One single fact may indicate the nature of the changes in progress. In 1853 there were in Jaffa only seventy orange groves; there are now 370; and the new developments of industry are elsewhere encouraging. — Christian Commonwealth.

That the time of Christ's crucifixion may be approximately demonstrated by astronomical calculation, after paying due regard to the historical data which we possess, is asserted by Judge Joseph P. Bradly of the supreme Court of the United States. The cardinal conditions required are, first that the time must be brought within the Procuratorship of Pontius Pilate; secondly, it must be after the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius, and after the 30th year of Christ's age; thirdly, it must occur on the 15th of the Jewish month Nisan (or Abib), and on the sixth day of the week, or Friday. After a close and extended calculation, his Honor reaches this conclusion: "There were only three years from A. D. 27 to A. D. 35 inclusive, in which the 1st of Nisan, happened on Friday, and these were A. D. 27, 30, and 33, the last of which is very doubtful. But the crucifixion could not have happened before A. D. 28, and probably not later than A. D. 31. Therefore, the year 30 is the only one which satisfies all the conditions of the problem. It does satisfy them because it gives opportunity for Jesus to teach publicly for about three years and to attend three Passovers during his ministry; or four, according as it commenced before or after April 3, A. D. 27. Now since in A. D. 30 the 1st of Nisan fell on Friday, the 24th of March, the 15th fell on Friday, the 7th of April, which was the day of the crucifixion."

Conference Report.

The Third Quarterly Conference of the Second District of Arkansas, met with the Church of God at Green Briar, on Friday night before the 3d Sunday in June, with President McCarty in the chair.

The following churches were represented: Damascus, Hope, Liberty, Pinnacle Springs, Green Briar, Garland Springs, Cypress, Antioch, Bardonville, Good Hope, and California. The above churches represent a membership of about 400. The reports from churches, on the whole, was good. Reports of ministers showed that the foundation has been laid during the present quarter, throughout the district.

Preaching brethren present, S. R. Etheridge, W. J. Sowell, G. W. Crosby, J. D. Martin, W. H. McCarty, T. J. Dowel, W. T. Roberts, W. H. Porter, C. C. Brown, J. J. Smith, W. W. Corlin, I. D. Bobbins, R. B. Etheridge.

The following resolution was passed:

WHEREAS The report reaches us of the death of our beloved Brother, W. Gray, a faithful member of the church at Pinnacle Springs, therefore be it

Resolved That we tender our heartfelt sympathy to the family and friends of our beloved brother, and while we all feel the sad loss by his removal, we sorrow not as those without hope, but finally expect to meet him again beneath the cloudless skies of the Paradise of God, where fainting and failing, and sinning and dying are felt and feared no more.

It was decided to change the time of the Annual Meeting from Aug. 10, to Sept. 13. All business being finished the Conference adjourned Saturday evening, at five o'clock, to meet in Annual Conference, on Thursday night before the 3d Sunday in September, with Palarm Church, six miles east of Conway, Faulkner Co.

To the Brethren Scattered Abroad,

"Come over and help us."

CHICAGO, Ill.

Whereas this mighty, wicked city which putteth to shame Sodom and Gomorrah is lying in the darkness of the evil one, and the light of God's truth is so dimly shining, therefore it is deemed expedient to make an effort to scatter a few rays of gospel light "that a people for his name may be taken out" in order that the Bride may make herself ready I would herein appeal to the brethren for aid to establish and support a "Blessed Hope Mission" for preaching and distribution of tracts and papers. I am here in the city and earnestly desire to work for Jesus. I find a very few who are willing to connect themselves with mission work; that few, like myself, are poor, but willing to work in every opportunity and place. Now dear ones can you help in this mission work. will you invest in the Lord's five-twenties, have you one, two, five, ten or more dollars or less, that you can freely, cheerfully and prayerfully give to the work? When the day of making up the special treasure shall come, will not the Master say, "Come ye blessed of my Father?" Remember that bread scattered upon the water will return to you again.

Our plan is to procure a place for preaching and to engage all the talent we can command for teaching, Bible reading, distribution of tracts, sending papers, etc., teaching the things concerning the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus the Christ, thus making ready a people for the Lord. Reports of progress will from time to time be published; also reports of finance, showing how the money has been expended. Let any, therefore, who feel disposed to aid, correspond with C. C. Ramsey, 259 Randolph St., Chicago, Ill., or C. H. Jones, 230 La Salle St. Let us hear from you at once.

Yours in hope,
C. C. RAMSEY.

To the Friends of "The Restitution."

The cost of publishing THE RESTITUTION for the year just closed exceeded the receipts over $360. To repay this deficiency and secure means to publish the paper another year, we must raise, outside the regular subscription, at least $500. To secure that amount, the Board of Directors have requested me to appeal to each subscriber to contribute at least one dollar extra. This is not asked as a donation, but brethren are requested to send names of persons to whom they wish the paper sent, with their contributions and the paper will be sent to such persons in payment for the amounts sent by each.

There are a large number of brethren and sisters in different localities who are unable to pay for the paper, and who would be very glad of the privilege of reading it. These are known to Brother Chaplin, the Editor. I would suggest that brethren who have no one to whom they specially desire to send the paper, send their contributions to THE RESTITUTION office with a request that the paper be sent to some worthy Christian who will appreciate it, but who is unable to pay for it. In this way brethren will be able to gladden the hearts of many poor but honest good Christians, and at the same time help to furnish the means to keep the paper going.

The fund will be known as "Free Will Offerings." Let each reader of THE RESTITUTION make a small sacrifice, and contribute at least one dollar, always remembering that the many persons to whom the paper will be thus sent will thank and bless you, and your Heavenly Father will reward you.

R. S. DAVIGGINS, President.

ATHEISM AND THEISM.

—BY JOHN G. WILSON.—

Mr. Wilson is the Editor of The Prophetic Times and Watchtower, and is well known as a clear, strong writer. This book contains about 240 pages, is neatly and strongly bound in cloth, clearly printed, and will be sent postpaid, for $1.00. Send to this office for it.

When Shall These Things Be?

—BY HENRY BOWMAN.—

A treatise on the Divine Times and Seasons, showing also the symbolical relationship existing between the Great Pyramid of Ghizeh, and that on the Great Seal of the United States, which not only gives the plan, but also the duration and time for the overthrow of "Man's Age" or democracy, and opening from the Divine word that this last age (democracy) forms the last or latter days, so often alluded to in the Scriptures. 40 pages, paper cover, price 25c. Send to this office for it

A LETTER to a FRIEND.

—BY MRS. C. C. WOODRUFF.—

This Letter treats upon the subjects of The Nature of Man, the Promises of God, the Reign of Christ, the Destiny of the Wicked, the Restoration of Israel, etc. A new edition of this little work has been printed. It is too well known to need commendation here. 32 pages, price 10c., 3 copies 25c., 13 copies $1.

The Old Homestead.

Ah, here it is, the dear old place,
Unchanged through all these years.
How like some sweet, familiar face
My childhood's home appears!
The grand old trees behind the door
Still spread their branches wide:
The river wanders, as of yore,
With sweetly running tide;
The distant hills look green and gray,
The flowers are blooming wild;
And everything looks glad, today,
As when I was a child.

Regardless how the years have flown,
Half wondering I stand;
I watch no fond, endearing tone,
I clasp no friendly hand:
I think my mother's smile to meet,
I list my father's call,
I pause to greet my brother's feet
Come bounding through the hall;
But silence all around me reigns,
A chill creeps through my heart:
No trace of those I love remains,
And tears—unbidden—start.

What though the sunbeams fall no fair,
What though the budding flowers
Still shed their fragrance on the air
Within life's golden hours:
The loving ones that clustered here
These walls may not restore;
Voices that filled my youthful ear
Will greet my soul no more
Until yet I quit the dear old place
With love and blessings fraught,
As when to riches or old fame
Ambition will be brought.

Duties of Daily Life.

Life is not entirely made up of great evils or heavy trials; but the perpetual recurrence of petty evils and small trials is the ordinary and appointed exercise of the Christian graces. To bear with the failings of those about us — with their infirmities, their bad judgment, their ill breeding, their perverse tempers—to endure neglect when we feel we deserve attention, and ingratitude where we expected thanks; to bear with the company of disagreeable people whom Providence has placed in our way and whom he has provided on purpose for the trial of our virtue, these are the best exercises of patience and self denial and the better because not chosen by ourselves. To bear with vexation in business, with disappointment in our expectations, with interruptions of our retirement, with folly, intrusive disturbance—in short, with whatever opposes our will or contradicts our humor—this habitual acquiescence appears to be more of the essence of self denial than any little rigors or afflictions of our own imposing. These constant inevitable, but inferior evils properly improved, furnish a good moral discipline, and might, in the days of ignorance, have superceded pilgrimage and penance. — Hannah More.

If You Please.

When the Duke of Wellington was sick, the last thing he took was a little tea. On his servant's handing it to him on a saucer and asking him if he would have it, the Duke replied, "Yes, if you please." These were his last words. How much kindness and courtesy is expressed by them! He who had commanded the great armies in Europe, and had long used the throne of authority, did not despise or overlook the small courtesies of life. Ah, how many boys do! What a rude tone of command they often use to their little brothers and sisters, and sometimes to their mothers! This is ill bred and unchristian, and shows a coarse nature and a hard heart. In all your home talk remember "if you please." Among your playmates don't forget "if you please." To all who wait upon you and serve you, believe that "if you please" will make you better served than all the cross or ordering words in the whole dictionary. Don't forget three little words—"if you please." Life is made up not of great sacrifices or duties, but of little things, of which smiles and kindness and small obligations, given habitually, are what win and preserve the heart and secure the comfort.—Sir Humphrey Davy.

"At Hand."

More than eighteen hundred years ago, John, the forerunner of our divine Lord, said, "The kingdom of heaven is at hand." Christ, our exalted King and Life-giver, made the same announcement, saying, "Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand;" and he sent forth his apostles to utter the same proclamation.

Paul, the apostle to the Gentile world, said to the church in his day, "Let your moderation be known unto all men; the Lord is at hand." Phil. iv. 5. "The night is far spent; the day is at hand." Rom. xiii. 12. The apostle Peter said, "The end of all things is at hand; be ye therefore sober, and watch unto prayer." To the beloved John on the Isle of Patmos, it was said, "Seal not the sayings of the prophecy of this book; for the time is at hand."

This expression, "at hand," seems to cover the entire gospel dispensation, but it is not without definite signification. By tracing down the symbolic image described in the second chapter of Daniel, and the prophetic vision recorded in the seventh chapter we obtain five great, universal kingdoms delineated; four of which are earthly, beastly, and transient in their character, the fifth being heavenly, divine, and eternal. These great kingdoms are,—1. Babylon; 2. Medo-Persia; 3. Grœcia; 4. Rome.

Babylon being the first of these great kingdoms, the next one, or the one "at hand," would be Medo-Persia, which accordingly supplanted Babylon, as we read in the sixth chapter of Daniel. When the Persian kingdom had arisen, the next kingdom "at hand" was Grœcia under Alexander, before whose power Medo-Persia fell. When Grœcia had acquired dominion, the next kingdom "at hand" was Rome, and when Rome swayed its sceptre over the world, then it was said, "The kingdom of heaven is at hand"—the next kingdom, destined to fill the place of the Roman government, which, though divided and shattered, still retains its hold upon the world, is the everlasting kingdom of God.

It was at this time, when the Roman empire was in all its glory, that the voice was heard crying in the wilderness, "Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." This was a warning to men that they should yield their allegiance to God, and turn from their sins and be subject to his rule. The Pharisees rejected the counsel of God against themselves. A Roman ruler beheaded the herald of God's kingdom; then Christ himself took up the message, and sent his disciples to proclaim it to the Jewish nation. They rejected it, and said, "We will not have this man to reign over us;" "away with him; crucify him."

When the disciples gathered around the Savior on the slope of Olivet, and looked off upon that city whose overthrow he had predicted, they said, "Tell us, when shall these things be? and what shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world?" In answer to their request, he gave them a connected chain of events reaching through this dispensation, and concluded by saying, "Behold the fig tree and all the trees; when they now shoot forth, ye see and know of your own selves that summer is now nigh at hand. So likewise ye, when ye see these things come to pass, know ye that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand." And he also gave them one unmistakable token by which they might discern the approach of that kingdom. "This gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world, for a witness unto all nations; and then shall the end come." This "gospel of the Kingdom" is evidently not the kingdom, but simply the good news, or the proclamation of that kingdom to come. The church is not the kingdom of God. It is the "little flock" to whom it is the Father's good pleasure to give the kingdom in due time. The people of God are the loyal subjects of Christ, amid a host of foes. They have received the kingdom of heaven as little children; and though their King is absent, and the kingdom is not yet established, they are loyal and true to him; and it is their business, in his absence to proclaim the good news of the kingdom to all the world, form witness unto all nations, that they may hear, believe, obey, and be saved. This is the work that is to be done today. The last commandment of our Lord before he ascended to heaven was, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature." The last prediction which he uttered was, "Ye shall be witnesses unto me, both in Jerusalem, and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost parts of the earth."

This command yet waits for its fulfilment; this prediction yet waits for its accomplishment. When it is accomplished, "then shall the end come." Until it is accomplished, the Lord is not slack concerning his promise, as some men count slackness, but is long-suffering, and not willing that any should perish. He waits in mercy that he may save lost men. And while we wait the accomplishment of his promises,

"And while the tardy scale that yet detains
The Lion, Judah, from his destined reign," let us go forth in the strength of God, to do the work which he has appointed, bearing precious seed, and scattering light and truth to earth's remotest bounds.—H. L. Hastings, in Christian.

THE TABERNACLE OF GOD.

By request I pen a few lines on the tabernacle of God. The first thought we would present on this subject is found in Psa. xxvii. 5, "For in the time of trouble he shall hide me in his pavilion, in the secret of his tabernacle shall he hide me." Isaiah is very explicit as to the time when the saints are to be hid away from the time of trouble which is to come upon all the nations of earth, for he says, "Thy dead men shall live.... Awake and sing ye that sleep in dust, for thy dew is as the dew of herbs and the earth shall cast out her dead." The next verse says, "Come my people enter thou into thy chambers.... hide thyself as it were for a little moment, until the indignation be overpast; for behold the Lord cometh out of his place (of intercession) to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity." The time then is laid at or directly after the resurrection, see Isaiah xxvi. 19. Here we have two facts stated, one is that the saints immediately after the resurrection are hid away as David in the secret of his tabernacle; the other is, while there the time of trouble Daniel speaks of in xii. 1.

Again Paul says, "The Lord himself shall descend with a shout, with the voice of the archangel and with the trump of God, and the dead in Christ shall rise first; then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air." 1 Thes. iv. 16. This is undoubtedly the time that David and Isaiah refer to in the Scriptures before us.

We come now to John xiv. 2, 3. Jesus says, "In my Father's house (tabernacle or dwelling place) are many mansions (apartments), if it were not so I would have told you; I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you I will come again and receive you unto myself." Jesus here says nothing about the Father's house or tabernacle coming down; he left that for John the revelator to talk about. Again Paul refers to the same grand building in 2 Cor. v. 1, he says, "We know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle (this mortal, earthly state) were dissolved we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens," but not to remain there, for John saw it coming down; Abraham, too, had his eye fixed on the eternal city, with Isaac and Jacob and all the old patriarchs and prophets, see Heb. xi. 10–16.

"Wherefore God is not ashamed to be called their God for he hath prepared for them a city." Thus far we hear nothing of its coming down only the fact that there is such a place and its present location, also that the saints enter it immediately after the resurrection. The information concerning its descent we get from John the revelator. He first speaks of it in Rev. iii. 12, and again in xxi. 2, he says, "I, John, saw the holy city, new Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven, and I heard a great voice out of heaven, saying, Behold the tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell with them and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be with them and be their God." Jesus refers to this time in John xiv. 23, where he says, "If a man love me he will keep my words and my Father will love him and we will come and make our abode with him." But before its descent to the earth the saints are caught away into their secret chambers, hid away as David declares "in the secret of his tabernacle," away from the earth while judgment is executed upon the nations of earth. Again in this tabernacle is where the marriage of the Lamb takes place or is celebrated.

Now if we turn to Rev. xix. 1, John declares, "He heard a great voice of much people in heaven (away from earth where no one can molest) saying, Alleluia, salvation, and glory, and honor, and power be unto the Lord our God, and again they said Alleluia. And I heard as it were the voice of mighty thunderings saying Alleluia." And why all this shouting while the very atmosphere vibrates from pole to pole and old earth trembles to its very centre. Ah, "the marriage of the Lamb has come and his wife (the saints) hath made herself ready;" yes she has on her garments of righteousness and as David says, she is decked with wrought gold and needle work. All this transpires away from the turmoils of earth, in the tabernacle of God, yea in the city of gold, the saints eternal home; O glorious day, soon may it come.

When John saw it, it was descending to the earth, the bride safely housed within its golden mansions in all the glory of the eternal God. But where shall it be located. Please go with me to Zech. xiv. 10; he says "all the land shall be turned as a plain from Geba to Rimon south of Jerusalem and it shall be lifted up." The prophet here does not say how high but by turning to Micah iv. 1 he says, "In the last days it shall come to pass that the mountain of the house of the Lord shall be established in the top of the mountains and it shall be exalted above the hills." Hence overshadowing all the surrounding country; here we locate the tabernacle of God, the golden city that no one is to enter but they whose names are written in the Lamb's book of life. Here [illegible] xi. 7; Heb. viii. 5, admonished of God; Heb. xii. 25, speaking as an oracle. Peter evidently uses the word Christian as though of divine sanction. 1 Peter iv. 16. I think my warrant, if not absolutely positive, is very weighty in favor of the word being derived from a Divine source, and not rather from "the enemy," and as such would be a fatal blow at sectarian names amongst Christians.

Yours in love and faith.

"THEISTIC EVOLUTION."

Is there such a thing as theistic evolution? Does evolution per se admit of the existence of or leave any place for an Omnipotent, Omniscient, Eternal God, the maker and upholder of all things? Certain eminent divines who have espoused the evolution faith claim that it does, and that the evolution theory is but a special revelation of the divine method of creation. They also claim that its teachings do not conflict with the fundamental doctrines of the Christian religion. But what are the facts!

Evolution teaches that in matter alone are to be found all the causes that have given existence to all the material forms of the Universe, and that matter is eternal. It teaches that from the remote, eternal molecular atoms and their self-evolving force, have sprung, unaided by any higher intelligence, not only the diversified material forms both organic and inorganic, but even all the varieties of vegetable and animal life, including instinct, reason and intelligence. A fundamental feature of its teaching is that in Nature alone — that is in the materials that existand their self-instituted laws of motion and "survival of the fittest," we find a complete explanation of all the phenomena of the universe, thereby completely ignoring the supernatural. Hence, according to the fundamental principles of evolution as taught by its great disciples, Spencer, Helmholtz, Huxley, and Darwin, if the God of the Bible does exist there is no use for him whatever, and no part of creation with which man is or possibly can become acquainted, is of his designing or workmanship. The ten thousand manifestations of design which greet the intelligent eye at every turn in life and in all organic forms, are but the result of happy accidents. Intelligence had nothing whatever to do with constructing the eye, the ear or any other organ of the body, except only in so far as intelligence inheres in matter itself, and has so inhered in it eternally. That I do not overstate or misrepresent the teachings of evolutionists, any one can satisfy himself by examining their standard works.

Now, this is no new doctrine. It is as old as the days of Democritus. Four hundred years before Christ he promulgated this theory; and instead of modern evolutionists advancing anything new, they are, in fact, only elaborating an old atheistic dogma that was promulgated more than twenty-two hundred years ago. Hence, in this particular, they have not evoluted very much. But the surprise is that eminent divines who claim to be orthodox, will boldly claim that a teaching which absolutely leaves no place in the range of rational or material existence for the God "who upholdeth all things by the word of his power," who numbereth the hairs of our heads, and without whom not even a sparrow falls to the ground, should subscribe to that teaching as being in harmony with the fundamental doctrines of the Bible, and presume to persuade intelligent men into accepting such a belief.

The Bible which they claim to believe, and of which they claim to be divinely commissioned expounders, declares that "God created man in his own image," that he endued him with reason and intelligence, and that on account of his violating his Creator's laws—laws whose requirements were founded in the essentials of man's well-being — he deteriorated into a lower condition than that in which his Creator originally placed him; and that the grace and gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ is the only agency capable of effectually restoring him to his primal intellectual and moral excellency. But evolution teaches that man had his physical, mental and moral origin all in the monaron — that by certain accidental combinations of molecules of matter the moneron came into being; and that from it, by means of millions upon millions of differentiations and evolutions which it required millions upon millions of ages to accomplish, higher and still higher forms of animal life were evolved, a gradual process of improvement going on all the while, until in the evoluted brain of the higher forms of life a gleam of reason was evolved, which continues to brighten through the infinite ages until it finally blossomed into judgment and intelligences; and hence the man of the present day exists. Evolution teaches distinctly, that through the operation of the inherent forces of matter alone, and by means of "development" and "the survival of the fittest," man, in his present state, has been gradually evolved from the very lowest forms of animal life.

We admit that the theory looks nice as an appendix to the nebular hypothesis; but the question for solution is, does it accord with the teachings of the Bible? does it accord with the facts of history? does it accord with the ascertained facts of science? As to the Bible, it requires but a small amount of scrutiny to reveal the fact that this theory is in direct antagonism with its plainest declarations; and that nothing short of a gross perversion of these declarations can possibly give them even a semblance of agreement with the evolution hypothesis. Evolution is essentially materialistic and atheistic; the Bible is directly the opposite of these.

As to the facts of history, do we find in them evidences of this ever-increasing development and improvement in man, except where he has been under the direct influences of the teachings of the Bible? What improvement physically, intellectually or morally have the Chinese made since the days of Confucius? In fact that nation has stood petrified as to improvement for the last three thousand years. Its progress has been nothing. Only since it has opened its ports to the Bible and to the commerce of Bible-reading nations, has it begun to make any improvement on the customs and manners of the days of its great prophet. What can be said of the intellectual and moral improvement of the Egyptians, the Syrians, the Babylonians, the Medes, the Persians, the Greeks and the Romans? All these nations had at one time attained to great intellectual eminence. This fact is well attested by the fragments of their literature and customs that have come down to us. But have they, according to the evolution hypothesis, gone right on, and by means of survival of the fittest, are they now, as they once were, in the very front rank of intellectual and moral excellence? Is it not strange that with such well authenticated evidences of the fallaciousness of the claims of evolution right before their eyes, intelligent divines will yield assent to its propositions?

From whence have come the nations that to-day constitute the brain-power of the world? From what people have sprung or have been "evolved" the superior morals of Christianity that are blessing and conquering the world? Not from those intellectual giants that once held the Hebrews as slaves. By reason of their receiving, and adhering to the teachings of the Bible, one of the fundamental tenets of which is the declaration that about six thousand years ago "God created man in his own image," there has sprung from the tribes of northern Europe who less than two thousand years ago existed in a low state of barbarism and savagery, the intellectual and moral men and woman who are to-day ruling and blessing the world. Without the moral restraints of the Bible, even intellectual Greece and Rome, instead of evolving into a higher life, deteriorated and died of their own moral rottenness. But, aided and restrained by the words of the Bible, the savages of northern Europe have in a few centuries, risen to the highest degree of modern, intellectual and moral culture. What a commentary these facts are on the pretensions of the evolution theory! And the attempts of certain progressive (?) divines to so explain away the emphatic declarations of the Book of books as to make them accord with the evolution theory is humiliating and disgusting in the extreme.

As to the pretentious claims of evolutionists that their theory is substantiated by science, and that it is scientific, it is simply not true. With all their research and with all their claims, they have utterly failed to produce any facts of science to substantiate their claim that man has existed on this earth more than six thousand years. Nor have they been able to produce facts that come within a thousand leagues of connecting man, by descent, with the lower order of animals. Even between him and the most intellectual (?) monkeys of modern times they must acknowledge that they have utterly failed to discover "the missing link." That "link," even with them, is the great desideratum of their theory, and that link they have not found. Until evolutionists unmistakably produce this link, divines should be slow to admit that they are lineal descendants of monkeys, although their illogical reasoning and inconsistent behavior might be taken as a strong proof that they are thus descended. Agassiz and Lyell, than whom there are no higher authorities respecting geologic remains, both assert that there were successive creations from the lower to the higher forms; but as emphatically assert that they were creations and not mere evolutions or differentiations. The claim that evolution is an established fact, and that theology must be so modified as to accord with it, is as false as it is pretentious. And as to so modifying theology as to make it accord with evolution, it is utterly impossible. The former is essentially theistic, the latter essentially atheistic. To indorse evolution is to abandon the theology of the Bible in every shape and form. No more can the Helmholtz-Spencer-Huxley-Darwin evolution of to-day be made to harmonize with the essential teachings of the Bible, or the theology of the Book of books be made to harmonize with evolution than the Apocryphal lake of fire can be made a safe place to store gunpowder.—Wilford's Microcosm.

BRIGHT PROSPECTS OF THE AGE TO COME.

Last month, Mr. H. M. Barnett, B. A., of Hopton, delivered a lecture in the Corn Hall, Diss, Norfolk, on "The Glories of Christ's Coming Kingdom." He pointed out the peculiarities of the present age, showing that the Bible declares that the devil is the god of this world; but he will only continue to be so until the Second Advent, when Christ will take to himself his great power and reign triumphantly. He showed that during the present age the kingdom is just the reverse of what it will be during the millennium. The present age is spoken of as being connected with the Dragon beast (political Rome), false prophets, and a false confessionalism; but the future will be signalized by God the Father reigning over all, the Son acting as the long-promised Messiah, a wondrous manifestation of the Holy Ghost, who will be present in a manner which has never yet been known, and the earth will be filled with the knowledge and glory of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea. The curse will be removed from the earth, and there will be a marvellous change of things on this globe, which will bask in the sunlight of the glorious favor of God in Christ. The lecturer quoted several passages of Old Testament Scripture to show that in the age to come the earth will be made fruitful, yielding two crops a year; barren spots will be made fertile, from a handful of corn there will be abundant harvest; so that everything lost under the first Adam will be restored and made prosperous under the last Adam, and all these things will be visible on the face of this globe for the space of 1000 years, during which time Satan will be held captive. The lecturer passed on to notice that in the coming age maritime commerce will flourish, and trade will be prosperous, education will abound, and there will be a blessed increase of knowledge and understanding of God as regards his words and works, and how he might best be honored and glorified. International relationships will also be in a healthful condition, for the saints will be constituted the rulers of the world, and Christ, who is the "desire of all nations," and, knowing the wants of all will be able to supply them. He said that in all ages men have been striving for righteous rule, and the whole creation has been groaning for it, but this has not yet been achieved, neither will it be until the manifestation of the sons of God. The lecturer further referred to the prophecies concerning the future of the kingdoms of Egypt, Assyria, and Israel, contrasting their future glory with their present humiliating condition, and pointing out the prospects for them in the age to come. He afterwards alluded to the animal creation, showing that the beasts were affected by the fall; and as Adam single-handed had all the beasts in his power and gave them names, so the redeeming work of Christ will have its effect upon them, and they will no longer be savage, fierce, and terrible, but the lion will lie down with the lamb, and all the other prophecies concerning them will be fulfilled. He proceeded to state that in every other department there will be blessing. The church will be beautiful, and the worship splendid; a religiousness, sacredness and holiness will be connected with all the affairs of the earth. The words "Holiness to the Lord," will even be inscribed upon the bells of the horses, secular matters will be consecrated and made sacred, and everything be placed under Christ's Divine rule, which will be a perfectly righteous rule, equitable, just and considerate, and all wrongs will be redressed. After referring to other events which will mark the blessedness of the age to come, the lecturer exhorted the audience to rejoice in the prospects before them, and, in concluding, made an earnest appeal to the unconverted to seek to have a personal interest in Christ, and so be able to share in the bright realities in the age when Christ will come again to be glorified with his saints.—Prophetic News and Israel's Watchman.

FOR SOMEBODY'S SAKE.

As over life's mountains and vales
Our pilgrimage journey we take,
We add to our trouble and care,
And heavier burdens we bare
For somebody's sake.

Though deeply we're wounded by grief,
Though the heart day continue to ache,
Our sorrows we keep out of sight,
And our faces are smiling and bright
For somebody's sake.

We labor and toil all the day,
And many a sacrifice make,
And at night may be weary and worn
With the trials we've cheerfully borne
For somebody's sake.

What wonderful tasks we achieve!
What wonderful deeds undertake!
And how sweet is the victory won,
When all we've accomplished was done
For somebody's sake.

The struggle that's only for self,
No joy among angels may wake,
But the brightest of crowns will be given
To those who have suffered and striven
For somebody's sake.

"NEW JERUSALEM," May 28, 1883.

Editor Restitution:

Another beautiful Monday morning has come, and we will write a little for the Wednesday past, as, I suppose you know, we only have the privilege of mail out once a week. Sometimes we receive two or three mails per week; nothing regular about the mail service now, but hope for improvements soon.

Yes, another fine morning, and in fact we have no other kind. I don't think there is any country like it under the sun in this respect, weather fine continually, the days now are warm, but I have seen warmer in America; of course the hottest weather has not yet come. However the nights make up for the heat of the day, they are delightfully cool, we feel very comfortable under the same amount of bed clothing that would be required in the western states.

Now must tell you of a jaunt we took yesterday in company with Mrs. Davis, under the guidance of a Mr. Taylor, an American Jew, who returned here several years since. Leaving his place about the centre of the city, he led us south perhaps two blocks, to the first place of interest, being nothing less than the house built and occupied by the first Empress Helena. This is built of stone of diverse colors, and instead of cement or morter, sheet lead, about ¼ of an inch thick, is used. I don't know of another of like construction. There is now only one story and one half of this building above ground, it is claimed that there is about 40 ft. beneath the present grade; just think of going down here to the second and third cities, who knows what may be unearthed here when this land falls into the hands of a people who will take the trouble to investigate. But then this is all plain enough to my mind, God has wanted these things to remain just so, and who can prevent its being otherwise? From here we pass on south, near the ancient wall to the temple grounds, now called the "wailing place." This rout takes us between Mt. Moriah and Mt. Zion. For the benefit of some who may not know, will say these "points" of interest are inside the city walls. So through this part of the city, which is now in ruins, we pass out at, what in Hebrew is called the "Rubbish Gate," and look almost straight down into Jehoshaphat, and Kedron, on the opposite side of this same valley is the village of Siloam, and it is the pool by this name we are steering for; but then we have a mountain to descend, several hundred feet to the bed of Kedron, which is now the path, as there is no water in it at this season of the year. This village is "stuck in" against the side of the mountain, some of the houses are worked out of the solid rock, and inhabited by the natives, or Arabs, who bear a very bad name,—said to be robbers; while back of this village, and on top of the mountain, is where Solomon had his harem. Now we are in the "brook," and on either side are gardens owned by the people of the villages, there is raised a little of everything in way of vegetables, here too are many fig trees; if anybody thinks "it—the desert—is not blooming like the rose," let them look down into this part of Jehoshaphat.

Now we have reached the pool of Siloam. Truly, faith and works went together, when the blind man traversed the rugged road from the city to this place. And washed, (did what he was commanded), and came seeing. Jno. ix. 7. This is the most wonderful place to me about Jerusalem. Here in this little stream of water is the ebb and flow of the sea, it is clear as a crystal, a little brackish, no man knows where it starts from, or what causes the ebb and flow; it is only on the surface about 6 rods, (then allowed to pass from sight, from this to Dead Sea), and this is confined to about 3 feet width by stone wall-sides, and bottom. It comes from the direction of Mt. Moriah, where the temple stood. So here long, long ago, Abraham watered his cattle, and today there is a little bunch of cattle drinking at the same place, no doubt, and a native woman is pounding her clothes on the rocks in the water, and one is here with a stone jar for water. The sights no doubt are about the same as of old, save there was no Americans then, looking on. On our way here from the city, we encountered several black worms of about four inches in length; these, we are told, eat the flesh from the dead in the cemeteries. This gives me a better idea of our Lord's words in Mark ix. 44. I see in them also God's wisdom, for here it is not practicable to dig the graves deep, they are very shallow indeed, because of the stone. They are covered usually with a large, flat stone, dressed the right size to cover the grave. Then how much better in this warm climate, under these circumstances, to have something that will soon consume the flesh of the dead. (Coffins are not used among the Jews). Now we return on the east side of the brook to "King's dale," and turn to 2 Sam. xviii. 18. "Now Absalom in his lifetime had taken and reared up for himself a pillar, which is in the king's dale: for he said, I have no son to keep my name in remembrance: and he called the pillar after his own name: and it is called unto this day, Absalom's place." The base of this structure is about 20 ft. square, cut out of solid rock where it stands, one room inside of this, is about 10 ft. square, with a place on one side for entrance, while each of the other sides has a hole, or window, large enough for a man to pass through, head first. On top of this is built a tower, perhaps 40 ft. high, this is of stone, different sizes, but beautifully dressed on the outside, while they are made to almost meet inside, and are so arranged that an ordinary sized man, if a fair climber, can go nearly to the top; this, mind you, inside. I accomplished this feat, and wrote the word "Restitution" near the top, while Mrs. Davis was below repeating "good," and perhaps in her merriment she might have been heard to say. "Tibe, Tibe," which is Arabic for "good."

But what a lesson is here to be learned, both for the young, as well as those who are striving for the mastery in the Christian warfare. Because of his disobedience, he brought to himself a speedy, and terrible death; anguish, shame, and almost a broken heart to his father, during his wild career. His inordinate desire to be remembered when gone, led him to cause the erection of this monument, or pillar. That terrible design to exalt self, unrestrained, finally got beyond his control. Look at the end of this man, my Christian friend; keep it in mind, for now I will tell you how much is thought of this pile of stone, "Exaltation." Arabs think they would be committing a very great sin, should they pass this, without throwing a stone through one of these holes; and they actually hate him, and say he was a very disobedient son, of course, they don't stop to think whether they are as bad as he was. So this gives the Jews something to do, for once a year they come and clear away the rubbish, for in that time, we are told, this room is pretty well filled up. Even the heathen throw stones at self-aggrandizement. May God help all of his, to keep free from this terrible sin; it must down, or we perish.

Now we leave here, for it is 4 p. m. and we must pass "the garden," cross Kedron, up the hill, enter St. Stephen's gate, pass over the ground where he was stoned, (so says tradition) stop a moment at our friend's house for a cool drink, and off again out this time at the Damascus gate, and away north to the tomb of Simeon the Just; for here today is the annual gathering time for the Jews, to this place to pray. On this day the tomb is open, and those who desire can enter. All there is to be seen is two rooms in the side of a solid rock, and worked out several feet below the surface; in here I found many Jews, with lights burning all round, (for it is very dark without) with their Hebrew books open, reading, and praying. Poor souls, I have seen no such devotion among any people. Their faith which has endured all these hundreds of years, without one ray of light, through such persecution as no other people has ever seen, is to me a living miracle. Compare their faith in God's promises, concerning the time in which we are living, to that of the so-called Christian world.

Here we see them coming from all parts of the world, leaving everything, even to houses, and lands, allowing nothing to stand in the way, because they understand that the Great I Am, is saying to them, — "The time has come, return, come, come!" Oh yes, this is a great and glorious reality, they are coming. We can now figure out representatives of five tribes, and I believe when God gets ready to open our eyes, we will find other tribes a great deal nearer to Jerusalem, than those were who have come. Ask those who have come from the far countries, from north, south, east and west the same question, why have you made this great journey, and the same answer is given: "The Messiah soon comes. We soon get our own land back again. God promised it to our fathers, and his word is good."

Now see the other side of this picture. Look at the so-called church, the multitudes of professed followers of Christ, who claim to believe in the teaching of the apostles. Instead of following our Savior's instructions, to search the Scriptures, (that were then written) for in them, etc., this they fail to do, and set up the plea that the New Testament is sufficient, and in such talk show plainly that they don't even search the New, to see what it teaches, for if they did, then they would see wherein the lie is thrown into the Master's teeth.

But what is the Church of America doing today? what part, in this, one of the greatest events of the world's history, are they taking? Not one soul is there here, in this the city of the Great King, in this time of his preparing the world for the return of his Son. No, not one representative of an American conference. This being the case, it is very evident that the Lord is looking elsewhere for men and money, men not trained up in some certain Theological institution. No, no, that kind God can not use; their aura support and error is far better to such than truth, if it is to be had by walking out in faith, believing that God is able to provide for his servants, no matter where he may lead them.

I hope soon to see men of faith here on the battle ground, with the full armor on, for the adversary, the "dragon," is already here for action, and claims to be able at any time to bring "fire down from heaven in the sight of men." As to the money it appears to me that the devil is controlling the most of it, for when the still small voice speaks to some of those friends of the cause in America, and would lead them to send means for the support of these creatures, whom he has so wonderfully brought to this place, he steps in with some kind of argument to prevent. It may be this, and I think likely he has used the same talk on many, he will say, what! are you so foolish as to send this money away there, when there are so many things you need yourself: a new bonnet, or dress, or perhaps a new hat, or fresh box of cigars; however, if this fails him, he will say then by all means, if you do send it, be sure to get something in return.

However I must return to this people, and this gathering, what we in America might call a pic-nic. For between this tomb and another rise of ground, twenty rods to the southwest, lays a strip of ground quite level and full of olive trees; these afford a nice shade, and this kind of ground here is called a garden. Here today are many booths, where refreshments can be had. The Arabs, too, come out to supply those who want pipes, and coffee. It is truly an odd sight, some running to and fro, some smoking, drinking coffee or wine, and inside, on top of, and around the tomb, many are praying, and all seem to be enjoying themselves. It is supposed that from 20 to 30 thousand people have visited this place today, (Sunday).

Now on the opposite side from the tomb, another wonderful place of interest is to be seen. Simeon's synagogue. This is a room about 30 by 40 ft. dug out of the solid rock, like the tombs, only larger, with open front. This ceiling is about 20 ft. high, and in this are two natural pillars left, an equal distance from each end. It is truly wonderful to behold, and to think that in the long, long ago, this place was used for the worship of the living God, and now after the worshipers, being scattered for so long a time, into all countries, they are again permitted to return, and worship their living God; for their living God has not died. If I could only describe this scene to the reader as I see it, and have them enter into my feelings toward this people; how glad I should be, but I can't, words fail me. But I look upon this multitude of God's chosen people, and think of what they have had to endure, jostle about from pillar to post, persecuted, and tormented beyond description. And now at God's call they return to this land. He, in his own good time, may open their eyes, to see that Christ was the true Messiah, yes, that Jesus, the seed of David, came, and will soon come again. But their troubles follow them, for here, under the guise of Christianity, they find an institution called the Mission, (?) under the auspices of the Church of England, and these Christians (?) meet these poor souls in their destitution, and say to them, here, dear friend, is 300, or perhaps 500 francs, take this, and give us your child to be brought up in our so-called Christianity. O! ye true Israel of America, will you hold on to your gold, and suffer this thing to continue, my blood boils within me, when I see the name of that Just One blasphemed. Do any doubt this? If so, I can send you twenty thousand signatures of Jews, to certify to the truth of my statement. How long! oh Lord, how long will it take thy people to awake to their duty?

I have one dear little son, and thank God, in his veins flows the blood of the Israel race. Much rather would I consign his little body to one of those stony resting places on the side of Olivet, there to be devoured by those dreadful worms, than to pass him into the hands of this hypocritical form of religion. I won't again call it Christianity. May all such institutions perish, for they are an offense in the nostrils of a God of mercy. See the principle, dear friends, give up your child and leave dead, or keep your child and starve. Take it home, let it sink down deep into your heart, if you are a parent, where are we living? what does all this denote? Truly this is no time for slumber, let us be up and doing, for the "night cometh when no man can work."

Now the question is, "who is on the Lord's side," who among you are willing to stand up and defend the truth in the face of, and in opposition to a world of error; and do this regardless of consequences. Reproaches are sure to come. Stones may be hurled at our heads. Some, doubtless, will be put to death. But how glorious to all such will be that resurrection.—But who, I say, with this picture before them, is willing to say, here Lord am I, a living sacrifice, please me upon the altar. The Lord is calling for Daniels, who are willing to sacrifice all, no reserve. May all such answer to the call of God, and make the move that he leadeth them to do. And, dear friends, how greatly are we favored if called, we can not afford to let worldly interests stand in the way.

P. H. WINTERSTEIN.

The Origin of Geometry and the Arabic Notation as Indicated by the Numerical Types of the Scriptures.

The object of this article is merely to suggest and outline an argument or a process of deductive reasoning which may lead up to a divinely revealed scale of measure and weight.

We assume therefore that such a scale has been revealed and that it was intended to subserve a purpose of the highest utility in manifold ways, and moreover, that some apprehension of this fact and its purpose is absolutely necessary to insure any intelligent understanding even of this natural cosmos in which we live, much more the new cosmos of which this is, in reality, but the type. In previous articles I have attempted to show, 1. What a cosmos was; 2. The relation of the old to the new; 3. To point out the cosmic arrangement of the parts in various ways by reasoning from a part to a whole or a whole to a part, according to the laws of time, number and rhythm, and 4. To draw some conclusions based upon this kind of reasoning. In the course of this reasoning and in drawing these conclusions, I have magnified the importance of the numerical types in the Scriptures and have tacitly assumed the reader to be acquainted with the elements at least of geometry and astronomy.

I now purpose to show that the science of geometry (and astronomy probably) is as old as the race and that the Arabic system of notation is its twin brother, and like so many other divinely revealed truths, that they were thus shadowed forth in type at the outset of man's career, and the great truths they teach more or less clearly appeared in all ages as men walked in obedience to and familiarized themselves with the teachings of God's Word. So far as astronomy is concerned, Dr. Seiss has made a good argument in his book, "The Gospel in the Stars," and I refer to this for the reason that if what he says of the antiquity of astronomy be true, a much stronger argument for the antiquity of geometry could be made in the same line of reasoning. For a knowledge of the elements of geometry must necessarily precede any knowledge of the elements even of astronomy. But I will not enter upon this line of argument at all in what I have to say.

Assuming that every civilized nation in any and every age, for the ordinary purposes and uses of every day life must necessarily have had some knowledge of the elementary principles of geometry and assuming the divine origin of these concepts, let us consider how these concepts would naturally find expression in symbols or characteristic delineations which should most concisely and conventionally denote or suggest their respective concepts. Geometry as well as common sense teaches us that the first step out of chaos, into cosmic order gives the straight line, and the Arabic number 1 gives us the simplest symbolic notation of the fact. The next simplest cosmic form which can be determined without a previous knowledge of other elements in the circle, a cosmic concept, the product of one curved line. The bisection of the circle into halves by the use of the straight line already obtained, gives us the simplest cosmic form attainable with the elements thus far in our possession, namely, one straight line and one cosmic curved line, and the simplest symbolic notation of this concept is the Arabic number 2. Let the reader analyze the character and see. The top and bottom of the figure 2 fairly represent segments of the alternate halves of the bisected circle and the line connecting the top and bottom correctly indicates the polar diameter or the bisecting line.

The next simplest cosmic form attainable with our elements is the circle divided into quarters by the use of two straight lines, and this cosmic form with all its manifold utility for daily use is most simply and appropriately denoted in symbol by the Arabic numeral 3, or as it was originally written ⅄, the right hand half of a twice bisected circle, the first bisection being from the top to the bottom with a segment of the diameter which bisects from left to right. The next simplest cosmic form possible with the elements at hand is the equilateral triangle obtained by connecting the two diameters in the upper left hand quarter of the circle, at their points of conjunction with the circle by a straight line or chord, and this cosmic use of three straight and one curved line is appropriately represented by an abbreviated cosmic symbol of the concept which is the Arabic numeral 4 in its original form ⅄, namely the equilateral triangle with one side prolonged.

The next simplest cosmic figure attainable with the use of the elements now at hand, is obtained by completing the equilateral triangle in the lower left hand quarter of the circle, which gives us a bisected equilateral triangle and the possibility of two right angles with all their manifold uses; and the simplest abbreviated symbol of this cosmic form of five lines possible is the Arabic numeral 5 in the oldest form in which it was written, namely a segment of a circle reversed or turned backward for the top of the five which would appropriately represent the upper left hand quarter, and for the bottom of the five the whole of the lower left-hand and right-hand segments, the upper and lower parts of the five connected by the two right-angled lines of a right-angled triangle, which are the radii of the two diameters, upper and right-hand.

The next simplest cosmic form that can be obtained in the use of the elements at hand, namely, five straight lines and a cosmic curved line is the preceding figure with another equilateral triangle completed in the right-hand quarter of it by drawing another chord; and the simplest and most appropriate characteristic symbol of what we have thus far obtained would be the Arabic numeral 6, giving as it does the three quarters of the circle in which the three triangles are inscribed together with the last formed triangle itself in type as in the symbolic 5.

The next simplest cosmic form that is attainable with six straight and one cosmic curved line is the preceding figure with the equilateral triangle completed in the remaining or upper right-hand quarter which gives the apparently revealed truths, that they were thus shadowed forth in type at the outset of man's career, and the great truths they teach more or less clearly appeared in all ages as men walked in obedience to and familiarized themselves with the teachings of God's Word. So far as astronomy is concerned, Dr. Seiss has made a good argument in his book, "The Gospel in the Stars," and I refer to this for the reason that if what he says of the antiquity of astronomy be true, a much stronger argument for the antiquity of geometry could be made in the same line of reasoning. The next simplest cosmic form that is attainable with six straight and one cosmic curved line is the preceding figure with the equilateral triangle completed in the remaining or upper right-hand quarter which gives the quadrilateral inscribed within the circle a cosmic figure of manifold use in its elementary principles, and advancing from left to right any side of this quadrilateral in conjunction with either of the two diameters, forms the symbolic Arabic numeral 7, which is therefore the most appropriate symbol to represent what has thus far been deduced.

The next simplest cosmic form attainable with the elements at hand is the preceding figure with a diagonal diameter bisecting the upper left-hand equilateral triangle and the lower right-hand equilateral triangle and giving two more points of the compass and the remaining two quarters of the quadrilateral unbisected together with their arcs take the form of the Arabic numeral 8 in outline and the identification of the figure is therefore most concisely and appropriately represented by this symbol 8.

The next simplest cosmic form attainable with our elements, namely, eight straight lines and a cosmic curved line is the preceding figure, with a diagonal diameter bisecting the lower left-hand equilateral triangle and the remaining upper right-hand equilateral triangle which gives us the remaining two points of the compass, and all the elementary principles of plane trigonometry or all the cosmic data for measuring plane surfaces, and no simpler nor more expressive symbol of this cosmic completion could be devised than the Arabic numeral 9, the circle portion of it being symbolic of some sort of cosmic completion and the straight line part of the numeral being symbolic of the fact that but one circle had thus far been completed, and also indicative of how it had been completed by the use of the straight line and the diagonal direction of this straight line. Other forms of course can be deduced with these nine elements but the reader will find by experiment that they are more complex. For instance, the inscribing of three equilateral triangles in a circle in such a way as to divide the circle into nine equal arcs, and since ten lines are required to complete the figure it would not come under the requirements of our first premise and would be a conjunctive figure.

The next simplest cosmic form attainable with the elements thus far deduced is the cosmic nine with another circle drawn at right angles to the plane of the first, of the same size as the first, and this of course, determined by the conjunction of the two circles at the poles of one of the diameters, and the first step toward spherical triconometry thus taken would be appropriately symbolized by the Arabic decimal 10 which would plainly indicate that the planes of the two circles were at right angles to each other; moreover that the left-hand one was complete for future reference, while the right-hand one is still to be developed in its conjunctive possibilities, one of which would be at 20 or the second conjunction, the pyramid within the sphere; but this line of reasoning I will not pursue farther as it divorces from the main purpose of this article, which was to show by simple, deductive reasoning the probable origin of geometry and the symbolic Arabic notation as its twin brother. Moreover, as the pyramid is a cosmic figure in the metric scale we would expect to see it appear very early in the development of man's apprehension of the cosmic relations of things or parts to a whole. And it is not to be wondered at therefore that science and religion should both look with such expectant inquiry and curiosity at the great pyramid of Egypt with its still unsolved mysteries as a "sign" or symbol of significant import and as perhaps holding within its grasp the key to this metric scale if not the scale itself.

A word further before I close, as to the sign or the typical import of this pyramid. The importance of the 1, 2, 3 numerical type could not, it seems to me, be more significantly set forth than by this awe-inspiring monument, a sign too so provocative to curious inquiry because of its mystery. There it stands, as it has stood for 4000 years or more with its four conjunctive equilateral triangles pointing (1, 2, 3 each) upward to the source of all knowledge and the solution of all mystery, each and all of these triangles resting upon a quadrilateral or square, the symbol in every age of right action or rather the measurement of it. And now recall to mind, my reader, that we have found the numerical fourth day type to be significant of a new Sabbatic period in which the right is going to be asserted and the wrong requited, and also bear in mind that any and every Sabbath is in its import intended to familiarize us with God and with "The God" who loves and asserts the right, and who hates and requites the wrong. Then the eighth is but the complement of the fourth, significant of the cosmic sphere complete at its 3d conjunction for all the purposes of human and divine utility. Whether this cosmic relation of the numbers 3, ½, 8 may not lead up to a correct solution of the metric scale remains to be seen and I would suggest this query to those who have given the subject thought and attention. See the correlation of these numbers in music for instance, giving all the intricate variations of one simple scale of harmony, as well as the diversity of time in its relation to melody marked by this correlation. Write these 1, 2, 3 simple factors, time, number and rhythm, as heretofore stated and developed in their harmonic relations, we have an illustration of the possibilities of the type in the harmonious productions of every department of the fine and useful arts, as for instance in music, painting, sculpture, architecture, geometry, astronomy, etc. Can we not with these data determine the true metric scale?

The Restitution.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXII. Read X PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, JULY 11, 1883. NO. 26.

THE RESTITUTION.

TERMS—TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR, Payable in advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.

Address all Letters and Communications to THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." Agreeing to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of Kings, and the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

"THE WHOLE ARMOR OF GOD."—Ephes. vi. 10–18.

The Christian is exhorted to endure hardness, ("hardship." R. V.) as a good soldier of Jesus Christ; and, in writing to the saints at Ephesus, Paul specifies each piece of the panoplia or whole armor to be worn by such a soldier. It is called "the whole armor of God" because selected and furnished by him. No part of it is of man's invention. Soldiers are not to go into battle with armor of their own selection. In fighting the Lord's battles we must wear the Lord's armor.

1. The girdle. "Having your loins girt about with truth." The girdle affords the soldier strength and readiness for action. This appears from such expressions as, "I will strengthen him with thy girdle," and "Thou hast girded me with strength unto the battle." Isa. xxii. 21; Psa. xviii. 39. So truth strengthens the believer. He is "established in the truth." 2 Pet. i. 12. The verb here rendered "established" is rendered "strengthen" in the expression, "when thou art converted strengthen thy brethren." The side of truth is the strong side, for "he is thrice armed who hath his quarrel just." Some girdles are wonderfully beautiful; so is truth, and it does not cease with the life that now is, but endures into that which is to come, for even in glory the Savior was seen having on "a golden girdle." The truth is essential, for without it we could neither be purified nor sanctified, as is evident from the words, "Ye have purified your souls in obeying the truth," and "sanctify them through thy truth." 1 Peter i. 22; John xvii. 17.

2. The breastplate. "Having on the breastplate of righteousness," also called "the 'breastplate of faith and love" (1 Thes. v. 8), because faith working by love produces righteousness. This is a very definite sort of righteousness, — "The breastplate of the righteousness," as the Greek should be rendered. It must be not our own, but "the righteousness which is of God by the faith". Phil. iii. 9. As the breastplate is a security to the heart so this righteousness is peace and quietness to the conscience, whatever "trailing accusation" the diabolos or calumniator may bring against us; for "who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifieth." Rom. viii. 33.

3. The shoes. "Your feet shod with the preparation (i. e. preparedness) of (i. e. arising from) the gospel of peace." This preparedness arising from the gospel denotes our readiness to march in whatever path the gospel requires us, and that we must also bear the "good message" or "joyful news" to our fellow creatures. It shows that we are to have a missionary spirit,—"Go, teach all nations." The gospel shoes are great ornaments;—"how beautiful are the feet of them that bring glad tidings of good things!" Rom. x. 15, R. V. The "good things" are those of which Philip spoke to the Samaritans,—"the things concerning the kingdom of God, and the name of Jesus Christ." Acts viii. 12. They are such as the following: a. That the kingdom will be on earth. b. That it will have no end. c. That Christ will be its King. d. That it will be inherited by none but those who shall have obtained righteousness and immortality. e. And that through faith, repentance, baptism, and patient continuance in well doing, we may obtain the righteousness and immortality which Christ died to purchase for us. These five great items of the gospel are "good things" which the soldier of Christ should be ever ready to make known to those who are in darkness.

4. The shield. "Taking the shield of the faith." Besides "the shield of the faith" we read, "I am thy shield," and "His truth shall be thy shield." Gen. xv. 1; Psa. v. 12. There is no discord here, for God makes known his truth which is the basis of our faith, hence, faith is the instrumental shield. It is by faith the Christian sees the hand of God in every triumph. Faith shields all the graces; they cannot live if not supported and defended by it. Hope, love, humility, patience, labor, courage, flourish according to the strength of our faith. "Without faith it is impossible to please God." "We walk by faith, not by sight." 2 Cor. v. 7. Faith is an effective shield, "Wherewith ye shall be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked." This is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith." 1 Jno. v. 4.

5. The helmet. "For an helmet the hope of salvation." 1 Thes. v. 8. The helmet is the headpiece. As the head guides the actions of the body, so hope guides the actions of life, giving aim and strength to the mind, and by these means lessening our burdens and difficulties. When many of the warriors of Israel despaired of taking the land, faith and hope nerved Caleb to say, "Let us go up at once and possess it: for we are well able." Num. xiii. 30. Without hope life could hardly be borne. It is the opposite of despair. We should never cast off the helmet of hope and give up to despair, whatever troubles may happen. "Perplexed but not in despair." 2 Cor. iv. 8. Nil desperandum, never despair, is a very old and useful maxim.

Hope is one of the three principal graces, and is called "an anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast." Heb. vi. 19. The hope referred to here is "the hope of the gospel," that is, the hope of receiving those things which are promised in the gospel; and from this hope we are exhorted to "be not moved away." Col. i. 23. Does any believer, oppressed with despondency, ask, "May I hope?" I answer, "Yes, you are commanded to hope—take the helmet." If you have joy and peace in believing, you have the foundation and fruitful sources of abounding hope. Hence, the apostolic prayer, "Now the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing, that ye may abound in hope." Rom. xv. 13.

6. The sword. "The sword of the Spirit which is the word of God." It is not the word of man, for "Holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Spirit." That word with its threats on the one edge and promises on the other, is "sharper than any two-edged sword." Therefore in contending with the adversary have "it is written" always ready, as the Master did. Mat. iv. 1–11. Employ that sword

1st, When truth is to be distinguished from error. Thus the "noble" Bereans "searched the Scriptures daily whether those things were so. Therefore many of them believed." Acts xvii. 11, 12.

2d, When sinners are to be morally regenerated. "Of his own will begat he us with the sword of truth." Jas. i. 18. "Being born (begotten," R. V.) again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God.... And this is that word which by the gospel is preached unto you." 1 Pet. i. 23, 25.

3d, When believers are to be built up. "The word of his grace which is able to build you up and to give you an inheritance among all them which are sanctified." Acts. xx. 32.

4th, When tempted to worldliness. "Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world. If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him." 1 Jno. ii. 15.

5th, When tempted to lay up riches. "Take heed and beware of covetousness." Luke xii. 15. "Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth." Mat. vi. 19.

6th, When inclined to despondency. "Let not your heart be troubled." Jno. xiv. 1. "Hope to the end for the grace that is to be brought unto you at the revelation of Jesus Christ." 1 Pet. i. 13.

7th, When inclined to indolence. "Be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord." 1 Cor. xv. 58.

Of course, these are but a few of the many instances in which that sword is to be employed.

And to this full suit of heavenly armor we are to join prayer,—"praying always." Even the soldiers of the world, armed with carnal weapons, frequently pray for success in their warfare; how much more, then, should the soldiers of Christ "pray always" in obedience to the orders of the great "Captain of our salvation!" Luke xviii. 1.

And now, observe with what emphasis of repetition this armor is urged upon us,—"Put on the whole armor of God," "Take unto you the whole armor of God."

Why take this armor? "That ye may be able to withstand in the evil day." Now is "the evil day"—"This present evil world" (aiown) or age. Gal. i. 4. Through this whole day the battle is to rage in one form or another, either as affliction, or temptation, or persecution, or death. At Waterloo the leading feature of the French attack was at one time infantry, at another artillery, and at another cavalry.

But in whatever form we are assailed, our orders are, "Stand fast in the faith, quit you like men." 1 Cor. xvi. 13.

And "precious promises" are made for our encouragement in the battle. The word has been passed along the lines, addressed to every soldier individually, "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life." "To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of life that is in the midst of the Paradise of God." "He that overcometh shall not be hurt of the second death." "To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the hidden manna, and will give him a white stone, and in the stone a new name written, which no man knoweth saving he that receiveth it." "He that overcometh and keepeth my works unto the end, to him will I give power over the nations: and he shall rule them with a rod of iron; as the vessels of a potter shall they be broken to shivers: even as I received of my Father. And I will give him the morning star." "He that overcometh, the same shall be clothed in white raiment; and I will not blot out his name out of the book of life, but I will confess his name before my Father, and before his angels." "Him that overcometh will I make a pillar in the temple of my God, and he shall go no more out: and I will write upon him the name of my God, and the name of the city of my God, which is New Jerusalem, which cometh down out of heaven from my God: and I will write upon him my new name." "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father in his throne." Rev. ii. and iii.

IN CONCLUSION, THEREFORE,

First, I exhort every soldier of Christ, male and female, to "war a good warfare," that at last each may be able to say, like the heroic Paul, "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith: henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day." 2 Tim. iv. 7, 8. (What golden words for the epitaph of a well-spent life!) Contemplate the noble army of such soldiers! Though bleeding with the scars of persecution, they use no carnal weapons, for their mission is to bind up the wounds of others, "pouring in oil and wine;" to preach the gospel to the poor, to heal the brokenhearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, to preach the acceptable year of the Lord." Luke iv. 18, 19.

Some one was telling me of having, in Philadelphia, seen members of the so-called "salvation army" who went about preaching in the streets "like the Savior did." I replied, "As to whether it was 'like the Savior' depends on whether they preached the same doctrine that he preached."

We need not be deceived in this vitally important matter, for the Scriptures plainly testify that he preached "the gospel of the kingdom," and so did his apostles; and the preaching of "any other gospel," in the streets or elsewhere, is positively contrary to solemn "orders" which no true "salvation army" would dare to violate. See Mat. iv. 23; xxiv. 14; Gal. i. 7–9.

Second, I exhort aliens to come out "on the Lord's side," to cease fighting against Christ, to enlist themselves among his faithful soldiers, to "cast off the works of darkness and put on the armor of light"—the whole armor of God; so that each of you may obtain the rewards offered "to him that overcometh," and may hear the joyful plaudit, "Well done, good and faithful servant." ### ORIENTAL SKETCHES.—Second Series. Number 10.

—O thou sword of the Lord, how long will it be ere thou be quiet? Put up thyself into thy scabbard, rest, and be still. How can it be quiet, seeing the Lord hath given it a charge against Ashkelon, and against the sea-shore? There hath he appointed it."—Jer. xlvii. 6, 7.

We descended the hill of Ashdod, our horses leaping lightly as mountain goats from terrace to terrace, spurning the dust of the royal city, their iron hoofs over and anon ringing upon fragments of broken pillars and sculptured stones. At the southern base of the hill, beside a miniature lake, are the walls of an old khan, and near it a dilapidated mosque. Beside the latter lies a richly carved sarcophagus of white marble, long ago opened and rifled. Here squatted a dervish — a dirty, ragged, miserable wretch — mumbling his senseless prayers to Allah, telling his beads, and swaying his body to and fro. He never turned his head nor moved a muscle as we rode up to him, but continued to look with a dreamy, vacant stare on the roofless khan, shattered mosque, and ruin-strewn site. He might have passed for the genius of Ashdod as he sat thus on the broken coffin. We saluted him, and he started as if awakened from sleep. He entered freely into conversation, and showed far more intelligence and knowledge than we could have given him credit for. He told us some legends of Ashdod's ancient glory, strangely mixing up in them the names of Dood, Suleiman, Jalud (Goliath), and Nebaumed. We listened with interest to his stories as we took our mid-day rest beneath the shade of a mulberry tree. It was pleasing to hear incidents of Sacred Scripture history distorted and exaggerated [illegible] from the lips of a divine revelation. "Dost thou see a divine revelation in the history of Moses?" said I to the dervish, pointing to the Israelitish camp. "Yes, yes, yes," he answered, "they are, as the special favorites of heaven; they have free access to every house, and never want for food or lodging. I have seen a Turkish pasha descend from his place and kiss the hand of a dervish who had wandered into his council chamber; and when the mother of the late Sultan joined the pilgrim caravan to Mecca, the train of grandees that escorted her out of Damascus was led by a dervish, stark naked, mounted on a gorgeously caparisoned charger, and attended by four grooms in the royal livery! The clothes of these unfortunates, when they wear any, are always in tatters, and their persons and habits are disgustingly filthy. As I sat and looked at this squalid dervish amid the ruins of Ashdod, and as I reflected on the privileges enjoyed by his class, in ancient as well as modern times, I was strongly reminded of that romantic episode in the life of king David when he took refuge in another of Philistia's royal cities. He thought he might have escaped unnoticed; but he was recognized at once as the conqueror of Goliath. His fate appeared to be sealed. But "he feigned himself mad in their hands;" he "scribbled on the doors of the gate, and let his spittle fall down upon his beard,"—he acted the dervish, in fact; he acted well; and his acting saved his life. 1 Sam. xxi. 11–15.

An hour's gallop over bleak sandy downs, affording occasional glimpses of the bright sea on the right, brought us to the little village of Hamamah. The olive groves that encircle it are fringed with vineyards, now fresh and beautiful in their new and delicate foliage. We pressed our plashing steeds along winding lanes, hedged with giant cactus, and shaded with dusky olives. Here again hedges and trees were all wreathed with convolvulus of every color, while the vineyards, meadows, and corn-fields behind blushed with poppies and anemones. It was a lovely scene, and after the burning sandy downs, and the sun-scorched plains, we thought it a paradise:—The hedges so trim; the olive-shade so dense; the young vine shoots so green; the flowers so gay; the fields of melons and cucumbers so neat; the grain so wonderfully luxuriant. Here, we thought, at least the curse has not fallen on Philistia. A sharp turn in the road suddenly and sadly dispelled this pleasing delusion. Close on the right now rose mounds of drifting sand. We could see that they are advancing, — slowly, steadily, — burying everything in their course. Fields of wheat, sown only a few months ago, were already partly covered. Vineyards were all but obliterated;—here and there a topmost branch, still retaining its foliage, waved over its own tomb. Further back, traces of olive groves, some of the larger trees standing in great bowls of sand, their trunks embedded, but the motion of the branches and the sweep of the wind beneath their foliage, had as yet kept the top free. Their graves were already made over, and their days were numbered. Others had only just been covered up, and two or three green twigs projecting from the smooth sand-mounds marked their places.

It was a melancholy sight. It impressed me more deeply than anything I had ever seen. One is in some degree prepared for ruined palace and temple, desolate city and village. Man's proudest works are still perishable; but the face, the features, the resources of nature are generally supposed to be permanent. We rode on, gazing and wondering, our horses sinking deep at every footstep into the soft, fine sand. Then taking out my Bible, I could not refrain from reading to my companions the strange and terrible doom pronounced on this country by the Hebrew prophet five-and-twenty centuries ago: —"Woe unto the inhabitants of the sea-coast! the word of the Lord is against you; O Canaan, the land of the Philistines, I will even destroy thee, and there shall be no inhabitant!" Zeph. ii. 5.

We had halted for some time on the top of a mound to get a wider view of the country and a clearer idea of the destruction impending over it. Selim could not understand us. With most infernal impatience he pointed, now and again to the sun now sinking in glory behind the sand-hills. At last he could wait no longer. With a wild whoop and a flourish of his rifle, he dashed his heavy stirrups into the flanks of his fiery Arab, and disappeared through the entrance of a shady lane. We all followed at a hard gallop, and in a few minutes were beside our truant guide in the bustling streets of Mejdel, with a score of noisy dogs at our heels, and troops of children at the open doors and on the house-tops, screaming to their fellows to come and see the Franjis with the kettles on their heads. Leaving the village behind, and winding through an olive grove, we came to an open glade, where our tents were pitched, and all ready for reception.

TENT LIFE.

What a charm there is in tent life on the hills and plains of Palestine! It presents such a contrast to the staid routine, alike of labor and recreation in our island home, to the rapidity and regularity of rail and hotel, that one can scarcely think himself in the same world. The sense of complete freedom, of absolute independence, is strange and new. Then there is the dash of danger, the exhilarating effect of pure air and exercise, and, above all, the magic influence of place—of sacred and historic associations ever crowding on the mind, suggested and awakened by names and scenes, all of them of hoary antiquity, and yet all familiar as household words and childhood's home. Every spot on which we tread is holy. Every rain we pass by has a place in history. Every mountain and rolls the eye rests over has a story written in the oldest and best of books. All we see belongs to and illustrates the past. The costumes of the people, the implements of husbandry, the houses, the tents, are all such as were familiar to Abraham; and the salutations are the very same with which Abraham was greeted when he visited the Philistine lords at Gerar, or bargained for the field of Machpelah at Hebron. We roam through these hallowed scenes all the day, and when evening comes, we select some grassy spot beside babbling fountain or old well. We dismount; and then, as if by magic, horses are picketed, tents are pitched, fires are kindled, and all get ready in true gipsy style—in patriarchal style, I should say—for thus the old patriarchs lived and travelled through these very hills and plains.

The sun goes down in a blaze of glory; the brief twilight declines to a faint purple streak along the western horizon; the stars come out like crystal lamps hung to the black vault of heaven, or it may be the moon sheds her clear, silvery light on the landscape, making it look like a sepia-sketch by some master hand. Dusky figures now group themselves in a circle round the watch-fire, and we retire to our tents to write up our journals, or read again with new interest the story of the places we have visited during the day. The Bible is drawn forth, the best and most accurate of all handbooks for Palestine; and old Roland, with his classic references and historic incidents, all ready to the scholar's hand. Here is the tale of Ekron and the ark. We now learn with surprise that Ashdod, which appeared, as we passed through it, so poor and so wretched, once stood a siege of twenty-nine years against the whole forces of Egypt under Psammitichus—the longest siege on record. We find, too, that Mejdel, the village beside us, is that Migdal-gad, which was allotted with fifteen other cities in this plain to the tribe of Judah. Josh. xv. 37. And it was also that Magdala, where Herodotus tells us Pharaoh-necho conquered the Syrians. For the classical scholar, the Bible student, and the earnest Christian, tent life and travel in Palestine have an unceasing charm. And in after years, amid other scenes, I can tell from sweet experience that the days and weeks and months spent there will appear as spots of bright sunshine on the cloudy landscape of memory.—J. L. Porter, A. M.

IS THIS A. D. 1883 OR 1888?

The much-debated question as to the correctness of the hitherto accepted reckoning of the years which have elapsed since the birth of Jesus, has again been mooted by Professor Sattler, of Munich, in the columns of a German contemporary. Professor Sattler (according to the Jewish Chronicle) claims the distinction of having solved the question, and of having demonstrated the fact that the current year is probably 1888, instead of 1883. He bases his proofs mainly on three coins which were struck in the reign of Herod Antipas, son of Herod the Great, and which date, consequently, from the first half of the first century of the current era. Madden admits the genuineness of these coins, and other numismatic writers do the same. The evidence they offer coincides with the narrative of the Gospels and with astronomical calculations. Professor Sattler has arrived at the following results: Jesus was born on the 25th of December, 749 years after the founding of Rome, and commenced his public career on the 17th of November, 780 years after the founding of Rome. He was then 30 years, 10 months, and 23 days old. The date on which he commenced his career fell in the fifteenth year of the Emperor Tiberius, and in the 46th year after the building of Herod's temple. This is in accordance with St. Luke iii. 1, and St. John ii. 20. According to Josephus ("Antiquities," XV., 11, 1), the construction of Herod's Temple was commenced in the 18th year of that monarch, or in the year 734 after the founding of Rome, in the month of October. If we add the 46 years which elapsed after the building of the Temple, we arrive at the end of the year 780, the year during which Jesus entered his career. If, moreover, we subtract from 680 (770 years, 10 months, and 25 days, there remain 748 years, 11 months and 25 days, which gives us the date of his birth, the 25th of December of the 749th year after the founding of Rome. Jesus died on the 7th of April, 783, of the Roman era, that is to say, on the Friday before Passover; for it has been ascertained by exact calculation that Passover fell that year on the 7th of April, 783; and as the latter year was a Jewish leap-year, and consisted, accordingly, of 13 months, his public career lasted 3 years and 7 months. Between the 17th of November, 780, and the 9th of April, 783, three Passovers were celebrated, viz.: 781, 782, and 783. Those years correspond with the 27th, 28th, 29th, and 30th of the Christian era, as at present calculated. Remembering, however, that the year of the birth of Jesus corresponds with the year 749 of the Roman era, and taking this year as the starting point of the Christian reckoning, the years of Jesus' career must be the 31st, 32d, 33d, and 34th of the new era. It thus results, according to Professor Sattler, that the Christian reckoning is at fault by five years, and that we are now in 1888, and not in 1883. Thus far we take from the English Mechanic.

Other results than those of Professor Sattler, and given above, were arrived at by Dionysius Exiguus, a learned monk, who attempted the computation of the birth of Christ in the sixth century, and who made 753 the year of his birth. Subsequent research has proven that this event took place near the end of 750 A. U. C.,* which corresponds to B. C. 1, according to the following data:

The ancient Romans excelled all other nations of that period in the exactness of their chronology, and they measured their years from the date of the foundation of Rome. In old records, therefore, our Savior's birth is mentioned in connection with this mode of computation. If, then, we can find in what year of Rome this event took place, we can correct the two eras by a simple process, since January 1, A. D. 1, is the same as January 1, A. U. C. 754.

Now, I., Eusebius, the well-known historian of the early Christian church, tells us that Christ was born in the 42d year of the reign of Augustus Cæsar, and according to another statement which he makes elsewhere, the first year of Augustus' reign is that in which Hirtius and Pansa were consuls at Rome, and this is known to have been in A. U. C. 709. Hence, 709, added to 41, gives A. U. C. 750, which is the date we require to know.

II. The same Eusebius says that from Christ's nativity to the demolition of the churches in the nineteenth year of the reign of the Roman emperor Diocletian, is 305 years. Now, Diocletian became emperor on September 17, A. U. C. 1037.† Hence, 1037, added to 18, with 305 subtracted, gives A. U. C. 750, as before.

III. St. Luke tells us that in the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius Cæsar, Jesus began to be about thirty years of age. Now, Tiberius succeeded Augustus on August 19, A. U. C. 767.

Hence, 767, added to 14, with 31 subtracted, gives A. U. C. 750, as before.

IV. Josephus, the celebrated Jewish historian, states that the "taxings" were made in the thirty-seventh year after Augustus Cæsar gained his victory at Actium. Now, this battle took place in A. U. C. 713, and it is assumed that the "taxings" began nine years before.

Hence, 723, added to 30, with 9 subtracted, gives A. U. C. 750, as before.

V. The same Josephus says that the thirty-seventh year of the reign of Herod Phillip (which began on the death of Herod the Great) was the twentieth year of the reign of Tiberius Cæsar.

Hence, 737, added to 13, with 30 subtracted, gives A. U. C. 750, as before.

VI. The same Josephus informs us that Herod reigned thirty-seven years, and elsewhere that the twenty-eighth year of his reign was the 192d Olympiad. Now, the Olympiad was the Greek mode of reckoning years, and the 192d corresponded to A. U. C. 741. Herod, therefore, had nine years to reign.

Hence, 741, added to 9, gives A. U. C. 750, as before.

VII. The same Josephus records that Herod reigned thirty-four years after Antigonus was slain at the siege of Jerusalem, which siege took place at the 185th Olympiad. Now, the 185th Olympiad corresponds to A. U. C. 717, and Herod's death is a connecting link.

Hence, 717, added to 34, gives A. U. C. 751, as before (nearly).

VIII. The same Josephus informs us that Archelaus was banished from his throne in the eighth year of his reign, and another historian, Dio Cassius, says that this banishment occurred in A. U. C. 760; with 9 subtracted, gives A. U. C. 750, as before.

IX. Lastly, the same Josephus notices a lunar eclipse which took place shortly before Herod's death, and we know that Christ's birth took place a short time before that event. Now, the moon was half eclipsed on the night of March 13, A. U. C. 750; and, again, totally eclipsed January 9, A. U. C. 753. Taking the first as the eclipse referred to, we have an exact correspondence. The second eclipse, though more important astronomically, was not connected with any historical event.—N. Y. Observer.

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, July 11, 1883.

We have two more letters from Jerusalem for our next; also communications from several of our correspondents.

Prof. GARDNER says in a note of date July 7, that Br. H. V. Reed and himself had had a good and profitable time at Oxford, the preceding week.

Though the selection written by Dr. Seiss is lengthy we hope all will read it through. Like many other pieces from his pen it is an important subject graphically delineated.

Our appointment last Sunday, July 8, was at the Antioch Meeting House. The result was encouraging. In the afternoon we went to one of the upper tributaries of the great Mississippi—the Kaw, of Kansas—and baptized four young persons into the Christ. Three of these were the children of Br. and Sr. Roberts. It has thus fallen to our lot to baptize one entire household, as we immersed the parents, at different times, some years ago. The other young person was Miss Chapman, a granddaughter of Br. H. Barnhill. Thus within a few weeks we have baptized six persons, and Br. Barnhill has baptized five. May these all walk worthy of the heavenly calling.

The cholera is not only raging terribly in Egypt but has broken out in a Chinese city exhibiting a virulent type of the dreaded malady. The following is from the Chicago Tribune for to-day July 10:—

The cholera bulletins show no signs of the abatement of the terrible scourge in Egypt. Saturday there were 167 deaths at five different localities, the large majority occurring at Damietta and Mansurah—ninety-six at the former town and forty-eight at the latter. Sunday, there were 163 deaths. Damietta fell off eight, but Mansurah increased sixteen, while nine deaths occurred in a new place, Samanoud, thus indicating that the disease is working toward Cairo. Meanwhile it has broken out at Swatow, in China, and is raging violently, thus showing that the germs of the old epidemic last year still linger in that part of the world. This makes a new point of attack, and one that must be guarded against not only to prevent it from acting as a feeder to Egypt, but from approaching Europe from some new quarter. There now seems to be little hope that Alexandria will be spared, as deaths occurred there both Saturday and Sunday. Even the Khedive himself has taken the alarm and has made his preparations to fly to Naples instead of remaining at his post to cooperate with the English in caring for his people. Poor Egypt seems to be doubly afflicted: first by a cruel war and then by the still more cruel pestilence.

News Items.

THE CHOLERA SPREADING.

HONG KONG, July 9.—The cholera has broken out at Swatow, and is raging virulently.

LONDON, July 9. — The ninety-six deaths from cholera at Damietta, forty-eight at Mansurah, one at Alexandria, six at Samanoud and six at Shirbin, reported in the Cairo dispatch of last evening, were the fatalities for Saturday. The numbers of deaths on Sunday were eighty-eight at Damietta, sixty-four at Mansurah, nine at Samanoud, seven at Shirbin, and one at Alexandria.

THE KHEDIVE PREPARING TO LEAVE.

CAIRO, July 9.—It is reported that a yacht is being prepared and will be held in readiness to take the Khedive to Naples in the event of the spread of the cholera making his departure necessary.

DEATH OF A EUROPEAN.

LONDON, July 9.—The Times' correspondent at Alexandria says a European died there of cholera yesterday. The abbatoirs of the city are in a filthy condition and extremely dangerous to health.

THE COUNT DE CHAMBORD.

VIENNA, July 9. — The Count de Chambord passed a sleepless night and was slightly feverish. He is extremely weak this morning.

TRIAL OF JEWS FOR MURDER.

LONDON, July 9.—In the trial of the Jews at Nyreghaza, Hungary, two of the prisoners who are accused of having placed a corpse in the river with a view to passing it off as that of Esther Salomony, the girl whom the prisoners are charged with murdering, declared that their confessions had been obtained by threats to murder them in prison. One of them had been compelled to drink large quantities of water, had been stripped, struck, and dragged by the hair. The other had been beaten and compelled to gaze at the sun. A number of witnesses also testified as to the shocking treatment they had received at the hands of the authorities. Counsel for the defense pointed out that the people of Tisza-Eslar, where the murder is alleged to have been committed, had been taught that it was not wrong to testify falsely against the Jews, the interests of the country requiring their conviction.

THE CIVIL WAR IN ECUADOR.

GUAYAQUIL, July 7. — There has been heavy firing all the morning. The streets are lined with soldiers and no one is allowed to pass. The business houses have all been closed by order of Veintemilla.

WORMS IN THE COTTON FIELDS.

MONTGOMERY, Ala., July 7. — The planters are very anxious about the cotton crop. Worms have appeared on many plantations.

The New York Herald sums up the accidents in this country resulting in death during the last six months. The list is a formidable one, and shows that 2,865 persons were killed or drowned during that time.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 9.—The Surgeon-General of the Marine Hospital Service has received advices that the Norwegian bark Vega is at Ship Island with yellow-fever on board.

SELECTED MISCELLANY.

The British consul has had to protect from the Egyptian mob a young Mohammedan who embraced the Christian faith. The convert has been sent to Cyprus for safety.

A piece of silver, having on one side a portrait of Attila, the scourge of God, with the inscription "Attila Rex," and on the other the outlines of a fortified place, and the word "Aquileja" has been found at Brunn, in Moravia, and is about 1,400 years old.

Quite gorgeous railroad cars are run between Paris and Bucharest. They are carpeted with Smyrna rugs two inches thick, and the sides of the compartments are covered partly with embossed Japanese leather paper and partly with Gobelin tapestry. The dining-room cars, in which triumphs of French cookery are served, are supplied with handsome clocks, damask curtains, and Venetian mirrors. Breakfast consists of five courses and dinner of eight. The sleeping cars are splendidly furnished, and have hot as well as cold water. The average speed is forty miles an hour.

THE TALLEST TREE IN THE WORLD.

It seems that America, after all, is unable to make good her claim to the possession of the tallest and largest trees in the world. Every one has read of the marvels of the Yosemite Valley and of Yellowstone Park, the huge national sporting grounds of the United States. But what are the giants of California in comparison with a tree which has lately been discovered in Australasia? It has long been known that in Tasmania there are eucalypti measuring 200 feet from the ground to the first branch, and more than 350 feet in total height; and there is, or lately was, on Mount Wellington, near Hobart Town, a tree of this species the trunk of which was eighty-six feet in circumference. But a still more gigantic monarch of the woods has been recently discovered in Victoria. It is a well-proportioned specimen of the Eucalyptus amygdalina, and its top is nearer to the sky than the cross of St. Paul's Cathedral, for it is no less than 430 feet above the ground. — St. James's Gazette.

Prof. Philip Schaff says that the Old Testament is still in the hands of the American revisers, who are preparing the American Appendix; that is, selecting from all their readings and renderings which the British revisers have rejected those which they deem worth laying before the public for final decision. The revised Old Testament will probably be published before next spring. Then the Convocation of Canterbury, which originated the movement, will subject it to official judgment. The adoption without any qualification will meet with strong opposition, Dr. Schaff thinks, from those who were always opposed to any revision, who had no share in the present work and are dissatisfied with the results for some reason or other.

TROUBLES BREWING IN SYRIA.

A general feeling of anxiety regarding the condition of Syria prevails at present among Turkish official circles. French intrigues are carried on amongst the Ansayiyah in Northern Syria and the Metualis in the South, in defiance of the Turkish authorities, and are rapidly bearing fruit in increased turbulence and discontent. Seditious theories are freely propounded in the mosques and in religious circles, whose influence permeates the whole of Arabia. The Sultan himself is so much alarmed at the progress of the Pan-Arabic Propoganda, which he originally encouraged, that Ahmed Assad Effendi, who was his confidential palace agent last year in Egypt, is now in Damascus on a special mission to watch and counteract the movement. And thus, in accordance with the announcements of the prophetic Scriptures, the drying up of the Turco-Mohammedan empire—the mystic river Euphrates (Rev. xvi. 12) — goes surely on, preparatory to other great events which will terminate the present moribund dispensation.

THE SUN'S DISTURBANCES.

On the morning of the 23d the Democrat and Chronicle contained an article headed "Terrific Sun-Storms." Since that date the disturbance on the sun has increased with great rapidity. An observation yesterday through the flying clouds revealed a view that was somewhat appalling. A group of sun spots that was just making its appearance on the 23d had reached the sun's center and had spread over a vast area, while a new group of immense proportions had made its appearance on the east. This group consists of two very large spots connected by a chain of smaller ones. The region is torn in every direction. About the two great storm centers there is evidence of a whirling motion. The tongues of white flame which surround the dark chasms of the spots are bent in the direction of the cyclonic motion. The area of disturbance is now greater than at any time since the sun-spot period began. There has been a constant increase in the violence and extent of the solar storms during the past year. The tremendous outbreak of last November is fairly dwarfed by the present convulsions. Unless the sun is undergoing some permanent change, it would seem that the storms must soon reach a climax and subside. But so long as they continue we may expect violent storms and unaccountable weather on the earth. The precipitation of rain over the north temperate zone has already become a matter of great concern, and there are no immediate prospects of a diminution. The water has been pumped into the air by the sun's increased heat, and it must descend. If this state of things should continue for two or three years more, the most disastrous consequences must follow. In the natural course of events it is expected that the solar disturbance will soon subside. But there is no telling what may happen in our whirl through space.

Setting here in my room quietly this evening after the heat of the day, my mind takes in the vast improvements made here in a very few years, — here outside the walls in so short a time. Millions of dollars have been put into buildings, and still the work is going on, as some elegant stone buildings are now going up. Then I think of what wonderful news the English papers have brought us in the past few days. Arrangements are about completed for the "healing" (Ezek. xlvii. 8) of the waters of the Dead Sea, yea! the canal is to be put across from the Mediterranean Sea to the valley of the Jordan, which flows into the Dead Sea, and then they are to continue the work to the Red Sea. That will make Jerusalem a seaport city, and the centre of the world indeed. All Jerusalem is running wild over this great scheme, which means much for Palestine. It is claimed that this rout will be five days shorter from England to India than any other rout. To think of immense great ships sailing back and forth through the Jordan is enough to make the natives tremble, for truly it will bring a class of people who will get more out of this soil than those here can do in their miserable shiftless way.

Yes there is no question but what we are living in a time when God is bringing about some of the greatest moves in the world's history. God has said that all nations should take a hand in that last great battle. Then there must of necessity be a means of conveyance for the troops: and in this canal we have it, for with but little trouble the ships of all nations can get into the Great Sea, and then the run through the canal to the Jordan is of no consequence.

God's plan for the closing up of this world's affairs is a good one, and will work like a charm, and man will be confounded at all his might.

And now on top of all this, there has just arrived from France a wealthy gentleman, a Jew, representing Karl Hursch, a German Jew of great wealth. He is the Earl's private secretary, and is here with the view to colonization. This same man sent 1500 Jews at his own expense from Russia during the trouble last year to America. At another time he gave one million francs for the relief of another lot. He is one of God's stewards. We will not be able to learn much about what is done till after he is gone. However we are satisfied that this man's trip will make room in Palestine for many of his countrymen.

There are but four colonies in Palestine up to this time. The first to the east of Joppa, located about three years, from Hungary and Russia. The name of this colony in Hebrew is "Gate of Hope." About 25 families. The next is also near Joppa, about two hours, as you go to Ekron, about 20 families and a lot of young men; perhaps [illegible] all told. These came from Roumania last year during the persecution. Near Haifa there are 70 families from Roumania, nearly 300 people in this lot. Part of these came about nine months ago, and a portion about three. These are doing well with their crops. They have not built on their land yet but will soon. At present they have quarters in the town. Then we have about 20 families near Saffeit, on the sea of Tiberias. These are very poor and need assistance.

According to the census of 1875 Hebron had 500 Jews; Jerusalem 17,000; Saffeit 6,000; Tiberias has about 2,000; Joppa 1,000. Beside these there are other small lots here and there. However there has been a steady increase to these numbers, but how great I can not say, but think not above 10 per cent. For this information I am indebted to Dr. Hoskenger. He is probably better posted in these matters than any one else in Jerusalem. He is conducting a school at his house for the education of Jewish boys.

I regret having to send so much black paper, but it can't be helped now. I have been quite ill with fever for the past four days, and I assure you I don't feel much like writing. So for this time adieu. P. H. WINTERSTEIN.

I now read with delight the many letters in THE RESTITUTION descriptive of the land of promise, since I have embraced the idea of the restoration of Israel to their own land, and comprehend the fact that this earth renewed is to be the saints eternal home. O, the thought is grand! I often ask myself the question, Why did I not learn it sooner? Good brethren were willing to teach me, but I was unwilling to [illegible] of them, and when I was willing [illegible] give the truth, some [illegible] huff it out of me, [illegible] of the [illegible] self was [illegible] Devout that truth [illegible] by designing persons to keep one from receiving it, and the same old enemy is still at work. He calls the truth Adventism, or Campbellism. I have had even those who claim to be preachers of the gospel, say to the brethren and the people, Bro. Sowell is tainted with Adventism. Now why all this? It is to keep good people from receiving the truth.

Quite a number of us in this county claim to belong to the Church of God, and to take the Bible as our guide, leaving off all human names, and we claim to be Reformers indeed, and as we learn the truth we are going to walk in it. Now brethren, let us put on the whole armor of God, and keep it on, and contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints; my prayer is that we may all be perfectly joined together, and all speak the same things.

Preaching brethren, oil up with the oil of God's love, and let us raise the steam, and shove the gospel engine through. There is a great work to be done, and we have but a little while to do it in; the Nobleman will soon come. Behold, I come quickly, and my reward is with me, to give to every man as his work shall be.

May the Lord help us to make a forward movement all along the line, and good will be accomplished.

W. J. SOWELL,
Evangelist Disct. No. 2.

Some indeed preach Christ even of envy and strife, and some also of good will.—PHIL. 1. 15.

By request of the congregation at Shoals, Martin Co., Ind., I lately visited them, holding meeting from June 23 to July 2, inclusive. Although in the midst of harvest, the meetings were well attended—not only the brotherhood, but the community at large, manifested an intense interest to hear the glad tidings, coming out each night, after the labors of the day, a distance of three and four miles around. This is largely due to the commendable zeal, intelligent faith, and consistent, devoted life of those previously called out, numbering eighteen souls, commencing first with Brother and Sister Stewart, from Kansas, who are not only intelligently devoted to the truth, but each possessed to an unusual degree, of that wisdom and Christian deportment, calculated to commend it to others. Yet it was after years of struggle and earnest effort that others began to see the light.

Through the faithful labors of brethren Skeels, Hatch, and Foore they have been gathered together in Christ Jesus, whose labors are not forgotten, but each holds a warm place in the affections of the congregation, and are kindly remembered by many that are without.

There has been and still is much bitter persecution and strife by some, thinking thereby to destroy the truth, which is mostly by the U. B. Church, who have been the dominant people in the community, but are now fast losing their hold, and hence are becoming almost desperate in their foolish efforts to put a stop to the influence of truth. While there, the minister, pope like, but only to his own discomfort and furtherance of the truth of the gospel, undertook to prevent his flock from hearing us (which many of them had availed themselves of the privilege of doing) by even going so far as to have charges brought against two of the prominent members, (the Superintendent and assistant of the Sunday School) as they informed me, viz: "For operating against the U. B. Church by attending the Soul-sleeper's meetings!" They were notified to answer to the charge, which they did by justifying their course, and having their names erased from their class book: whereupon some dozen or more arose and requested their names erased also, as they were equally guilty, all of which only increased the interest and desire to hear.

May they continue not only to hear, but also to become obedient to the truth. Only one was immersed during our meeting—a worthy intelligent lady, yet many others are evidently in sympathy with the faith and hope of the promises of God made unto the fathers.

May they go on and through faith and obedience become joint heirs to the promised inheritance.

In reading Brother Wilcox's article in THE RESTITUTION of June 27, though the communication is very interesting and instructive, I find what seems to me to be an error, and that in his description of the river that the prophet Ezekiel describes as flowing out from under the threshold of the house eastward. Chap. xlvii. 1–12.

In arguing against the navigation of this river, Brother Wilcox says, "The water was not sufficient to float ships great or small, inasmuch as at the distance of about 1500 feet from the temple it was only up to the ankle, yet it was so rapid that when it reached a more level spot about 4500 feet distant, it was too deep to be forded, but was deep enough to bathe or swim in." The error is in "assuming" that the measurement was made from the temple down stream. It seems that before the measurement was taken they pass out from the temple by way of the North Gate, thence round about the way without, unto the outer gate by the way that looketh eastward, (or opposite the east gate). The prophet does not state how far down stream they were when they came to the brink of the river, but that "when the man that had the line in his hand went forth eastward, he measured a thousand cubits, and he brought me through the waters; the waters were to the ankles."

Now let us "presume" that the measurement was taken from the north bank, somewhere outside the gates, and that they were attempting to cross over to the opposite side, for after the fourth measurement they found the river to be so deep that they could not pass over. Ver. 5. Then he brought me, and caused me to return to the brink of the river. Ver. 6.

The object of their measurement could not have been to ascertain the length of this river, for they seemed to understand that the waters should flow down eastward into the desert, and into the sea. Was it necessary for them to get into the river and measure down through the water in order to ascertain the length of the river? The better place would have been, in our judgment, to have taken dry land for it. The result of their measurement shows conclusively that they were attempting to cross the stream, and that the farther out they went the deeper became the waters, a mighty river, that they could not pass over.

I have written thus, knowing that there are others who hold the same views as Brother Wilcox on the measurement of this river, and that sometimes a small error destroys the effect, to a certain extent, of some very good articles, and with due respect for Bro. Wilcox.

Yours in hope of eternal life.

Youths' Column.

At Sundown.

H. W. LONGFELLOW.

The summer sun is sinking low;
Only the tree-tops redden and glow;
Only the weathercock on the spire
Of the neighboring church is a flame of fire.
All is in shadow below.

O beautiful, restful summer day,
What hast thou given, what taken away?
Life and death and love and hate,
Homes made happy or desolate,
Hearts made sad or gay.

On the road of life one milestone more!
In the book of life one leaf turned o'er!
Like a red seal is the setting sun
On the good and the evil men have done—
Naught can to-day restore.

Rich Privilege.

If ever life seems rich in privilege it is when we stand beside the cold form of our beloveds, mourning for the opportunities that will never be ours again in this world. Let us be more watchful, more heedful era the "terrible silence" comes again. This is the lesson of death to the living. Do not delay to speak the loving words that tremble on the lips, but so often fail of utterance. Do not hesitate to lift the veil from off the heart ere it be too late, and to enshrine in tender testimony the appreciation that is scattered with such a lavish hand over responsive graves. Hungry hearts are plenty in this world of care and burdens. Let us learn the art of detecting and feeding them. They may be those of our own household.—Union Signal.

How Paper Money Is Made.

Yesterday I went through the immense building which is a block in length, and is called the Treasury Department. It is owned by the United States. Here all the paper money is made for all the banks in the country—every dollar of United States money. Almost a million dollars of old, worn out money is counted and destroyed there daily. When they are destroyed they are first counted by several persons, so that there can be no mistake, and the amounts marked. The money is then placed in a large receiver of iron which is nearly the shape of two tin pans with the edges shut together, only very much larger—six or seven feet in diameter. To this iron receiver there is a door which is locked with three locks, each lock requiring a different kind of key. Three men, who are appointed in accordance with law to witness the destruction of this money, have each one of the keys to this door. No one of the men can lend his key to either of the others or to any other person. So, you see, the door can't be opened without all three of the men are present. Now at the proper time of day these three men get together and each one takes his key, and they unlock the three locks of the doors of the receiver, which is then opened. All this old money—so many hundreds of thousands of dollars—is then carefully placed in the receiver, the door is closed, and the three men securely lock it. Water is then let in through a pipe, and a machine inside beats and grinds all these hundreds of thousands of dollars into the finest pulp. When it is sufficiently ground it is taken out and used to make paper of. No one would suppose the wet pulp that comes out of the receiver had been money only an hour or two before.

A box stood near with perhaps six or eight bushels of pulp in it, which, I was told, was the amount destroyed the day before. You will notice the exceeding care which is taken in counting the money to be destroyed and in its destruction, so that none of the money intended to be destroyed shall be stolen or lost, and so again go into use as it may. As I said before, new bills are printed to take the place of those destroyed, and also to supply money required to be used in the country. If you will look very carefully indeed at a new bill, you will notice that it is made of a peculiar kind of paper. Take a new bill and you will find in the paper itself something that looks like a fine kind of hair running through each bill in one particular place. Now, that paper is made just so in order that no one may be able to counterfeit the bills, for the Government takes care that no one shall ever get even a sheet of that paper. So if a bill hasn't got those hairs running through it in a particular place, we know at once it is worthless, or, as we call it, a "counterfeit" bill.

This paper is first made in large sheets, and every sheet that comes in to be printed is carefully counted, so that if a single sheet were stolen or lost the theft or loss would be promptly detected. When the paper comes in, in great packages of these large sheets, each sheet is carefully moistened so that it will take up the ink properly, and is then placed under a press, when a die or stamp of the most perfect workmanship makes an impression, of one color only, on one side. When it becomes dry it is moistened again, and is again placed under a press, and another impression of another color is made, and this process is repeated many times, till all the colors on both sides have been impressed. This printing is done in sheets, several bills being printed at once on one sheet. After this is done the sheets are dried and put under great pressure to take all the wrinkles out and make them entirely smooth. The bills are then trimmed and separated by machinery, and numbered by a curious little machine that changes its numbers at every impression, thus: 1, 2, 3, 4, etc., so that no two bills of the same number on them.

After the numbering the bills are ready to be counted (you see how careful they are to count the sheets and count the bills—oftener, indeed, than I have told you of—so as to avoid the possibility of a single dollar's being stolen among the millions and millions of dollars of paper money that are printed), and after being counted they are placed in packages to be sent away through the country to the banks and sub treasuries.—Christian Union.

Charming Girls.

The most charming woman in Queen Victoria's court a few years ago, was one whose features were homely, and whose eyes were crossed. The secret of her attraction lay in a certain perpetual bright freshness, in her dress, the turn of her mind and her temper.

Jane Welsh Carlyle, when an old, sickly ugly woman, could so charm men, that a stranger meeting her accidentally in a stage-coach followed her for miles, post-haste, to return a parasol which she had dropped. The charm lay in her bright vivacity of manner, and the keen sympathy which shone through her features.

Margaret Fuller also possessed this magnetic sympathy, in spite of her enormous egotism. Men and women, the poor and the rich, felt themselves drawn to open their hearts and pour out their troubles to her. Yet Margaret was an exceptionally homely woman.

The popular belief among young girls who read the Companion, is that it is only a pretty face which will bring to them the admiration which they naturally crave. No books, it is said, have a larger sale than those written that give rules for beauty, recipes to destroy fat or freckles, and to improve the skin or the figure.

Now, no receipt will change the shape of a nose or the color of an eye. But any girl, by daily baths and wholesome food, and by breathing pure air, can render her complexion clear and soft. Her hair, nails and teeth can be daintily kept. Her clothes, however cheap, can be fresh and becoming in color. She can train her mind, even if of ordinary capacity, to be alert and earnest; and if she adds to these a sincere, kindly, sunny temper, she will win friends and love as surely as if all the fairies had brought her gifts at her birth.

But it is of no use for a woman whose person is soiled and untidy, and whose temper is selfish and irritable at home, to hope to cheat anybody by putting on fine clothes and a smile for company. The thick, muddy skin and soured expression will betray her.

"John," said an artist the other day, to a Chinaman who was unwillingly acting as model, "smile. If you don't look pleasant I'll not pay you."

"No use," grumbled the washerman. "If Chinaman feelee ugly all the time he lookee ugly," which is true of every other man and woman in the world as well as of John Chinaman.

Hawthorne's wierd fancy that our secret weakness or sin should hang like a black veil over our faces between us and other men, is true in fact.

Every hidden propensity or vice, every noble trait of feeling, leaves its mark on the features, the expression, the eyes. Day by day, and hour by hour, line after line, here a little and there a little, it is recorded on the face as on the tablet, and when we reach middle age, there is the story of our lives plainly written, so that he who runs may read. It is not cosmetics, not rouge, nor depilatories, girls, that will make your faces as you grow older; but the thoughts and words and deeds that have given you the ugliness of Hecate, or "the lineaments of gospel books."—Youth's Companion.

SLEEP THEY NOT WELL?

BY W. DELL.

Sleep they not well, the sainted dead?
For sorrow they have peace instead;
Our Father kissed his children dear,
Before the tempest gathered near
And burst in thunders fold and dread.

Healed are the hearts that truly bled
The promising souls are comforted,
And stanched the flood of every tear;
Sleep they not well?

And, lo, until the Lord appear,
Earth, like a mother kneeling near
To watch beside the sacred spot,
Wraps her dark mantle round their heads
And shelters them from pain and fear,
Sleep they not well?

GENESIS THE THIRD: HISTORY NOT FABLE.—Lecture II.—Part 1.

THE SENTENCE PRONOUNCED ON THE MAN, THE WOMAN, AND THE SERPENT TEMPTER.

One of the legitimate methods of accounting for the supernatural history of the Bible is to suppose that it is literally true from the beginning. And one of the many methods of constructing a faith or a theology, is to take the facts and doctrines of the Bible in their simplest sense as a divine revelation, and to believe them. But both of these methods are now more out of favor than all others, and sometimes expose you to insult, even from Christian writers, more than the wildest rationalism. But surely in these days of scientific toleration, at least a friendly hearing might be conceded to a mode of dealing with Holy Scripture which is certainly the most ancient and the most natural, and which still seems the most reasonable to men furnished with at least as much ability, scientific knowledge, genius and good faith as the persons who are now deriding the book of Genesis, and subverting the faith of less instructed people.

In the previous lectures we have first presented a complete view of the place occupied in the Old and New Testaments by the history of Adam and Eve; and next a discussion of some general objections made to that history by scientific and literary criticism. Offering no judgment on the general doctrine of evolution, we have, for reasons assigned by Mr. Alfred Wallace and a host of scientific men, rejected its application to mankind, and affirm the direct action of God in the creation of man, first, because, if we may trust Professors Virchow, Dana, and Dawson, there is no clear evidence of the evolution of man from animals in the course of nature, accepted generally by scientific men; and, secondly, because the direct creation of man—of Adam as a historical person—is proved by all the complicated, miraculous, and recent evidence of divine revelation, which asserts it, and presupposes it in redemption.

We now proceed to examine the narrative of the trial of Adam in Paradise on the side of its results, with a view to an opinion on its credibility when taken as a real history.

And, first of all, I observe that the narrative, as it stands in the book of Genesis, ought not to be made answerable at the bar of modern thought for the traditionary accumulations which have gathered round it after thirty-four centuries of rabbinical and theological comment upon it. It is defensible as it stands in the primitive record; but, I admit, wholly indefensible and incredible as interlined by the additions of a later philosophy and tradition. Unhappily it is as thus interlined and perverted that it is popularly read and understood by a large fraction of Christendom, and it is in such a sense that it has been held up for derision in the presence of modern biological criticism.

On the face of the narrative as it stands we find only that, after other things set in order, and other living beings created, "God made man of the dust of the ground in his own image, and breathed into him the breath of life, and man became a living soul." This last expression, applied in the Hebrew original hundreds of times to the animals, signifies only that man, animated by the Divine Spirit, became a "living creature." As Dr. Pye Smith declares, (in Kitto's Biblical Cyclopedia, under the article Adam) it most certainly was not intended to signify that Adam was created in possession of an indestructible life. On the contrary, being made "in God's image," he was a creature that might live for ever, if God so pleased; but he might also die and pass away, if he disobeyed his maker. On the face of the narrative it appears plainly that, being created in the likeness of God, and allowed access to the "Tree of Life," he was originally designed for immortality—for life eternal: but it was conditional on the obedience of faith. If he transgressed he would "die." The object set before him, therefore, was to secure, by faith in God, an absolute possession of the eternal life for which God made him. If he departed from the living God, and set up himself to be a self-determining power, to be "as God, knowing good and evil," he would "return to the dust whence he was taken." This is all that is in the narrative. The penalty of withdrawing from God was death—the termination of his life, (just as death would have borne that meaning to him for all other living beings in the world), and with that, of course, the life of the unborn race which he represented. There is not a single word of that which occupies so large a space in theological systems since the days of Augustine, not a word of Adam's destiny to suffer death in three senses, of which the last should take effect in an unseen world, a death which should be a deathless life of misery—much less one word of an hereditary curse of the same illimitable quality, and eternal in duration, to descend upon his infant posterity through the sins of their first ancestor; as when Augustine explicitly maintains the eternal suffering of unbaptized infants for Adam's sin. These additions of subsequent metaphysical and religious systems, unknown in the first two centuries of Christianity, we, with a host of ancient and modern theologians, altogether reject.

It is on such perversions as these, that the now popular accusation rests, that the narrative in Genesis requires you to admit that, because a "miraculously talking reptile persuaded an inconceivably constituted woman, six thousand years ago, to eat an actual apple, men, women and children of the nineteenth century are accursed of God," that is, are liable, for Adam's sin, to the doom of endless misery in hell. The Power of darkness, who was so active in the temptation of Adam, seems, as an inspirer of perverse interpretations of Scripture, to have been equally active in suggesting false comments upon the record of temptation. The old falsehood has been steadily repeated, age after age, "Ye shall not surely die, for God doth know" that the tree of knowledge is the tree of life, and man is deathless, quite apart from his conduct to his Maker. It is those unwritten traditions, widely held in Christendom, which now in their results are making void the revelation of God in Christ for the modern world. If you persist in foisting into the narrative of the fall of man the devil's psychology concerning Adam's nature and destiny, and with it the atrocious doctrine of an hereditary immortality of sin and misery for Adam's infant posterity as the legal consequence of his transgression, and make this the foundation of Christianity, as the old Greek and Latin theologians have done, then men will first declare, as we now hear, that the narrative in Genesis is an old world fable, and next they will logically reject the teaching of Christ and his apostles, who build redemption itself upon that narrative as a literal history. Let us not deceive ourselves, gentlemen; the logical and necessary alternative now is to accept the Bible pretty much as it stands, apart from the drier specialities of the Augustinian theology—or infidelity, descending steadily to Atheism; for it has come to that at last, as has long been foreseen by many.

There is surely nothing irrational or absurd in the idea of the creation of a being holding relations with both earth and heaven, both with the animal world and with the Creator, and placed on his trial to determine his destiny, either to ascend into the rank of permanent existences through spiritual union with God by faith, or to descend to the rank of transitory creatures who were incapable of knowing and loving the Creator. And this is all that appears on the face of the narrative, or from any subsequent revelation. The Holy of Holies represented the lost Paradise.

If we examine closely the history of the consequences resulting from the disobedience of our first parents, through whom it is falsely said that we have become "guilty and accursed of God," it is seen at once, as was pointed out seventeen centuries ago by Irenæus, the scholar of Polycarp, the disciple of John the divine, in his second book on Heresies, that God pronounced no curse whatever on Adam or on Eve after their transgression, much less on their posterity. It is said that God "cursed the ground for Adam's sake,' cursed it with comparative sterility, so as to demand extraordinary toil in its cultivation. The lightning passed from the head of Adam to the soil, whence he should draw his sustenance. Similarly, there is no single word of a "curse" pronounced on Eve. The life-penalty of her offence was sorrow in child bearing: but child-bearing itself was a blessing, not a curse. The curse turned aside from her, also, and descended on the Serpent-deceiver. The ground and the serpent were accursed, but not Adam and Eve. They were both to undergo the death-penalty, and to "return to the dust whence they were taken," and thus were "constituted sinners;" but first, the penalty was deferred, and, secondly, in the very act of sentencing them to death, God spake a word of hope and restoration through the "seed of the woman." And then it was that Adam called his wife by a new name, Evah, or Life, because she was to be the mother of a world of living beings, which would never have existed but for the promised "Seed of the woman," and the suspension of the sentence. Their continued life was itself a sign of the pardoning mercy of God, abstaining from the infliction of the threatening that "in the day" of their transgressions they should "surely die." The postponement of death rendered possible the existence of mankind, and the birth of their deliverer who should crush the serpent's head."

Thus there is not an inch of standing ground in the narrative for the pretence that it represents "men, women and children of the nineteenth century as guilty and accursed of God," in the Augustinian sense, because a "miraculously talking reptile persuaded an inconceivably constituted woman to take an actual apple six thousand years ago." Such criticism, however sincere, is not only false, but, I submit, pernicious in the highest degree, as secretly undermining the foundations of popular faith in the revelation of redemption, and in that Covenant of mercy under which, and not under a curse, mankind is born into the world.

If, next, we turn to consider the results of the transgression recorded in the Genesis-fragment, probably of antediluvian antiquity, we find first of all a statement that the sense of shame and nakedness entered into the human world with sin, and as the effect of it. Few features in the narrative have been more steadily derided than this, that both man and woman were created in a state of nakedness, and that the sense of outward shame began only with the sense of transgression, leading to the first attempt at imperfect clothing. No ridicule has been more inconsiderate and superficial. The account given in Genesis is at least a striking solution of a problem under atheistic views, hopelessly insoluble. Think of it. The whole world of living creatures is either unclothed, or, if dressed in pinmore or fur, is so dressed by nature for protection from the weather, or for flight, or for beauty, and not as a remedy for any shame at exposure of the body or any part of it. There is no trace of this feeling in the animal world throughout all its ranks. Even our nearest analogues, the most unsightly anthropoids, are destitute of any similar instinct of self-concealment. The majestic form of man in its normal development, the beautiful form of woman, are the transcendent works of the supreme Artificer, the supreme Sculptor, the supreme Painter. Human art has followed these achievements for ages, in the Vatican Apollo, in the Venus of Milo, in the paintings of Titian, in limping imitation of a perfection of form and color whose living glory no work in marble or on canvas can equal.

Whence the irresistible instinct through which the most noble and beautiful forms in the whole world clothe themselves from view, just in proportion as culture and civilization render them more majestic and more beautiful? and in a world where all the rest of animated nature is "naked, and is not ashamed"? The fact is indisputable. Not the most infidel or the most beautiful nation of Europe, in its finest, warmest climate, could possibly venture to live one day absolutely unclothed. Absolute public nudity is itself a synonym for disgrace and shameless vice in all nations and ages. Even the half-nakedness of modern fashion, and of the theatrical display is condemned by the public conscience. Let those who ridicule the narrative in Genesis be pleased to give us some account of this phenomenon. Clothing is not merely for warmth, for the fact of shame remains in the sunniest lands; and when savages in hot countries are raised to a higher level of intelligence, they clothe themselves anew, by a revived instinct, just as do Europeans or Asiatics. Will anyone assign a more rational account of this extraordinary exception to the rule of nature among living creatures than this—that the sense of shame in nakedness, the outward crimson blush at exposure of the person, the impulse to hide and cover, entered with sin, with sin of a crimson dye, entered when the ancestors of the race had cause to be inwardly ashamed of themselves) and that this sense of shame is the perpetual mark of the truth of this narrative; just as the tremendous and abnormal evils of mankind regarded as a historic whole, and the still more tremendous and thoroughly exceptional infliction denounced on woman—however varying with climate—equally confirm our faith in the Mosaic account of the circumstances attending the first origin of our race and nature.

We now arrive at the last point in the history—the temptation by the Serpent. So heavily has the difficulty been felt of what is called this "miraculously talking reptile," that I suppose the prevailing mode of explaining this incident in the history of the fall, even by those who do not reject the historical reality of Adam and Eve, is by resorting to the notion that there was no serpent at all concerned in the transaction, any more than in Christ's temptation by the devil; but that this reptile name was assigned allegorically to an invisible spirit, who did not in any way appear, but who enforced the temptation presented by the tree of knowledge of good and evil by his murderous suggestions. There is no doubt that under this view the essential elements of the narrative may be preserved intact, and the foundation of Christian faith remain unshaken, against the assaults of honest unbelievers. But, after paying the utmost attention to these allegorical hypotheses of interpretation, I confess that I follow the majestic intelligence of Milton, rather than modern critics, in thinking that a deeper study of the case will enable and compel us to hold fast to the literal and natural interpretation here also. But I frankly admit that we do not expect to persuade any one to adopt this old fashioned conclusion who does not accept the following premisses as a basis of argument.

1. That the narrative, as a whole, in Genesis iii., of the recent creation and trial of Adam in Paradise, is a true story, contradicted by nothing that is really ascertained by modern science—and that there is no more reason a priori for converting into an allegory one part of the narrative than the other.

2. That it is necessary, in order to do justice to any part of the Scripture of the Old and New Testaments, to bring the light thrown by the Bible as a whole, as a record of the work of God, on to each special portion of it. I am prepared to defend the Bible as a whole, as the record of a divine revelation concerning the history, state, and destiny of man—but I cannot thoroughly defend, apart from the whole of the Bible, any single portion of it. Just as the study of the solar system as a whole persuades me of this truth, which the senses cannot discern, that the earth is a globe and one of the planets, and moves round the sun as a centre with other sister worlds; so I can rationally defend the whole Bible, if I believe in the connected series of its revelations, but not otherwise.

3. The third premise or basis of argument on which I proceed, therefore, is the acceptance of the mysterious Scripture doctrine of fallen angels, with one mighty adversary of truth and right at the head of them, the mortal enemy of mankind and the permitted tempter for a short season of the servants of God.

Grant these three premisses, and I think we can defend victoriously the history of the serpent in Genesis, apart from these premisses we must abandon the story to the allegorizers, at least in this particular.—Edward White.

NAMAKKAL, April 19, 1883.

Editor of the Bible Banner:

In commencing another year, I must humbly and thankfully lift up my heart, and say, "Hitherto has the Lord helped me." During the whole of the last year, I, by the mercy of God enjoyed excellent health, and have been permitted to labor in this part of God's vineyard. The last year is to be considered as the chief epoch of my ministerial life. It was at this period that I first commenced to publish openly the doctrine advocated by the "Conditional Immortality Association," which I had previously adopted, and which I have extensively proclaimed through our monthly tract the "Bible Banner." At the same time I have traveled and preached the good news of the kingdom of our Lord in several distant towns and villages which I had never seen before. Now I am glad to say that the light of truth shines more and more, like a morning sun, and I trust it will continue unto the perfect day.

I have been universally known among the Christians in Southern India, as the pastor who says the soul of man is not immortal, and it will be finally destroyed in hell and those who have faith in Christ only shall possess the eternal life. My present connection with the Mission is nominal. I am virtually excommunicated from the orthodox churches. Their hearts, their pulpits, and everything that constitutes the real Christian union are closed against me, while they speak smoothly with me. I anticipate the time will not be very far to give up entirely my connection with them. My trust is only in the Lord, who provides, guides, and does all things for me and my family.

My desire and prayer to the Lord is to go out free to publish the gospel of the kingdom and life only in Christ. I feel impressed always to leave my stated ministry in connection with the Mission and travel and teach in different places as an itinerant. Again I am very sorry to say that I am greatly belied and misrepresented by my opponents which I bear with Christian fortitude.

The following lines are extracts of my journal for the months of January and February 1883.

Jan. 1st. Preached as usual in two places where my Christians were gathered, and in the evening exhorted the people who came to my house to pay their New Year's visit and prayed with them. Praise be to the Lord who once more permitted me to see this special occasion.

2d. Some educated women wished to know the life and advent truths published in the Bible Banner, which I taught them. They said, "What you teach is plain, and most consistent to the Scriptures, but our pastor preaches against your teaching and admonishes us to beware of the heretical doctrines which are sown amongst us." In the evening had been to the meeting of the local Auxiliary Bible Society. There was a good gathering of the European, Eurasian, and native gentlemen. The meeting was conducted in English. Rev. Organ, the secretary of the Madras Bible Society gave a splendid speech. Rs. 100 were collected at the close of the meeting.

3d. Called on some friends in their houses. A heathen Sudra discussed with me on "Vedantism versus Christianity." I repeated from memory some vedantic verses, and proved that his religious system was far inferior to the pure and plain teaching of the Bible.

4th. Two matriculated Christian students came from Tinnevelly Mission, to see me. They had previously heard about my teaching on life and immortality in Christ only. They first asked me, "Is it true that you teach that the punishment of the wicked in hell will not be eternal." I taught them from the Scriptures concerning the approaching advent of Christ and life in him only. They asked me for tracts on the subject. I gave them some Tamil and English tracts which they promised to distribute among the students in their college.

6th. Taught some people at Vadasery. A schoolmaster told me that certain schoolmasters, who regularly read our Tamil Bible Banner remarked thus, "What Rev. Masillamani teaches in his little books is all true, and compatible with the Scriptures; but if we openly acknowledge them we will be dismissed from the mission work. To obtain the eternal life, we are to believe his instructions; but to get monthly salary we must believe what the missionaries teach."

7th. A young man wished me to teach him the truths pertaining to the personal coming of our Lord, the resurrection of the dead and his literal kingdom on earth. He walked with me two miles toward my next station, and listened with good attention to what I taught him.

10th. Last evening my dear wife was taken ill. I had often prayed to God respecting her hour of confinement. After a most severe travail at about nine o'clock in the morning she was delivered of a male child, which died a few minutes after its birth. My wife narrowly escaped the last enemy, death. I was depending upon God for her life every moment. She was given back to me as from the dead. I had not a single rash in hand, for the necessities of this day. I had never before been so poor at the commencement of the year. My trust was only in the Lord. A sister gave me one rupee on account of my wife's illness. Thus the Lord who had hitherto supplied us continued to provide for our present necessities at this time of affliction.

21. Being the Lord's day, preached both times at Vadasery. Read and explained the B. B. No. 5 to the people who assembled in the chapel. Taught in the evening two educated women. They remarked, "Although we have often read the Bible and heard many sermons of our native pastor, and other preachers, we were all this time quite ignorant of these most important truths. They seem to us to be new revelations of the Bible and we wish to know more about these things."

22. I was informed of two meetings held on the previous day, where the doctrine of immortality was largely discussed. In both these places there were advocates for conditional immortality. One of the members who holds a respectable post in the mission, and who was once against my teaching, said, "This doctrine of conditional immortality and life only in Christ as advocated in the Bible Banner, is more consistent to reason and the Scripture. Why don't the missionaries endeavor to refute the doctrine if they have found it false and unscriptural? In case the mission salaries be discontinued there will be many adherents to this Conditional Immortality Association."

Feb. 1st. In the morning taught some educated Christians and Sudras. One of them was a catechist. He heard me for two hours and remarked, "These are the Scripture truths which our Christians ought to know. Why do the missionaries oppose those who teach such glorious truths. For my part I now preach on this subject only, and the people also like to hear it. Evening accompanied Bro. N.; preached in the street at Thirupathiapuram. The heathens there listened to our words with good attention. One man said, "A few others and I in this village do not worship the idols now. We now serve the only true God." We taught the heathen school children and the schoolmaster received us very kindly.

5th. Received some valuable books from the Scriptural Tract Repository, Boston, America. I most respectfully present my hearty thanks to the most illustrious and devoted servant of God, Mr. H. L. Hastings, for such valuable books as "Hudson's Greek and English Concordance," "Young's Analytical Concordance," "The Family Bible," "The Faith Series," "The Home Series," "The Great Controversy between God and Man," etc., to the Bible Banner Association for the "Life Everlasting," by Mr. Pettingell, and to Mr. F. L. Piper for "The Reign of Christ on Earth." These very excellent books greatly help me to advance in the true knowledge of the Holy Bible, which I have now made the chief subject of my daily study.

11th. Preached in the morning at Vadaseri and Dennisparam. My text was Prov. xi. 24. Evening Bro. N. and I had a discussion of the life question with Rev. J. D., the senior missionary here. "I am very sorry to hear that you openly preach to the heathen the mortality of the soul and the final destruction of the wicked in hell," said he. "We teach the plain Bible truth, life and immortality in Christ only," was our reply. "No," added he, "you teach that the soul is not immortal." "Yes," said we, "the Bible teaches of God, "who only hath immortality," but it says nothing about the inherent immortality of man. "No," said he again, "God created the man as immortal." How does the Bible then teach, "Man will perish?" was our question. "It means the body will perish, but not the soul," was his reply. "Does this not contradict the plain saying of the Bible, 'the soul that sinneth will die,' 'God will destroy both soul and body in hell'?" inquired we. "Death by sin is meant by this," was his answer. Again he said, "You may teach this to the Christians, but not to the heathen, which gives them room to dispute with our catechists. The old missionaries did not teach you these things." We concluded saying, "Life in Christ and his literal kingdom on earth as well as repentance and remission of sins in his name were the chief topics of the preaching of Christ and his apostles."

In closing this report I must heartily render my thanks to God for his manifold mercies. I have also to acknowledge my best thanks to Mr. E. A. Chaplin, the editor of THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Indiana, for sending me regularly his most instructive and interesting paper, THE RESTITUTION, wishing to know the name of the friend who buys it for me. The Bible Banner comes to my hands, and I am greatly benefited by reading it.

With my hearty regards to yourself and the other friends of the Bible Banner Association, I remain yours in the Lord.—C. Masillamani.

[We republish the above interesting communication from the Bible Banner published in Philadelphia. We are glad to learn that the paper reaches our dear fellow laborer in the truth in Hindostan. The sister who pays for THE RESTITUTION to be sent to Br. M. is Mrs. Jane Ballabach of Argos, Ind. She will be glad to learn that the paper reaches its distant destination, and that it is kindly received and appreciated. If it would not be asking too much from our dear fellow laborer in the gospel, we should be glad indeed if he could favor us with at least one communication some time during the year. May the Lord bless and sustain him in proclaiming the truth.—ED.]

ORANGE CITY, Fla.

Editor Restitution:

I am very much pleased and animated to read those letters in THE RESTITUTION that come from the Holy Land. The human mind seems to be so constituted that the least article or letter from a long absent friend is received with fondest embraces, and cherished as a souvenir of priceless value. And when we read a letter written on the very ground made sacred and hallowed by the footsteps of our blessed Savior, what emotions of joy thrill through the soul, especially when we compare the present status of that country and city, with the way-marks laid down in our chart descriptive of the last times just previous to our Lord's return, and the possession of our promised inheritance.

In reading Brother Winterstein's letter I find he says, if we have spiritual bodies we may go to Palestine without expense, but I believe none of us yet claim so great a boon. Therefore, for everything we do, some one must foot the bill. Our living costs money, our clothes and our rent demand the cash. Mrs. Davis and Brother Winterstein have not spiritual bodies. They are not in possession of the promised inheritance. The hard-fisted Jew, the cruel and oppressive Turk, or the landlord of whatever nationality, must have the money for the use of his house. Therefore, dear brethren and sisters, readers of these interesting letters from the land of our future inheritance, I wish to second the suggestion of Brother Winterstein, that the readers of THE RESTITUTION make up and forward to Mrs. Davis a sum sufficient to pay her coming year's rent. And to this end I agree to be one of ten to send the amount ($60.00), so that her mind may be relieved from this burden. Let us realize that Mrs. Davis is a stranger in a strange land, with no friends to sympathize with her except those friends she has made since she has been there, save the friend she has in Jesus. Let us realize that we shall soon stand as the judgment seat of our King, and that we shall not be pleased to hear: "Forasmuch as ye did it not to one of the least of these my brethren (or sisters), ye did it not to me."

Submitted in love to the brethren and sisters.

To the Brethren Scattered Abroad.

"Come over and help us."

CHICAGO, Ill.

Whereas this mighty, wicked city which putteth to shame Sodom and Gomorrah is lying in the darkness of the evil one, and the light of God's truth is so dimly shining, therefore it is deemed expedient to make an effort to scatter a few rays of gospel light "that a people for his name may be taken out" In order that the Bride may make herself ready I would herein appeal to the brethren for aid to establish and support a "Blessed Hope Mission" for preaching and distribution of tracts and papers. I am here in the city and earnestly desire to work for Jesus. I find a very few who are willing to connect themselves with mission work; that few, like myself, are poor, but willing to work in every opportunity and place. Now dear ones can you help in this mission work, will you invest in the Lord's five-twenties, have you one, two, five, ten or more dollars or less, that you can freely, cheerfully and prayerfully give to the work? When the day of making up the special treasure shall come, will not the Master say, "Come ye blessed of my Father?" Remember that bread scattered upon the water will return to you again.

Our plan is to procure a place for preaching and to engage all the talent we can command for teaching, Bible reading, distribution of tracts, cards, papers, etc., teaching the things concerning the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus the Christ, thus making ready a people for the Lord. Reports of progress will from time to time be published; also reports of finance, showing how the money has been expended. Let any, therefore, who feel disposed to aid, correspond with O. C. Ramsey, 250 Randolph St., Chicago, Ill., or C. H. Jones, 230 LaSalle St. Let us hear from you at once.

Yours in hope,
O. C. RAMSEY.

THY WILL BE DONE.

My God, my Father, while I stray
Far from my home on life's dull way,
O, teach me from my heart to say,
Thy will be done

Though rough and thorny be my lot,
I would be still, and murmur not,
But breathe a prayer, divinely taught,
Thy will be done.

If thou didst call me to resign
What most I prize, it ne'er was mine,
I only yield Thee what is thine,
Thy will be done.

Should pining sickness waste away
My life in premature decay,
My Father, still I strive to say,
Thy will be done

If but my fainting heart be blessed
With thy sweet Spirit for its guest,
My God, to thee I leave the rest:
Thy will be done.

Renew my will from day to day:
Blend it with thine, and take away
All that now makes it hard to say,
Thy will be done.

Then when on earth I breathe no more
I'll sleep with those who've gone before,
Till waked to sing on that blest shore,
Thy will be done.

THE FIRST RESURRECTION.

The completion of the first resurrection introduces a wonderful change in the earth's history—The administration of immortal rulers—An epoch of strict incorrible justice—"Shepherdizing with a rod of iron"—A universal revolution—A great time coming—The completion of this resurrection promotes the subjects of it to a transcendent glory—The exultant statement analyzed—The bloodroyal of eternity—Their exalted place and occupation—Following up the victory—The mistake of spiritualizing expositors.

The completion of this first resurrection introduces a wonderful change in the earth's history. It is the breaking through of an immortal power;—a power which sweeps away, as chaff before the wind, the whole economy of mortal and dragon rule, and threats to death and hades every one found rising up or stiffening himself against it;—a power which shears the old serpent of his strength, binds him with a great chain, locks and seals him up in the abyss, pulls down all his works, tears off and clears away all his hoary falsehoods, which have been oppressing, deceiving, misleading, and swaying the world to its destruction for so many ages;—a power which gives to the nations new, just, and righteous laws, in the administration of immortal rulers, whose good and holy commands men must obey or die;—a power which cuts at once the cords of life for every dissembling Ananias and Sapphira, blasts every Nadab and Abihu that ventures to offer strange fire before the Lord, consigns to death and burning every Achan that covets the Babylonish garment or wedge of gold which God hath pronounced accursed, and causeth the earth to open her mouth and swallow up on the spot every Korah, Dathan, and Abiram that dares to open his mouth against the authority of the holy princes whom Jehovah hath ordained.

It will be the manifestation of a power which grasps hold of the plutho-ic fortunes accumulated in meanness and oppression and hold in greedy avarice for the pampering of lust and pride, hewing them down in righteousness and scattering them in restitutions to those out of whom they have been so uncharitably and dishonestly ground and wrung;—a power which goes forth in vindication of the worthy poor, the oppressed, the weak, the friendless and the downtrodden, the righting of their cause, the maintenance of their just claims and the enforcement of truth and brotherhood between man and man;—a power which lifts the mask from deceit, pretence, and false show, puts each one in his true place, according to what he really is, gives credit only where credit is due, stamps an effectual condemnation on all false weights and measures, and tries everything and everybody in the balances of a strict and infallible justice.

I think of the coming in of that power,—of the havoc it must needs make in the whole order of things,—of the confusion it will cause in the depraved cabinets, and courts, and legislatures of the world,—of the revolution it must work in business customs, in corporation managements, in mercantile and manufacturing, fraude, in the lies and hollowness which pervade social life,—of the changes it must bring into churches, into pulpits, into pews, into worship, into schools, into the newspapers, into book-making and book-reading, into thinking and philosophy, and into all the schemes, enterprises, judgments, pursuits, and doings of men,—of how it will effect literature, art, science, architecture, eating, drinking, sleeping, working, recreation, —of what it must do concerning playhouses, and tumblers, and gambling hells, and the unhallowed gains by which many people have their living and keep themselves up in the world.

SHEPHERDS VISITING WITH A ROD OF IRON.

And as I thus begin to realize in imagination what the irresistible enforcement of a true and righteous administration in all these directions and relations necessarily implies, I can see why the Book of God describes it as a shepherdizing with a rod of iron, and calls it a breaking like the dashing to pieces of an article of pottery. Think of the sudden collapse of all the haunts of sin, the routing out of the nests and nurseries of iniquity, the clearing away of the marshes and bogs of crime, where every style of damning pestilence is bred, and the changes that must hence come;—think of the summary abolition of all infamous cliques, combinations and rings,—political rings, whisky rings, municipal rings, state rings, railroad rings, mercantile rings, communistic, and other rings,—all the children of wickedness, hindering just law, suppressing moral right, crippling honest industry, subsidizing legislation, corrupting the press, robbing the public treasuries, eating up the gains of honorable occupation, perverting public sentiment, spotting and ostracising men who cannot be made the tools of party, transmuting selfish greed and expediency into principle, subverting the dominion of virtue and intelligence, subordinating the common weal to individual aggrandizement, and setting all righteous administration at defiance.

ALL EVIL BROUGHT TO LIGHT.

Think of the universal and invincible dragging forth to divine justice of every blatant infidel, perjurer, liar, profane swearer, drunkard, drunkard-maker, whor monger, hypocrite, slanderer, trickster, cheat, thief, murderer, trader in uncleanness, truce-breaker, traitor, traitor, oppressor of the poor, bribe-taking legislator, time-serving preacher, mal-practioner, babe-destroyer, friend-robber, office-usurper, peace-disturber, and life-embitterer; think of the instantaneous going forth into all the world of a divine and unerring force, which cannot be turned or avoided, but which bows down every fruitless tree, purges away all chaff from every floor, negatives all unrighteous laws, overwhelms all unrighteous traffic, destroys all unrighteous coalitions, burns up every nest of infamy and sin, ferrets out all concealed wickedness, exposes and punishes all empty pretence, makes an end of all unholy business, and puts an effectual stop to all base fashions, all silly conceits, all questionable customs, and all the hollow shams and corrupt show and fastidiousness of what calls itself society, transferring the dominion of the almighty dollar to Almighty right, and reducing everything in human life, pursuits, manners, and professions to the standard of right truth and justice.

A UNIVERSAL REVOLUTION.

Think of the tremendous revolution, in all that the eye can see, the ear hear, the hand touch, the heart feel, or earthly being realize, that must needs attend the putting into living practical force of such an administration,—the high it must make low, the famous it must make infamous, the rich it must make poor, the mighty it must make powerless, the loud it must sink to oblivion, the admired and worshipped it must turn to disgrace and abhorrence, and the despised and contempted poor it must lift into place and respectability,—the different impulse under which every wheel must then turn, every shuttle move, every hammer strike, every foot step, every mind calculate, and every heart beat;—the change that must come over the houses we enter, over the streets we walk, over the people we meet, over the words we pronounce, over the food we eat, over the air we breathe, over the repose of the night, over the spirit of our waking hours, and the very dreams of our slumbers, and over all the elements, relations, activities and experiences which go to make up what we call life;—think, I say, of all this tremendous revolution, and conceive it going into invincible effect, unchangeably, without compromise, at once, and for ever; and you may begin to have some idea of the alteration which the first resurrection is to introduce into the history of our earth. For this, and nothing less, is the meaning of this sitting on thrones, receiving power and judgment, shepherdizing the nations, and reigning on the earth, on the part of those blessed and holy immortals.

A GOOD TIME COMING.

And a good thing it will be for the nations when that day comes. There can be nothing better than God's law. There can be nothing more just, more reasonable, more thoroughly or wisely adapted to all the well-being of man and the highest wholesomeness of human society. All the blamedness in the universe is built upon it. All that is needed for the establishment of a holy and happy order is for men to obey that law, for it to be put in living force, for it to be incarnated in the feelings, actions, and lives of men. And this is what is to be effected when "the children of the resurrection" get their crowns, and go into power, with Christ the All-Ruler at their head. They are to shepherdize, and deal with the nations, and with all that make up the nations, as unerring and immortal kings and priests to direct, instruct, and feed them with all the loving care of angels, but with a "rod of iron" in their hands to enforce docility, obedience, and unreserved surrender to all the laws and the requirements of the Lord God Almighty. And under this reign shall be fulfilled what the prophets have prophesied, and sung in golden numbers, about the peace and blessedness which is in reserve for this sin-hurt and long down-trodden inheritance of man. You may call it Judaism, if you like; you may sneer at it as fantastical conceit; you may denounce it as a carnal dream; you may brand it as heresy: but it is nevertheless the truth of God, to which you, and I, and all men, are inexorably bound; and which has every prospect of becoming experimental fact before this century has passed away. I hail its coming, and I bid it welcome, as the great hope and regeneration of our depraved and misgoverned world.

TRANSCENDENT GLORY.

The completion of this resurrection promotes the subjects of it to a transcendent glory. Saintship means honor. It is not so in this present world. The greatest of the apostles, with all his great achievements and sublime experiences, was compelled to say, "If in this life only we have hope of Christ, we are of all men the most miserable." 1 Cor. xv. 19. The great Master of all told his disciples from the beginning, "If ye were of the world, the world would love his own, but because ye are not of the world, but I have chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hateth you." John xv. 19. The unregenerate heart does not like the gospel philosophy and the gospel requirements; and whilst it continues unregenerate, it has no favors for those who defend and live it, and insist on its acceptance as the only hope for man. Hence the history of the church, wherever it has been truest, purest, and most itself is a book of martyrs. But "the resurrection of the just" brings the people of God their compensation. "Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the resurrection the first! Over these the second death has no power, but they shall be priests of the God and of the Christ, and reign with him a thousand years."

ANALYZE THE EXULTANT STATEMENT.

First of all, they are partakers of resurrection, the first resurrection, the blessed resurrection. Not all of them actually suffer death. Such of them as are alive, and remaining, and ready, when the time comes, are "caught up," translated, carried off into the resurrection life, without dying at all. But the translation in those instances is the equivalent of the resurrection. It is the same change to incorruption and immortality, not from the grave indeed, but from mortal life, and so is included in the one term, which means, that to all of them alike, a power is vouchsafed which strikes from every one of them forever every vestige of the old slavery to corruption, death, or mortal disability. More living again, great and wonderful as that is, is the smallest part of the matter. By the prophets, by Christ, and by the apostles, some were recalled to life, resuscitated, made to live again after they were dead, and yet died again as men ordinarily die, the same as if they had never been recalled from death. The living again in this case involves a far "better resurrection" even the renewal of the whole corporeal being, re-fashioned to a heavenly model with heavenly qualities, and to a vastly sublimer life than ever was enjoyed before;—a resurrection, in which corruption puts on incorruption, dishonor puts on glory, weakness puts on power, and the earthly body becomes a spirit body, lifted quite out of the sphere of earthly life, and over which neither the first death nor the second has any further power. Having been "accounted worthy to attain that world," they "neither marry nor are given in marriage; neither can they die any more; for they are equal unto the angels; and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection." Luke xx. 35, 36.

They are holy. They were holy in their lives and aims while they lived in the flesh. They had "the testimony of Jesus," and "the word of God," and confessed it ever against a gainsaying world, and held it fast against persecution and death, and willingly suffered the loss of all things, counting them but refuse and offal, rather than let go their confession and hope in Christ Jesus. They were the salt of the earth and the light of the world, the golden candlesticks of eternal truth in the realm of abounding sin and darkness, yet never content with that to which they had attained, but ever reaching forth unto still higher and better things, and, like the Olympian racers, pressed toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God. Reviled, persecuted, and accounted the very off-scourings of the world, because of their faith, devotion and self-sacrifice for their Savior and his cause, they resented not, but counted it all joy, and were exceeding glad, sure that it was working for them a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory. Many of them were tortured, not accepting deliverance, that they might obtain the better resurrection; and others had trial of cruel mockings and scourgings, of bonds and imprisonments, were stoned, sawn asunder, tempted, and slain with the sword, wandered about in sheepskins and goatskins, being destitute, afflicted, tormented, of whom the world was not worthy.

But consecrated and set apart to God as his servants and light-bearers in their earthly lifetime, they are a hundredfold holier now. Released for ever from the death-working law in their fleshly members, their whole being has come under the power of a complete and unattemptable sanctification, which consecrates them to a sublime and unapproachable holiness, to which dwellers in the flesh must stand in greater awe than ever was called for in the sublimest of earthly kings or the most sacred of Jewish high priests; a holiness which inspires while it awes, which attracts while it reproves and condemns, and which lifts and assures those whom it strikes with humiliation and dread. When Isaiah saw the Lord sitting upon his Almighty throne, and the seraphim with covered faces round about him saying, Holy, Holy, Holy, is the Lord God of Sabaoth, he fell down and cried, "Woe is me! for I am undone; because I am a man of unclean lips, and dwell among a people of unclean lips." Isa. vi. 1-5. And something of this same awful holiness is then to appear in the immortal kingpriests of this resurrection, before which men and angels will veil their eyes in reverence; for in them and through them God will set his glory among the nations, and all the earth shall be filled with it. Exod. xxix. 21; Isa. vi. 3.

There is a great and awful majesty of consecration in a true child of God even while living and walking here in the flesh. To the outward eye and carnal view there is but little that is special. The thoughtful brow, the sober mien, the dignified behavior, the reserved and careful utterance, the keeping aloof from the world's wild pleasures and galeties, and the solemn regard for holy names and holy things, along with a calm and firm confession of the truth as it is in Jesus, is about all that can be externally noticed. But his name is in the books of heaven. He is there enrolled as a celestial citizen and prince. The angels are ministers and servants to him. He is allied by regeneration to the blood-royal of eternity. He is marked with the name and sacrament of the King eternal, immortal, and invisible. He has upon him an unction from the Holy One, consecrated him for transfiguration to supernal principality. He is brother and joint-heir with him who sits enthroned at the right hand of eternal Majesty, and who is presently to be revealed as the King of kings and Lord of lords. The very ground on which he treads takes on sacredness from his presence. The Holy Ghost dwells in his body, breathes in his breath, walks in his steps, and speaks in his words. Through that Savior in whom he trusts, he is already in a measure a divine man, partaker of the divine nature. All of which shall be made complete, manifest and visible when he comes forth in the sublime sanctity of the first resurrection; for "blessed and holy is he that hath part in the resurrection the first."

EXALTED PLACE AND OCCUPATION.

Further, they have very exalted place and occupation. John saw them seated on thrones. He beheld them endowed with judgeship. He pronounces them kings and priests. They share in the administration of government. They reign with Christ. Their business is to shepherdize spiritually. These things all tell of official relations and prerogatives. They are not mere names and empty titles. The saints know no sinecures. No meaningless ceremonials or hollow designations find place in heaven. Nothing is there but substantial realities. The children of the resurrection are no sham kings, and no mock judges, but everything which these high titles and offices imply. They are not co-regents and co-shepherdizers with Christ, without being and doing what such words import and express. The dignity is transcendently exalted, but it is all real; and the reality of the offices necessitates the reality of the activities which pertain to them. I said that saintship means honor; but saint-means duty, activity, work, not idleness, not quiescence. There is no heaven for laziness; much less is heaven made up of it. Not for parade badges, but for corresponding services, do the children of this resurrection get their dignities.

THE PLACE AND WORK OF KINGS.

As kings, they are to fill the places and do the work of kings. As judges, they are to judge and administer justice. As priest-regents, they are charged with the cares and duties of royal priesthood. They not only have the name and place of sovereigns, but they reign, as truly and really as ever Saul, or David, or Solomon reigned. The end of their salvation is not to sit on clouds or sing psalms, or to luxuriate in the idle bliss of an eternal languor or ecstacy. They are redeemed and glorified for sublime offices and the work pertaining to those offices. The life of Christ in heaven is an intensely busy one. He is administering the kingdom of the universe. When the present dispensation ends he will deliver up that kingdom to the Father, and enter upon a new and particular administration of his own, in which the children of the resurrection are to be joined with him, as angels are now associated with him in the administration of the kingdom of the Father, yea, in a still closer union.

FOLLOWING UP THE VICTORY.

The work to be done is the shepherdizing of the nations with a rod of iron,—the following up of the victory of the great day of God Almighty, putting in force the rule of eternal right and justice where the blasting rule of the Dragon has so perverted things and held disastrous sway for so many ages. For this they have their thrones. For this judgment is put into their hands. For this they are lifted high above the infirmities of mortal life. For this they are perfected in holiness and invested with such divine and awful consecration. And in this they have their honor and their blessedness. Through their completed redemption in Christ Jesus they came into such full harmony with the mind and will of God, into such living communion with their Redeemer, as to know no higher dignity or joy than to fill out the great administration of reducing the mortal survivors of the awful day to divine order, and to employ their immortal energies in tutoring the race from which they have sprung, till returned to that Paradise from which it has been in exile for 6000 years.

These are quite different ideas from those usually entertained about heaven. People spiritualise and explain away the great things of God's Revelation until the whole matter evaporates in their hands, and the true Christian hope vanishes into insipidity and nothingness. They make ado about getting to heaven, but have lost all understanding of what it means. All the singing, the longing, and fond anticipation on the subject really amounts to very little more than going to see Jesus, to meet some departed friends, and to make the acquaintance of some distinguished people who once lived. Crowns are sometimes alluded to, but they are only fancy crowns, glittering shadows, empty dreams, badges without corresponding dignities, administrations without subjects, thrones to which nobody is amenable. They talk of rest; but rest is not heaven, any more than sleep is life.

THE MISTAKE OF SPIRITUALIZERS.

And the impossibility of finding realities with which to fill up the Scriptural images and descriptions of the final portion of the redeemed, on the part of those who spiritualise the first resurrection, is ample evidence of their tremendous mistake. They, in effect, abolish everything that makes heaven heaven, and all their pictures of futurity are simply the taking of God's ransomed kings into a world of shadows, to find their eternal bliss and ever-growing greatness in the league of songs, or the dreamy joys of an endless spiritual intoxication—all as impossible as it is unedifying to rational natures, or to beings invested with immortal powers. No, the joys and honors of the children of the resurrection are, that they are made kings and priests unto God and Christ, installed and endowed as immortal benefactors of the nations upon the earth, the governing lords, rulers, and invincible shepherds of a renewing and regained world, the everlasting guides, judges, and counselors of a redeemed race. So the word before us is; and to this outcome all the promises in the Book of God are tilted.—Dr. Seiss, in Israel's Watchman.

Editor Restitution:

Again I find myself prompted to give a few thoughts to the readers of our valuable paper, hoping that in doing so I may not be thought presumptuous. I have read with deep interest those articles on the "Parables" by our esteemed brother, Dr. E. C. Welch. In the last, the "Ten Virgins," it seems to me there are certain conclusions forced upon the expositor because of an unwarranted premise. He says, "Three parables may be distinctly recognized: 1. The Bridegroom's coming portrays Christ's advent; 2. The sleeping virgins, the waiting church; 3. The midnight cry, a divinely-commissioned herald distinct from the virgins."

I know it is generally conceded that the virgins represent the waiting church, but is this true? Does it harmonize with the oft repeated admonition to watch,—to have our loins girt about and to be like men that wait for their Lord? When Christ spake in parables, he took subjects or objects familiar to those whom he addressed, and with those he clothed some divine lesson. So far as I am able to learn from history, the custom at eastern weddings was not that a herald should give notice to the bride to go out to meet the bridegroom, but he, the bridegroom, went with his attendants to the home of the bride and there the marriage was celebrated; then he with the whole party of maidens and relatives started back for his home, and on their way back, they were joined by a party of maidens, the mutual friends of bride and groom, who joined in the procession to the house of the bridegroom where the marriage feast was celebrated, each one who was counted worthy receiving a wedding garment.

Now it seems to me very reasonable that the class, represented by those maidens are those who will be sleeping when the midnight cry is given, but they are not the bride. The bridegroom goes for her. She is not supposed to bear a torch in the procession. She is honored as the bride. She is under the protection of the bridegrooms, and together they receive the honors befitting the occasion. Instead of three parables are there not four? Let us reconsider the whole matter and I think we will not find it at all necessary to hold that the church will be sleeping or that Elijah will be sent to give the midnight cry. In three different places, Matt. xi. 14, xvii. 10-13, and Mark. ix. 13, Christ tells his disciples plainly that Elias had already come, and his disciples understood that he spake to them of John the Baptist. Let us search for the light of truth as for hidden treasure.

To the Friends of "The Restitution."

The cost of publishing THE RESTITUTION for the year just closed exceeded the receipts over $300. To repay this deficiency and secure means to publish the paper another year, we must raise, outside the regular subscription, at least $500. To secure that amount, the Board of Directors have requested me to appeal to each subscriber to contribute at least one dollar extra. This is not asked as a donation, but brethren are requested to send names of persons to whom they wish the paper sent, with their contributions and the paper will be sent to such persons in payment for the amounts sent by each.

There are a large number of brethren and sisters in different localities who are unable to pay for the paper, and who would be very glad of the privilege of reading it. These are known to Brother Chaplin, the Editor. I would suggest that brethren who have no one to whom they specially desire to send the paper, send their contributions to THE RESTITUTION office with a request that the paper be sent to some worthy Christian who will appreciate it, but who is unable to pay for it. In this way brethren will be able to gladden the hearts of many poor but honest good Christians, and at the same time help to furnish the means to keep the paper going.

The fund will be known as "Free Will Offerings." Let each reader of THE RESTITUTION make a small sacrifice, and contribute at least one dollar, always remembering that the many persons to whom the paper will be thus sent will thank and bless you, and your Heavenly Father will reward you.

A. B. DWIGGINS, President.

The Restitution.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXII. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, JULY 18, 1883. NO. 27.

THE RESTITUTION.
TERMS—TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR,
Payable in advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.
Address all Letters and Communications to THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." And means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked, eternally; life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

BR. IRISH PHASE OF THE EASTERN QUESTION.—No. 23.

Corroborative evidence continued—Early settlement of Israel in Spain, Ireland, Scotland, and England — Commercial intercourse between the Hebrews and Phœnicians—Speaking the Hebrew language—Israelites, removed to Central Asia, would be inclined to seek their brethren in the far west—Passing around the Roman empire they would be pushed to the north-west — Their tumuli.

Early settlement of Israel towards the west, Greece, Italy, Spain, Ireland, Scotland and England. A few supplementary thoughts will still more clearly confirm the existence of these early settlements. The propositions which we aim to establish are these: 1. More than 1200 years before Christ, some of the tribes of Israel began to associate with the Phœnicians in their commerce on the Great Sea. This continued to extend to the west and northwest during five centuries before the captivity of the ten tribes B. C. 720. During these five hundred years the Hebrews must have become quite familiar with all the countries along the coasts of the Mediterranean sea as well as those of the Atlantic ocean west of Spain, and those surrounding Ireland, Scotland and England.

2. With the view of mining, and carrying on various other occupations, such as agriculture, and all others necessary to the manufacture of various articles and their preparation and shipment to their own land, and to various other ports.

3. To do this there would be required a large resident population, villages and cities would spring up, and large colonies would be a legitimate result. These colonies would keep up a constant and familiar intercourse with their mother country, the land of Israel. Their condition would also be well known to those still residing in the parent land. There could be no other results.

4. When, therefore, the ten tribes were taken captive by the Assyrians, and deported into Central Asia, the events must have been well known to these colonies, and a deep sympathy felt in their misfortunes.

5. After residing some years in Media and Persia many would have a strong desire to visit their brethren in the west. To do this many companies would be formed, and together start for the far west—the ancient California of exiled Israel. Such a company is described in 2 Esdras xiii. 41–46, "Mankind", those being put for heathen.

6. In reaching these colonies they would be pushed towards the north and west to pass around the Roman empire: for their numbers and condition were not such as to enable them to force their way through the empire. They were afterwards driven further north by the Huns; hence they were called by the Romans North-men, Germen, Germans. Such would seem to be a true outline of their migrations and settlement in the West, and the reason for it.

There is nothing unreasonable in these six propositions. Are they true? Tradition sustains them. History also, as far as we have any. Neither does the Bible contradict them. Some believe that it fully corroborates history and tradition.

Let us now examine into the drift of their testimony.

Very little is said about the early sea-going, and commerce of the Israelites. History has much to do with the Phœnician trade on the great waters, since, however, the people of Israel and the Phœnicians dwelt in the same quarter of the globe, and made use of the same language. Foreign historians, not knowing any distinction, would naturally call them by one name; and as Phœnicia was a name more familiar, they could give them the title of Phœnicians. When we read of the commerce of that people, we do not know what nationality is intended. Where, then, did the Phœnicians go in their ships? With the Red Sea, the Mediterranean Sea, and the Atlantic coast between Southwestern Spain and the Highlands of Scotland the Phœnicians were quite familiar. Dan's tribe-ship, with about two thirds of the other tribes, had his western border on the coast of the Great Sea. His proximity to Tyre and Sidon made his traffic with the Phœnicians very easy and lucrative. Learning the success of Dan, the enterprising of the maritime tribes associated their fortunes with his, and entered into the commercial business, and continued that occupation from about 1295 B. C. to 710 B. C. A: that time the Assyrians were invading the kingdom of Israel. Some of the inhabitants escaped to Egypt by sea. Others fled to more northern and western countries. About 20 years after the captivity into Assyria took place—B. C. 720. During these 555 years the Hebrew traffic was extending westward, and colonies were planted, and grew up under Hebrew laws, language, manners and customs. Dan seems to have been the leading tribe, since its name, in some form, is attached to so many places and objects.

Before we follow these refugees of B. C. 710 to the western island let us go with them into Egypt. Hosea says of those times Hos. ix. 3, 6, "Ephraim shall return to Egypt," "Egypt shall gather them up, Memphis shall bury them." Memphis is in the vicinity of the Pyramids. After the Assyrian captivity had commenced, the Israelites (refugees) gained great influence in Egypt and were honored in their burial.

Their government was changed by the choice of twelve kings, (to represent the twelve tribes); among whom, says Herodotus, they divided the different districts of Egypt. Egypt was divided into twelve communes during the lifetime of these refugees, which were of the twelve tribes of Israel. These twelve kings built the celebrated labyrinth near lake Moris, composed of twelve covered courts, six towards the north, and six toward the south; three thousand apartments, fifteen hundred under ground and fifteen hundred above, of incredible grandeur and beauty; but now covered with sand.

They did not there remain: "He shall not return into the land of Egypt." Hos. xi. 5. The Egyptian commonwealth being dissolved, Psammitacus, one of the twelve, obtained the supreme command; Ephraim then left Egypt for another home.

Let us now follow the Hebrews westward under the lead of Dan in his ships, in the pursuit of the wealth of other lands, extending their colonies towards the west.

The Ionian Republic with its twelve states or tribes, resembling the Israelitish government, was formed under Israel's rule. It is said that the Ionians have striking characteristics of Israel. They were personally handsome, and their situation charming. These Ionian Islands were not in the far west; still they were far enough from the land of Israel to point out the direction of the colonization movements.

Greece, during those 555 years, was also visited by the Israelites. Of this we have many proofs: 1. The Greek alphabet seems to have grown out of the Hebrew. From the Hebrew Aleph, we have the Greek Alpha; Heb. Beth, Gr. Beta; Heb. Gimel, Gr. Gamma, etc. These Israelitish teachers, coming from Phœnicia, would be called Phœnicians. The following testimony comes from high authority. a. "Of all the heroic families in Greece none was more heroic than that of the Dan-aus of Argos." — Dr. Wm. Smith. b. "The Dan-aus were a people of great learning and wealth; they left Greece after a battle with the Assyrians, and went to Ireland and also to Denmark, and called it Dan-marca, Dan's country."—Keating's History of Ireland. c. "The Danaus were a highly civilized people, well skilled in architecture and other arts from their long residence in Greece, and their intercourse with the Phœnicians. Their first appearance in Ireland was 1290 B. C., 26 years after the great victory of Deborah."—Annals of Ireland.

Humboldt thinks that the Greeks included the Hebrews in the term Phœnician, and holds that Ireland was, at an early day, Israelitish.

The following is from Dr. Latham, the celebrated European Ethnologist. "I think that the Pœnymus of the Argive Danais was no other than that of the Israelite tribe of Dan: only we are so used to confine ourselves to the soil of Palestine in our considerations of the Israelites, that we treat them as if they were adscripti glebæ and ignore the share they may have taken in the history of the world." This remark is very reasonable. It is by no means probable that a tribe so enterprising as that of Dan, when aided by maritime Israel, and the Phœnicians of Tyre and Sidon, with all their merchant princes could have navigated the great seas during five and one half centuries, visiting every port, and carrying on an extended commerce with the great northwest, without leaving his name and his colonies every where within the boundaries of his extended traffic. See what has been done in the United States since the landing of the pilgrims on Plymouth Rock.

Mr. Gladstone in his "Homer and the Homeric Age," remarks that the phrase Dan-oi occurs 147 times in the Iliad, and 13 times in the Odessy; that it never occurs in the singular; that Homer used it as a standing appellation as we use the word Cambrian for a Welshman, or Caledonian for a Scotchman, or Gael for a Highlander, or Son of Albion for an Englishman.

Passing westward along the Mediterranean sea we find other Israelitish foot-prints. In the north west part of Italy, there is another commonwealth of twelve states—Iucumonia—Hebrew root, the same as comte, county. Its ancient name was Tyrrenia, son of Tyre—a Tyrian colony? (Israelitish). It was afterwards called Etruria. Each tribe or division had its governor, with one king over all. These were formed by extensive emigrations from Israel, principally from the tribe of Asher, in whose tribal boundaries was Tyre. The Etruscans had two commonwealths of 12 states each; one on the west side of the Appenines, the other on the east base, guarding both passes of the mountains.

Their language was Hebrew, or Phœnician, anciently believed in one God, whom they called Jave or Jove, Hebrew name of the God of Israel; believed in a future state. From the Etrurians the Romans received every thing valuable both in arts and arms. The Tarquins, the first kings of Rome, were Etruscans.

"The high degree of civilization which the Etruscans had long before Rome was heard of, is testified by innumerable works of masonry and art. The Etruscans were of an eminently practical turn of mind, and domestic, like the North (Germans W). Trusting to their priests for reconciliation with gods, who always seem irate, but whose angry decrees could easily be foreseen and averted, they set to work in developing the inner resources of the country, and in making the best use of their intercourse with foreign countries. They thus became eminent in agriculture, navigation, military tactics, medicine, astronomy, and the like; and in all these, as well as in some of the very minutiæ of their dress and furniture, the Romans became their ready disciples and imitators. The division of the year into months (12) was made by the Etruscans."

Who were the ancient Etruscans? They were evidently of the same race that produced the Germans. Some say they were Slavonic, others call them Kelts (Celts), Semities, Goths, Scandinavians, Basques, Assyrians, Egyptians, and Armenians. To call them Israelites of the 5½ centuries before their final captivity, we think correct. God designed to leaven the world with these his ancient people.

"THE LOGOS"..."THE WORD."

Editor Restitution:

As the person of Messiah is still in question, allow me to furnish my mite toward settling faith on "the rock" of Revelation, and its realities.

1. When God made the world and wanted a world ruler, how did he begin? "He made man of the dust of the ground"—not of a sunbeam or supernal spark. Gen. i. 26, 27. "For now he hath chosen things which are not, that no flesh should glory in his sight." Hos. i. 22.

Note: Men begin at the other end, with the supernal; and so image out a divine being pre-existent for Jesus, and a corresponding soul for man. See No. 1 Beacon. But this was heaven high above man and earth, a misfit every way.

Again, as devil and death divested man back to dust, how did God proceed to make repairs? He interposed by promise, that "the seed of the woman—of Abram, of David, etc.—should crush the serpent's head—take the gate of the enemy and bless the world." (Triumph, where Adam—man—had failed.) Gen. iii. 15; xxii. 17, 18. Further, to crown all this, we find that Jesus the Son of God (is) "the express image (character or impression) of his person." Heb. i. 2, 3.

These three profound facts fix Jehovah's seal on Jesus only—excluding all sonship from between the one God and the one Mediator for men, the man Christ Jesus. 1 Tim. ii. 5, 6; Heb. i 1-3; Phil. ii. 5-7; Col. iv. 4. Then John xiv. has "Father" 23 times and pronouns for the Son and Father some 30 times, which tell this truth over 70 times, in this one chapter? Amen!

Such facts limit our range of faith to Jesus only as our Messiah with lands of light and the power of life!

2. The Gospel as a whole points to Jesus as Mediator and the coming Deliverer—"the Resurrection and Life!"

He is the Holy One; begotten of God, born of Mary—"the Son of God with power"—for the reasons given. Luke i. 26–35; Romans i. 1–3, etc. Then "all the promises of God are only in him; yea and amen, to the glory of God." "This is the stone the builders rejected, and is become the head of the corner: and no other name is given for salvation!" Acts iv. 10-12. This is above assault.

3. As to the prevailing view of the theoretic "Logos," please ask if an immortal could die. No, by no means! How then could a theoretic "son, a living being," take our place to raise us, by death and resurrection, up from mortal to immortality! No, no, not that is all from distrust of God.

4. Then all divine teachings lead through the word—"O Logos of Promise"—to "the child born and son given." Amen. It is "on this Rock" that the church has been built. Mat. xvi, 16–18; 1 Cor. iii, 11–15; Eph. ii. 20, etc. All argument for a mysterious, supernal being, with any one of his thirty-five titles (Deuteron Theos—second God, etc.) is like those of a mystic and impersonal coming and reign of Christ—a "corruption from the simplicity of Christ. 2 Cor. xi. 2. Bro. Woodward's seemed the best of the B. H.'s articles that preceded, yet he has not the central facts of his theme, and writes with hesitation, as if sadly in doubt, at some score of points plainly revealed.

5. The "word"—O Logos—has its full value, as a phrase, in Bible language. It is employed in the record of creation, Ps. xxxiii. 6-9, "The Law of Moses," and the Gospel by Christ and his apostles.

The mystery, if allowed, applies also to "the Life," "the Light"—darkness—death and the Kosmos, (and almost all things). It would mystify the entire revelation from God. Hence the leading Banner articles mainly beg the question. They seem not to have had a thought as to the "simplicity" and prevailing use of "the Logos" in both Testaments. They do not recognize this form of speech as it occurs often, masculine, feminine, and neuter; and so proves far too much for them. It applies to things, elements or qualities —"to the doctrine, the wisdom, the wrath of God." Therefore the mystery was not in "the Logos," but in their minds as the drift of christendom when they began their argument. The further they go on that line, the more distant they are from the goal of truth.

Do think of clinging to such a mystery, to aid faith in "the only begotten Son of God—the Name above every name—the only Name given—for life." John iii. 16–19; Acts iv. 10-12; Phil. ii. 5–11. By this name—"with all fullness"—pre-existence is a huge excrescence.

6. The question of Jesus' pre-eminence in all things is not now up. "The record that God has given of his Son" settled that. Hence I and they should accept Jesus for what he himself, his Almighty Father, his angels, apostles and people declare him to be—"the Son of the Father, in truth and love" 2 John iii; Luke i. 26–35.

The Life involves just as much of personality as "the Logos." 1 John i. 1–3. That is, none at all!

The mystery has come from the source of all "apostasy." 2 Thess. ii. 1–8; Rev. xvii. 6 xix.

The pretense is to exalt Jesus, as Satan pretended to exalt Eve and Adam, by departing from God.

Let us then take "the promise" on the plane of Abel, Abraham, David and the ancestral line, to "Jesus, the child born, the son given, in the fullness of time," Gal. iv. 4; 1 Pet. i. 19–21; Luke i. 26–35. "Therefore, that Holy One born of thee shall be called the Son of God."

Thus we avoid the questioning, hesitating, slipshod argument of man, and reach the "rest of faith in God!"

Lovingly I submit this for truth and grace—by "the one Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus." 1 Tim. ii. 5.

The argument that does not embrace the realities of the subject is worse than worthless. "But if a man be ignorant," let it be so understood, and not be taken for wisdom.

The prophets had visions that numbered, outlined and characterized the Gentile oppressors of Israel—also the ages—"this world and that to come"—with the leading events, on to the consummation of our Gospel age.

Note: This "Logos Prophetikos" embraced its times, its grand actors—Moses and the man of Israel, Messiah and his apostles, with "the Church, chosen in him before the world;" yet there has been no one pre-existent, except as argued out in mistake of both the language and the facts of the case. Please observe: They take the royal robes and majestic titles of the Lord Jesus, born of woman, to set forth and adorn their "other name yet not announced." Gal. i. 6–7. The coalition of redemption center only in the Lord Jesus! But note the basis of their theory:

1. The "Logos" is assumed to be a divine and distinct person, in disregard of the context, which employs the same "form of speech," without figure as to life, light, darkness, death, and kosmos—the world! Thus the assumption is annulled, by its inconsistency and want of intelligence.

2. The phrase (logos) in Scripture is used of "the Law of Moses" (with a double emphasis). Ex. xx. 1; xxxiv. 28; ten logos, (the, pl. these, ten commandments).

"God sent his logos (word) to heal the people." Ps. cvii. 20. It is the word (logos) of healing by Jesus, Mat. viii. 8; and of St. Paul's (O Logos)—"preaching." 1 Cor. ii. 4. Nay, Logos occurs 200 times in the New Testament and 1100 in the (Greek) Old Testament. Hence the popular argument is not rational. It has yet to learn the origin, import and usage of "the (word) logos" itself. Logos is from lego, I speak, say, etc. It is, what is spoken—a speech.

3. "He that cometh after me is preferred before me; for he was before me." John i. 15, 30. This asserts the precedence of Jesus over John, though in time and fact he was manifested afterwards. The point is plainly stated.

4. "Before Abraham was I am." This is of like import. It expresses his relation to God's purpose of grace, in which "Jesus has in all things the pre-eminence."

Thus with Christian graces—"above (before) all things, have fervent charity among yourselves." 1 Pet. iv. 8; John i. 15, 27, 30. The word applies to official station as really as to time.

5. "By whom he made the worlds"—predisposed the ages." Eph. iii. 9, 11; Macknight; Heb. i. 2; xi. 3. "He spake the word and it was! Let there be light—light was." Gen. i. 3; and all is yet to head up in Christ. Eph. i. 10.

6. "Abraham believed God, who quickeneth the dead and calleth things that be not, as though they were!" Rom. iv. 17. Things not existing as existing; but never pre-existing! No, not one!

7. "What think ye of Christ—whose son is he? The son of David. But David called him Lord; how then is he his son?" Mat. xxii. 42–46. Theory reveals its obscurity; but (thy word) thy Logos is truth. John xvii. 17.

It is our shortsightedness that meets with mystery, but there is in fact none in the Gospel of Christ. It teaches redemption by blood! Yet there is no blood in the presumed pre-existent One. The blood is all and only in Jesus. Amen.

Now, in our Gospel age—"the light"—no darkness—fellowship with God"—sum up in "Jesus—the life" personified. 1 John i. 1–7. Hence there is no confusion to faith's "single eye." "The Logos Evangelios"—word of promise. Rom. ix. 9; (as Isaac, Gen. xviii. 14,) was realized in "Jesus—in the fullness of time"—not before. It will be crowned with the plenitude of promise fulfilled. The prayer answered, and the full measure of "the prophetic logos" realized in the kingdom.

The sum of this doctrine is that God has given dominion and good report to his most honored servants, only as they have existed and endured in fact. Thus "Jesus humbled himself—overcame"—and so was honored and enthroned! Phil. ii. 5–11; Rev. iii. 21.

Why should a sinner saved by grace "through the redemption in Christ Jesus," wilfully turn from the manger, Gethsemane and Calvary, the resurrection and the ascension and Pentecost of our Gospel, to an assumed pre-existence in order to find a foundation for faith in his Giles and future honors? Jesus has answered: "I honor my Father, but ye do dishonor me." John viii. 49. Ye make your paint as you get cider from a sponge! How so? By soaking cider into it! A mere make-up!

The Lord Messiah—"the seed—to have dominion"—was to be "born of woman—in the fullness of time." Gal. iv. 4. All notion of supernal sonship before woman or time is ruled out.

God, who clothes the earth with its beautiful flowers, and fills its fruits with their fragrance—who endowed man with his capacity for dominion, and maintained his "logos of promise," through 4,000 years, is surely able to exalt and glorify his Son Jesus, and all his many brethren! Amen!

"God in Christ—reconciling the world to himself," is the source and sum of all being and all blessing. "For of him, through him, and to him, are all things! To whom be glory for the ages." Amen! Rom. xi. 36; 2 Cor. v. 18–21. What fallacy can be so delusive as the argument to exalt Jesus above "the promise or plane of Almighty God, who spake through and acted in him!" John v. 19–23; viii. 28–40; xiv. 9–10.

Lovingly for truth and grace—where all fulness dwells—in Jesus! Jesus!

J. B. COOK.

NOTE.—No theory is here given of this profound subject. The whole truth is in "the record God has given of his Son." On this line alone we all should seek for "the honor that cometh from God only!" Amen! J. B. C.

Editor Restitution:

A big day with the Jews has just passed, and another has come. Yesterday was the feast in memory of the law of God being brought down from Sinai by Moses. The entire night before the feast was to them a night of prayer, and all the day following the wailing place was crowded with them. It is truly a pitiful sight, and the question arises, What does all this weeping and wailing mean? how is this to terminate? has God become deaf, and will he not hear the cries of his people when they are so earnest and persistent in calling to him for deliverance? They say, they know that they are in need of something, and truly they will be heard, for God will hear and bless those who know they need him; but those who imagine they are in need of nothing, or, in a word, are saved, they do not realize that they are "wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked." However, God's promises to Israel and Jacob are sure, and these poor souls believe them, and praise God. Through faith in Christ, these scales will drop off their eyes before very long, and how glorious will be their deliverance.

Such a day as yesterday shows very plainly which way the wind blows, for all the Jewish places of business were closed, giving this city the appearance of Sunday in our American towns where there are but few Sabbath-keepers. Talking with a Christian (so-called) merchant a few days since, he said they would "soon overpower us—they do the most of the business now, and the arriages are coming in every morning loaded with more." And this is a fact—new ones come in every day. And we that have come here believing that this is a fulfillment of prophecy, see these signs thickening around us, and yet it appears like our hands are tied, and we can do nothing. But then again, we are such poor, blind, ignorant creatures at the best, we may not be able to see and understand when we are doing the most to advance the work in hand, for truly God's ways are past finding out.

Then, returning to the Jews: To-day they go out to Mount Zion to worship in the place where it is said a number of kings were laid out, David and Solomon with the rest. Mrs. Davis and I visited this place yesterday, as did many Jews. And oh, how hard it is to see this place, on the "beautiful hill of God," in the hands of the enemy! The Mohammedans have this in possession, as well as the balance of the "ancient high places." And they permit the Jews at certain times to come here, but always under their surveillance. Then to see the poor souls pass out and away, heads bowed, compelled to leave these places in the hands of the heathen! How humiliating! how it does wrench the better feelings of those who have any claim on the promises to our father Abraham! However, our hearts are encouraged when we look into the word of God, believing it is true, and see so many promises of a glorious restitution of all things—in the very near future, we hope.

When I think of the way they are taking ground here, and that the greater merchants commence to complain, I am alarmed for them, for according to the natural course of things it will bring on persecution, and if it comes it will be from—whom? Infidels and heathens? No, not a bit of it, but from Christians! And this is why I add "so-called" to this word Christian. In his name, what is there Christlike about persecution? But then if "favor is shown to the wicked—and it was such Christ came to save—yet he will not learn righteousness." Isa. xxvi. 10. When all is peace and plenty, we soon forget God. We must have a fire of some kind to pass through, or we are sure to retain the dross. Isaiah says: "For when thy judgments are in the earth the inhabitants of the world will learn righteousness." Judging from the cyclones, terrible hail storms, fires, floods, etc., in America this year, some will learn something. For my part, I feel like praising him for whatever is sent that will have a tendency toward purifying a "peculiar people" for his coming and kingdom, a people who will dare to take up the cross of Christ and carry it whithersoever he may see fit to lead. Many, I fear, have another cross than his, and another leader; and who, when spoken to on certain points they see are not according to Scripture, will reply by saying: "Oh, I don't believe it will make any difference so long as I am conscientious about it." But conscience needs a regulator, without which it is liable to get out of fix.

THE RESTITUTION.

E. A. CRADLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, July 18, 1883.

LETTERS from Jerusalem again for next week.

WE are flooded with communications just now. Friends must be patient.

PAPER full, and book notices must go over to a more convenient season.

WE were asked by a correspondent several months ago to say something on the term Logos. Will notice this word and some related texts soon. While we differ from some of our brethren, we differ in love. In few words we say right here for ourself—that we fully believe in the divine nature of God's dear Son.

A SYNOPSIS of articles on the Son of God and related subjects has been published in the Bible Banner within the last few months. We gave one of these as a specimen, the whole in a May number of our paper. So far as we have found time to read these communications we have noticed that the writers have spurned using bitter expressions toward the differing views of others.

HEAVY thunder-storms attended with some loss of life are reported in the Christian World of London, and of date July 4, as having occurred the previous week, and as having been general all over England. At Cambridge the tower of St. Botolph's was struck, and one of its statues hurled to the ground. Shocks of earthquakes were felt on Monday June 25 in Cornwall, which greatly alarmed the inhabitants. At Boscastle the shock resembled the explosion of a powder magazine. Shocks were experienced at several other places. There is peculiar interest manifested in these occurrences because earthquakes are an unusual phenomenon in England. The Savior's words—earthquakes in divers places—are vividly brought to mind.

THE PARABLE OF THE LABORERS AND THE VINEYARD—Matt. xx. 1-16.

Let us analyze this parable and see if we can understand it in the light of its typical import. In it we find the Kingdom of heaven compared to an (unknown) a master of a household who goes out at dawn of day to hire laborers to work in his vineyard. Then heaven is as it were a household and God is as it were the Master of this household and he has a vineyard somewhere that he wants cultivated. Where and what is this vineyard or this something which is as it were a vineyard? From the frequent use of this type in the Old and New Covenant Scriptures we learn that in its narrowest sense it is God's church in the world, and in its broadest and fullest meaning it is this whole cosmos of the heavens and the earth which is ultimately to become the kingdom of the cosmos of God and his Christ. The period of time spoken of here in which the labor sought to be performed must occur is 12 hours, an ordinary day's work, or from sun to sun. God's work must be done in the light, as we learn in so many different ways, "Walk in the light as he is in the light;" "Ye are children of the light and not of the darkness;" "Ye are the light of the world."

In any estimate of God's work in the world the darkness as the other twelve hours of the day are ignored, just as we in ordinary parlance speak of 12 hours or the hours of light even though they be less than 12 as a day. This explanation necessary to a true understanding of this typical parable. For the day thus spoken of here is a typical one third of the whole of this world's time as I apprehend, another instance of the 1, 2, 3 type running all through the Scriptural teaching. The whole period being 24000 years, one-third, the last third or man's period is 8000 years, as we have already shown in previous articles, and this for the purposes of the parable is viewed as one day of 12 hours. For evidence of this see such passages as "This is the hour and power of darkness," "My hour has not yet come," and the class of passages above referred to. We have, moreover, in this correlation of the third and eighth day type proof of the truth of prophecy according to the laws of harmony. One hour of this day would be then 1 12 of 8000 years which equals 666⅔. The dawn spoken of in the parable would be the first or Adamic hour of the race, when the Master first call for laborers in his vineyard. The third hour or the second call of the Master brings us down to Noah, a cosmic eighth person and his times. The sixth hour brings us down to Abraham and Moses and the law. The ninth hour (the nine being typical of human or finite completeness) brings us to the Christ, the true eighth person according to the harmonic type, and the middle period of "the Christian era" with all its manifold significance of the new law of love, the apostasy and the reformation.

The eleventh hour or the final call of the Master brings us to the 7333d year of the Christ's millennial reign, when the (ecumenic or final) gospel spoken of in the 14th chapter of the apocalypse of John, goes forth to every nation and tribe and tongue and people and which is followed by a final or twelfth hour of "the seven last plagues" and the Ge-enna judgment of fire; an hour moreover of wages paying to God's laborers. And why did they each receive a denarius? Because the only definite stipulation of God's covenant with man as a faithful servant is to give him "life." "The reserves of sin are death, but the gracious offer of God is eternal life." "Is it not lawful for me to do what I will with mine own?" Remember that he is an absolute despotic or absolute Master of his household, and all that belongs to it, and the denarius remember is his gracious offer to all, "the idlers" included. "In this wise shall the last be first and the first last." What does this mean? Evidently that in the order of the last resurrection ("blessed and holy are those who shall have part in the first resurrection") those who have obeyed the final call will be raised to life, (if they be dead) before those who heard and obeyed the earlier calls, following the Christ type in the "first resurrection" namely, Christ, he first-fruits; after that those who are Christ's at his coming.

As evidence of the "denarius" being the symbol of our covenant inheritance of "life" in Christ through his fulfillment of the requirements of the law, see how carefully and significantly the reader's attention is called to the fact of the covenant agreement or promise and the gracious enlargement of the "inheritance" to those whose self-sacrifice shall have been found worthy of it. In the 29th verse of the preceding chapter, namely, "Will receive a hundred-fold and will inherit eternal life." The special significance of the parable is, therefore, to illustrate God's absolute right to do what he will with his own and the perfect justice and equity of such a legal right when administered by a gracious, all-wise and beneficent head of a household of faith, an absolute right in other words to be merciful as well as just. "I will have mercy and not sacrifice" when understood means that sacrifice is merely a means to the great and beneficent end expressed by mercy; but let no one forget that if he would reach the celestial heights of mercy he must walk the royal road of sacrifice, and if he serves the only absolute Good One he must believe that he will not only give the "denarius" he has agreed to pay, but that he will do whatever else is right with an eye single to the requirements of perfect goodness to all. In this way only could he become "all and in all," and in this way only could "justice and mercy kiss each other."

CHAS. GARDNER.

THE TRIBUTE MONEY.

In a previous article I gave what seemed to me to be the typical import of a parable of the master of a household who went out at dawn to hire laborers for his vineyard, and the special significance of the denarius or the "wages" paid each laborer by the Master. I purpose in this article to consider the subject of the "tribute money" and its typical import as outlined in the words of the Christ: "Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's and unto God the things that are God's." Matt. xxii. 15-22. The 19th verse reads, "Show me the legal coin for the tribute; and they brought him a denarius." The reader will observe that this is the same coin that represents the "wages" in the preceding parble, and I think I can make it clear that there is an intimate connection of thought between the typical teaching of the two parables, a grand undercurrent in the flow of the divine reasoning which entirely escapes the notice of the surface reader.

Remember, dear reader, that when God is your teacher, however he may illustrate his argument, the deep understanding of his reasoning bears along with it always the question of most vital import to man, namely life, what it is, how to get it, what it is worth, how to use it, etc. The language of the Christ teaches us that there is an analogy between paying tribute to a Cæsar and paying tribute to God. What is the analogy and what part does the denarius play in this analogy? Holding the coin up to view, saith the Teacher, "whose image and (epigraph) inscription (taken of property right, a legal term) is this? They say unto him Cæsar's." Who is Cæsar? An absolute king. What did he claim? The right to use for his own purposes the life and property of every one of his subjects. The tribute money or the denarius was the published token of this right. The payment of the tribute was a public acknowledgement of this right. Imagine now the Christ as it were holding up to all the world another coin, a coin from the mint of God's sovereign clemency, man as the published token of the tribute due this God, and asking whose image and conformatory is this? God's is it? Then let this coin be used for the purposes for which it was made. With it let the tribute be paid to whom the tribute is due. Let it pass current and subserve all the uses for which it was created and pass finally by the way of his sovereign appointment into the revenues of the King.

Reader you bear this image and property title. This is the stamp of your value, and that which constitutes you a token of the King's grace. Are you subserving the ends and object of your existence, passing current among the loyal subjects of the King, or buried in a napkin, is the rust of disuse obliterating the glorious image of royalty which you have received, or tossed about in "the dice-play of men," have you been lost in the busy mart of this world, never to pass into the glorious coffers of the King, no good use subserved, no tribute paid, the elements of your individuality to lapse and disappear again in the fiery crucible of the great day?

JERUSALEM, June 11, '83.

Dear Brother:

Your two last letters, one being dated May 7th, the other May 14th reached me safely with contents. I was glad to receive them all right. I trust that ere this one or more letters have reached you from Mr. Winterstein. He has written every week, he is writing for me. I think you will find his letters interesting, and much more so in the future. He has plenty of time to observe and write, while I have all my time taken up with my various duties. I must be doctor, nurse, and almost all things to all. Still I intend to send an occasional letter for THE RESTITUTION if God will. I hope to send something by next post. I cannot say whether any letters have been lost except the one referred to of Bro. Underwood. I have not kept an account of them, but will in future. I have however answered all that have come to hand. Mr. and Mrs. Winterstein were both ill with fever, and this caused the delay in sending the cards. Tell Br. Underwood not to worry over the loss of the $10, he is not to blame at all; it was not intended for me, and I have no regrets. God means something to be learned by the occurrence and it will all work for the best. I shall send letter and package to Mrs. Vickey by this post. Shall send several, also a package to you. I have some beautiful book marks wrought in Arabic characters which might sell. I will send sample. Also I will send some Mottoes for frames for the wall, done in flowers. I have many designs, but my family has increased so much that I have not much time for experiments. I will write a story for the boys, and a few chapters in the Arabian mode of cooking, which I am sure will be of service to our American friends. No food is wasted here, the very economical way in which it is prepared uses up all the materials, and the food is both tasteful and healthful. The weather is cool and delightful. My patients have all recovered. These fevers if properly treated are friendly. It is simply an effort of nature to throw off poison retained in the system. My treatment is this: Take no medicine, keep the mind quiet, and with good nursing the patient soon recovers and feels invigorated, and the mind is clear. Many of our exiles would, if properly treated, result in the highest blessings to us, and then of course their will be no evil.

Dear brother, please accept my warmest thanks, and may God give you a great blessing for all your kindness to me and others, and I am sure he will. Do not doubt that I appreciate all your kindness. I trust the large package reached you safely.

Yours in hope,

A. E. DAVIS.

Bishop A. Cleveland Coxe has written again about dreams, citing his own and others', curious experiences with half-waking visions, and concluding his article as follows: "My conclusion is that there is much of the preternatural in the realms of mind and of matter, too; much that implies variations from law and a law of variations. These variations are such as intimate, if they do not demonstrate, that the mechanism of the universe does not run itself. There is engineering somewhere, and an engineer who makes his hand felt, though invisible."

WATCHING.

E. S. SAXONIAN.

Watching for somebody, wide brown eyes,
Waiting to give him a rare surprise!
Oh, it is father, whose horse's feet
Fall in the distance smooth and fleet—

Father, whose heart for many a mile
Forward has leaped to the dear old stile!
Oh, how they'll kiss him and hold him fast,
When father is home with his babes at last.

"List!" cries sister to Baby Will;
"Listen, darling! he rounds the hill,
Oh, how fleetly flies over the ground!
Nearer and nearer the hoof-beats sound."

Flowers for father, and looks of joy,
Sweetest words shall their tongues employ,
Somebody's coming—the dear, the best;
Shine out to greet him, you bright brown eyes.

Swift Judgment.

During the "crusade," some earnest Christian women in a village in Northern Pennsylvania went to the chief saloon keeper of the place, and said, "We want you to look at the names on the head-stones in our grave-yard, and count the young men who have gone from drink sold by you. Is it not about time that you should stop this business?" The saloon keeper, pointing significantly to a license hanging on the wall, answered, "There is the authority for my business, and whatever may be the results, I'll sell, if I go to hell with my whole family. Get out of this place!" They went their way, leaving the saloon keeper in the hands of God. Two weeks from that time the oldest son went out of the world fighting demons in delirium tremens. Two months later, another son was run over by a railroad train and brought home dead. Three months later his wife died in a lunatic asylum. A few weeks afterward, the last one of his boys was brought home on a shutter, dead—killed in a row in a neighboring saloon. This man is now a lunatic.—Christian Woman.

No Gospel—Then What!

You stand upon that darkest spot in all the earth, by the side of the open grave! It is the direst, awfulest gulf the eye of man ever looked into. What means it? Have you hope in your poor heart as you stand there, shivering, stricken soul? Where do you get it from? Whence comesit to you? Have you light there in your darkness? Out of what cloud or from what sky does it shine? Actually, my friend, put this Bible where many do put it practically, and what light or hope have they or can they have? What does nature say to you as you stand there in that dark, drear spot? That pleasant sunlight — brightest, sweetest thing in nature—in answer to the question, "If a man die, shall he live again?"—what has that fair sunlight to say? If there is hope in nature, surely it will be found there. What say the green fields to this question? the ripple of bird-songs? the whispering winds? the fair landscape outstretching broadly beneath the eye? What say the deep, calm, blue heavens of the day-time, or the profound star-depths at night? Ah, the world is dumb! Its sounds are all empty chattering or dull, mumbling mockery. Put away the Gospel, and man dies in despair, and grimly we bury him out of our sight as a beast! —Rev. W. J. Stillman.

Threshing-Floors.

It was in the north of China that we first saw the threshing floor of the East and of the Bible. When we were traveling to some out-stations in Manchuria, the road bounded on both sides by endless fields of gigantic millet, there would come a farmer's house and farm-yard, or small hamlet, and on the skirt of it the trodden spot of ground hard and smooth as stone. But it was not till some weeks later, as we were journeying slowly up to Pekin, and the harvest was now gathered, that we saw it in use. The grain was laid on the floor, and a pair of oxen were driven leisurely over the ears, treading out the corn. Another form of threshing was the stone roller, which was drawn over the ears by oxen or mules; and there was another still, where a flat board, furnished with some projections, was drawn in the same way, the driver or children perhaps sitting on the board to lend it additional weight. Sometimes the grain was piled up in a large heap in the centre of this floor, unsifted; and then men with the winnowing shovel (the Bible fan) would toss the grain into the air or else put it on a flat basket, from which the man who held it flung up the corn, and the wind carrying the chaff away filled the air with dust.

One Bible phrase after another was recalled to us. It was easy to see how the Philistines could rob the threshing-floors at Keilah, those open spaces in the field on which the absence of any dread of rain induced the farmers to pile up their wealth of grain; or how the open floor, open to the sky and smooth, became the natural place to test the dew upon Gideon's fleece while all the rest of the ground was dry; or how, when the two kings Ahab of Israel and Jehoshaphat of Judah summoned the prophet, the place to set the royal thrones was on the smooth and empty threshing-floor, just before the gate of Samaria; or how no better place than this could be found on which to build the altar that David raised when he had purchased the site of the temple from Araunah the Jebusite, and found in the threshing instruments—the wooden fans and boards and oxen yokes—the wood for the sacrifice. It would be easy for the oxen to stop in the midst of the abundance they were treading out and eat, and the merciful Jewish law provided that they should eat if they would. There should be no muzzling of them. "Thou shalt not muzzle the ox when he treadeth out the corn."—Good Words.

The Lord's Prayer—Earlier Forms.

Stephens, in his "Guida," says: "The Jews had eighteen prayers in their daily service, which they abridged to a brief form, that contained the substance of them all, with which the disciples were well acquainted. Besides, it was customary with the great teachers to give their followers some prayers as a badge of their discipleship, as we are informed John the Baptist had given his disciples. Christ's disciples, in the second year of his ministry, requested him to comply with the usual custom among Rabbis, and to teach them to pray with his spirit. He then appointed the same prayer for a form to be in perpetual use, which they supposed he had only taught them as a general directory for the formation of their own prayers."

The following is a translation of the Lord's Prayer as written about the year of Christ 900, by Alfred, Bishop of Durham:

"Our Father which art in heaven, be hallowed thine name come thy kingdom be thy Will as in Heaven and in Earth. Our Loaf supersubstantial give us to day and forgive us Debts our so we Forgive Debts ours, and do not lead us into Temptation, but deliver every one from Evil—Amen."

LATER ENGLISH FORMS OF THE LORD'S PRAYER.

A. D. 1258.

Feder ure in heune, haloweide beoth thi neune, cumen thi kunoriche thi wille beoth idon in huene and in erthe. The sueryeh dawe bried git ous thilk dawe. And worsif ure dettes as vi vorsifen ure detoures. And lene ous nought into temptation, bot delyverof us. Amen.

A. D. 1300.

Fadir our in hevene, Halewyd by hi name, thi kingdom come. Thi wille be done as in hevene and in erthe. Oure uroke dayes bred give us to-day. And forgive us oure dettes, as we forgive our dettoures. And lede us not into temptation, Bote delyvere us of yvel. Amen.

A. D. 1582.

Our father which art in heauen, sanctified be thy name. Let thy kingdom come. Thy will be done, as in heauen-la earth also. Giue vs to-day our super substantial bread. And lead vs not into temptation. But deliuer us from euil. Amen.

A. D. 1611.

Our father which art in heauen, hallowed be thy Name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth as it is in heauen. Giaue this day our dayly bread. And forgiue vs our debts as we forgiue our debtors. And lede us not into temptation, but deliuer vs from euil. For thine is the kingdome, and the power and the glory for euer. Amen.

The following lines, embodying in beautifully impressive form the Lord's Prayer, are said to have been written by King James I., though by other authorities ascribed to Bishop Andrewes:

If any are distressed, and fain would gather
Some comfort, let them hasten unto
Our Father.

For we of hope and help are quite bereaven,
Unless Thou succor us
Who art in heaven.

Then showest mercy, therefore the more
We praise thee singingly.
Hallowed be thy name.

Of all thy mercies past up the sum,
Shew us thy joys, and let
Thy kingdom come.

We mortal are, and after from our birth,
Thou constant art!
Thy will be done on earth.

Thou mid'st earth, as well as planets seven;
Thy name is blessed here,
As 'tis in heaven.

Nothing we have to use, or desire to pay,
Except thou givest it to us,
Give us this day.

Wherewith to clothe us, wherewith to be fed,
For without thee we want
Our daily bread.

We want, but want we further for to day present;
But we do sin—
Forgive us our trespasses.

No man from sinning ever free did live;
Forgive us, O Lord, our sins,
As we forgive.

If we repent our faults, thou art of disobedient use
We pardon
Them that trespass against us.

Forgive us, that is past, a new path tread us,
Direct us always in thy faith,
And lead us.

We thine own people are, thy chosen suffer
Into all truths, but
Not into temptation.

Thou that of all good grace art the giver,
Suffer us not to wander,
But deliver us

From the fierce assaults of world and devil.
And flesh, so shalt thou free us
From all evil.

To these petitions let both church and laymen
With one consent of voice and heart, say
Amen.

The following very ancient prayer is from Thesaurus Precum:

"Save us, Lord, waking; guard us sleeping, that we may watch with Christ, and through Christ may rest in peace."—N. Y. Observer.

News Items.

CAIRO, July 16. — Cholera has appeared in several places in this city, and is spreading in the Arab quarter. There have been four cases in the hospital, one fatal.

LONDON, July 16.—A Cairo dispatch says it is very apparent that the number of deaths from cholera there has been much greater than stated. It is believed that fifty or sixty deaths have already occurred. The railway from Cairo to Alexandria are expected to discontinue operations.

ALEXANDRIA, July 16.—There were thirty-five deaths from cholera in Damietta yesterday, sixty-one in Mansourah, twenty-two in Samanoud, and twenty in Monzaleh.

The panic at Alexandria caused by the fear that the cholera would reach here has been renewed, and people are leaving the city in large numbers. Two cases of a disease, supposed to be cholera, occurred at Bulak. Six deaths from cholera occurred at Wegas.

TUNNEL UNDER STRAITS OF GIBRALTAR.

MADRID, July 16.—The Cabinet has considered favorably the project of France for the construction of a tunnel under the Straits of Gibraltar.

Central Iowa was greatly damaged last night by a severe wind-storm. The loss by destruction and damage to property in Clinton and Scott counties, in that State, by last week's storm, is estimated at half a million of dollars.

SELECTED MISCELLANY.

The French are progressing in the work of opening up to European trade the valley of the Niger River. Col. Desbordes, who has charge of the expedition, recently advanced from Medine, on the Senegal River, at which the proposed railroad connecting these two rivers is to end. The great obstacle in the way is the hostility of the natives. The French expeditionary force was frequently attacked, and, from the time that Col. Desbordes left Medine until his return the expedition had to fight its way.

The St. Louis Christian Evangelist says: "The Catholics celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of the organization of their oldest church in Chicago the other day. They now claim 250,000 members in the diocese. This membership embraces most of the saloon-keepers, roughs, thieves, drunkards and outlaws in the city. Most of them only exhibit their Catholic faith when they send for a priest to shrive them on the bed of death."

"The Italian authorities," says an exchange, "lately sent a notice to the pope like with other citizens from whom taxes were due, in the usual descriptive form as follows: 'To citizen Joachim Pecci, by trade or profession, pope; conducting business at Vatican Palace, Rome.' It is said that the taxes were paid and a receipt made out for 'Citizen Joachim Pecci.' What a change from being supreme in Italy! The boasted rightful temporal authority reduced to a mere nullity. What a revolution from the time when, for a sovereign of Europe to disobey the authority of the pope would have secured his dethronement or death warrant."

THE GRAVEYARD OF THE GIANTS.

Two miles from Mandan, on the bluffs near the junction of the Hart and Missouri Rivers, is an old cemetery of fully 100 acres in extent, filled with bones of a giant race. This vast city of the dead lies just east of the Fort Lincoln road. The ground has the appearance of being filled with trenches piled full of dead bodies, both man and beast, and covered with several feet of earth. In many places mounds from eight to ten feet high and some of them 100 feet or more in length have been filled with bones of broken pottery, vases of various bright-colored flints and agates. The pottery is of a dark material, beautifully decorated, delicate in finish, and as light as wood, showing the work of a people skilled in the arts and possessed of a high state of civilization. This has evidently been a grand battle-field, where thousands of men and horses have fallen. Nothing like a systematic or intelligent exploration has been made, as only little holes two or three feet in depth have been dug in some of the mounds, but many of the bones of man and beast and beautiful specimens of broken pottery and other curiosities have been found in these feeble efforts at excavation. We asked an aged Indian what his people know of these ancient graveyards. He answered: "We know nothing about them. They were here before the red man."—Mandan (Dakota) Pioneer.

A FIFTEEN-HUNDRED-FOOT WATER-FALL.

A recent discovery on the head of the Cowlitz river establishes the fact that Washington Territory can now boast of the grandest waterfall in the known world, its height being, 1,500 feet. The Nooksack Indians assert positively that waterfalls higher than the tallest fir, pine or cedar tree are to be found on the extreme head-waters of the Nooksack river, in this country. As that section of the country has never been explored by the white man, there is no good reason for doubting the statement. From the comparison given by the Indians, these falls must be at least 475 feet in height, which would lay over the famous Snoqualmie Falls, of King county, by at least 200 feet.—*Whatcom (W. T.) SURPRISING DISCOVERIES IN ROME.

ROME, June 22.—A new archeological museum is about to be opened in Rome. The works for the enlargement of the city bring to light so many statues and objects of interest that the Old Capitol is insufficient to keep them and to afford studious inquirers a good opportunity for examination. The commission on the archæological department have obtained from the city the means for erecting a building where these curiosities will be kept.

Last year the Sun announced that Prof. Mues had proposed an excavation in the neighborhood of St. Louis des Francais, to search for an obelisk which was supposed to have been buried there. The researches were fruitless until Wednesday last. At 10 a. m. the workingmen were digging a hole behind the Church of La Minerva, near the little back door which leads to Via Sant' Ignazio, when they found an obelisk of red granite, having hieroglyphics on its four sides. The spot where they are digging was occupied by the temple of Isis and Serapis.

A few days ago a fine sphinx was found in the same locality. The owner of the house in whose yard many discoveries have been made is Mr. Tranquilli. The sphinx represents Pharaoh Amasis, the penultimate king of Saitic dynasty. The royal tablet of the obelisk has the name of Pharaoh Ramesses, the nineteenth of the Theban dynasty. The monument would, therefore, belong to the fourteenth century before the Christian era. It is, however, doubtful whether the Egyptian work is original or merely a copy.

Besides fragments of the old temple, Mr. Tranquilli has found in his yard some very fine columns larger in the middle than at the ends. One of these columns has has reliefs representing Egyptian priests carrying the insignia of their calling.

The rise of the new obelisk is the same as that of the small obelisk standing on the back of an elephant in the Piazza della Minerva, in front of the church.

The excavations at Via Sant' Ignazio are very promising. A cynocephalus, or a sphinx with a dog's head, has been discovered, which, according to Prof. Schiapparelli, is a monument of such importance that it would be difficult to find anything like it even in Egypt.

To the Friends of "The Restitution."

The cost of publishing THE RESTITUTION for the year just closed exceeded the receipts over $360. To repay this deficiency and secure means to publish the paper another year, we must raise, outside the regular subscription, at least $500. To secure that amount, the Board of Directors have requested me to appeal to each subscriber to contribute at least one dollar extra. This is not asked as a donation, but brethren are requested to send names of persons to whom they wish the paper sent, with their contributions and the paper will be sent to such persons in payment for the amounts sent by each.

There are a large number of brethren and sisters in different localities who are unable to pay for the paper, and who would be very glad of the privilege of reading it. These are known to Brother Chapin, the Editor. I would suggest that brethren who have means to whom they specially desire to send the paper, send their contributions to THE RESTITUTION office with a request that the paper be sent to some worthy Christian who will appreciate it, but who is unable to pay for it. In this way brethren will be able to gladden the hearts of many poor but honest good Christians, and at the same time help to furnish the means to keep the paper going.

The fund will be known as "Free Will Offerings." Let each reader of THE RESTITUTION make a small sacrifice, and contribute at least one dollar, always remembering that the many persons to whom the paper will be thus sent will thank and bless you, and your Heavenly Father will reward you.

R. S. DWIGGINS, President.

NO MORE SEA.

A correspondent asked in this paper, New York Observer, May 31, for the poem by Capt. Hare, of the ill-fated "Bumper," entitled "Another one on the Sea." That was not the title. But it is given correctly above, and the following are the lines, published years ago in the Sailor's Magazine:

I stood on the shore of the beautiful sea,
As the billows were running wild and free;
Onward they came with unfailing force,
Then backward turned in their restless course;
Ever and ever they rose and fell,
Foaming and dashing against the shore,
Ever and ever they rose and fell,
With heaving and sighing and mighty swell:
And deep seemed rolling about to sleep,
Lest the murmuring waves should drop to sleep,
In unison roared waters, by night and by day,
Till clouds cleared and sunshine bedding their way;
Oh! which shall the ocean's troubled heart
Quietly and calmly sink into rest
Oh! when shall the wave's wild murmuring cease,
And the mighty waters be hushed to peace?

Then the ocean's voice I seemed to hear,
Solemnly, solemnly—monotonic near,
Like a wail sent up from the caves below,
Fraught with dark memories of human woe,
Telling of lives cast early buried there,
Of the dying shriek and the dying prayer
Of hearts that still must break, in vain
For those who shall never come again,
Of the widow's groans, the orphan's cry,
And the mother's speechless agony.

Oh, no, the ocean can never rest
While such a variety of ills it harbors,
The tale pertains it tells upon the sea,
And dark and stormy its waves must be;
It cannot be quiet, it cannot sleep,
That dark, relentless, and stormy deep.

But a day will come, a blessed day,
When earthly sorrow shall pass away,
When the hour of anguish shall turn to praise,
And even the roar of the waves shall cease,
Then out from its dreary and darkest bed,
Old Ocean shall render up her dead,
And freed from the weight of human woes,
Shall quietly sink in her last repose—
No sorrow shall ever be written there
On the depths of the sea or the hearts of men,
But heaven and earth renewed shall shine,
Still clothed in glory and light divine.
Then where shall the billows of ocean be?
Gone! for in heaven is "no more sea!"
'Tis a grand and wonderful thing of earth,
That ceased there in the devil's "new birth":
'Tis a life of madness and tossing and spray,
And at resting when it goes away.
But oh! those glorious, beautiful sea,
There is health and joy and blessing in thee:
Solemnly, solemnly, I hear thy voice,
Bidding us weep and yet rejoice—
Weep for the loved ones buried beneath,
Rejoice in him who has conquered death;
Weep for the storm-swept, tempest-tossed;
Rejoice in him who has stayed the host;
Weep for the sin, the sorrow, and strife,
And rejoice in the hope of eternal life.

INHERENT NATURE OF CHRIST, AND THEORIES OF THE ATONEMENT.

NUMBER TWO.

In the number for May 16, we gave an article, No. I, from McCulloch's Credibility of the Scriptures, under the above heading. His object is to show that the New Testament writers gave no information, or explanation, concerning the inherent nature of our Lord Jesus Christ, but satisfied themselves with the simple and sublime statement that he was the Son of God; and as we share with the writer in his estimate of the worthlessness of all formulated creeds on this inexplicable subject, we give this second article, extracted mainly from his work, with some supplementary remarks of our own on the unsatisfactory explanations given to the Scriptures that do not harmonize with adopted formularies of faith as set forth in individual or sectarian creeds. In addition to what the author says in the former article, he adds:

"To obtain a full comprehension of the entirely unsatisfactory character of any theological exposition concerning the inherent nature of our Redeemer, or the theory upon which human salvation was effected by him, it will be necessary to scrutinize each of those particulars separately, and first, as regards his inherent nature.

"In estimating what theologians have inferred from the Scriptures concerning the inherent nature of the Lord Jesus Christ, we shall find that every speculation they have constructed on the subject involves such an amount of unreasonable perplexities and anomalies, that no unprejudiced man can regard them in any other point of view than as so many proofs of the absolute incomprehensibility of the subject itself.

"On the one hand we find certain expressions of the apostles concerning the character and nature of Christ, which in the estimation of the Trinitarians indicate his co-equality with Jehovah; and even if we abate the intensity of such expressions so as to accommodate them to the Arian hypothesis, they would still imply that Jesus Christ in his inherent nature was only inferior to Jehovah, as being the first and greatest of all created intelligences. Without quoting such passages extensively, it will be sufficient to mention the remarkable case of Phil. ii. 5–7; Colos. i. 15–17. From these passages it would seem almost impossible that we could regard Jesus Christ in any other light than as exhibited by either the Trinitarians or the Arians, and yet in connection with these texts we have the doctrine expressly laid down by the apostle —Phil. ii. 9–11— that in consequence of the great humiliation of Jesus Christ, that God has exalted him, and given him a name which is above every other name, etc. If the doctrine of Christ's inherent nature whether as stated by the Trinitarians or the Arians be correct, how is it possible that he could be exalted as a reward of his humiliation and obedience. According to the Arians he was already only inferior to Jehovah, according to Trinitarians he was already co-equal with him. The proposed explanation that this exaltation of Christ was in his human capacity is preposterous,* for as his humiliation consisted in his abasing himself in his inherent nature, the reward or exaltation could only be as superadded to that inherent nature. Theologians may undertake to defend such interpretation, but no unprejudiced man, I should presume, is able to comprehend its application. The proposed solution is a mere assumption suggested by theologians to solve a perplexity in their theological system for which the Scripture gives no justification.

"The doctrine of the Socinians on the inherent nature of Jesus Christ is equally irreconcilable with the statements made in Scripture. It is wholly impossible to explain Phil. ii. 5–7, or Colos. i. 15, etc., with the theory that Jesus Christ was a mere man! The circumstances of his supernatural birth from a virgin, the plain intimations of his pre-existence, etc., are amply sufficient to confute the Socinian hypothesis, which indeed has scarcely any argument in its favor, but as an alternative to the Trinitarian schemes, perplexed as they are by irreconcilable anomalies or contradictions. The Socinians seem to have inferred that as the Trinitarian or Arian schemes are irreconcilable either to Scripture or reason, that in such defect the Socinian hypothesis must be true from the apparent impossibility of suggesting any other scheme on the subject. Such an inference, however, as applied to the infinite Creator of all things, is wholly unjustifiable; for as the scheme of purposes in the mission of Jesus Christ emanates from an infinitely wise, omnipotent, and perfect being, it is utterly absurd for mankind to assume any limitation as to the possibilities of Jehovah's mode of action, on the ground that we can only imagine three modes by which a purpose may be effected. That none of these modes suggested are comprehensible in themselves as to their rationale, or reconcilable with Scripture, I apprehend is very clear, but as Jehovah has not made any revelation to mankind on the subject it is altogether unreasonable as well as presumptuous for any one to urge that the conjectures of any individual or sect ought to be received as truth, because all other conflicting suppositions may be shown to be untrue.

"In short the proceeding of the Christian world respecting the inherent nature of the Redeemer, has been like that of the Jews concerning the kingdom to be established by him. The prophets had announced that the Messiah should be a great Prince, the savior or deliverer of the Jewish people, and that all nations should be subdued before him. Though there were other predictions concerning him that foretold his humiliation and death, the calling of the Gentiles, and his rejection by the Jews; yet the Jewish rabbis could not reconcile these various anomalies. Instead, therefore, of leaving the subject as involved with some inexplicably unknown condition of things which time only could unravel, the rabbis rejected every prediction anomalous to their assumption, and determined that he would be a great temporal prince, who after having delivered them from political subjection to any heathen power, should then rule over them and the nations of the earth in all the splendor of an eastern king.

"The inherent nature and character of Jesus Christ is as fully involved in incomprehensible anomalies and perplexities to the Christian world, as the Messiah's character was to the Jews before the advent; and the clearest demonstration of this incomprehensibility is the existence of the three different and irreconcilable theories of the Trinitarians, Arians, and Socinians. Each of these hypotheses has been constructed by rejecting every passage of Scripture anomalous to each theory, and yet mankind are so blind in their prejudices as to insist on the subject with the utmost bigotry and tenacity.

"I fall back, therefore, upon our Savior's own declaration concerning himself, Lu. x. 22; "No man knoweth who the Son is but the Father." That no revelation to mankind has ever been made since that time must be evident from the three irreconcilable theories that must have adopted on the subject. As respects the office, function, and authority of Jesus as Messiah, the Scripture is perfectly clear; nor would there be any difference of opinion among devout men on that subject, if they had not arbitrarily interpreted the positive statements of the Scripture in such a manner as to force them into accordance with their presumptuous speculations concerning his inherent nature. As a further justification of the view I have taken of this subject, I call the reader's attention to the circumstance that the Redeemer is nowhere designated in the Scriptures by any other name than the one he bore while he lived on earth, viz: JESUS OF NAZARETH. Any other appellations by which he is mentioned in the Scripture, are either official terms, such as Messiah or Christ, (the Anointed One) or by epithets derived from the functions experienced by him, or from purposes accomplished by him, such as High Priest, Mediator, Savior, or Redeemer. The only term used in Scripture that we do not understand as to the absolute sense in which it is to be comprehended, is the expression, Son of God. What was virtually signified by this phraseology when originally bestowed—Ps. ii. 7—it is impossible to conjecture as the term is not there defined or explained. In all other places of Scripture it is evidently used as a mere synonym with that of Messiah or Christ. Paul, however, understood it as being only applicable to him after his resurrection. Acts xiii. 33. The inference from these facts I apprehend is very important. Jehovah as not communicating to mankind any other name than the one by which Jesus of Nazareth was known while upon earth, seems evidently to instruct us that he was not to be known among men during the Christian Dispensation by any other name, be his inherent nature what it may. As Jesus of Nazareth was the Messiah, as such he accomplished whatever belonged to that mysterious office. Through him, as set forth in Scripture, mankind are alone to expect salvation. This inference does not affect the fact of his inherent nature, be that what it may, but it surely directs us as to the point of view in which mankind are at present to regard the Messiah, i. e., in his official position only, and not according to his inherent nature, for on this subject we have no instruction given in Scripture.

"The peculiar and important phraseology of the New Testament in this particular is overlooked by ordinary readers, through the improper rendering of our Savior's name and title in our English translation.

"This is owing to the influence of the Latin language upon modern civilization, for as there are no articles in that language, so the first translators, by a servile following of the Vulgate, have blended our Savior's name and office together as if they were his Christian name and surname. It ought to have been printed, JESUS the CHRIST, or what would have been still better, JESUS the MESSIAH; for the word Christ is merely the translation of the Hebrew term Messiah. Yet with this explanation there is still an ellipsis; Jesus is the Greek translation of the Hebrew name JOSHUA, which was a common appellation among the Jews, and hence to distinguish our Lord he was designated as JOSHUA (or Jesus) of Nazareth. Hence when prayer is offered to Jehovah through him, it is virtually when the ellipsis is supplied, in the name, or for the sake, of Jesus of Nazareth, who is the Messiah. The direct inference from this universal mode of speaking of our Savior by his apostles and evangelists, is direct and important, for it recognizes him simply in his official position as Messiah, and consequently implies any practice to be unjustifiable that attaches any theological dogmas to his name as involving subtleties concerning his inherent nature."

Our reason for making these selections is to show that creeds made to explain the inherent nature of the Son of God not only contradict one another, but are self-contradictory. This is a necessary consequence of trying to explain the inexplicable.

* Of all the proposed solutions respecting the Trinitarian hypothesis, I consider this the most unreasonable. Not only does the idea of one person of the Trinity rewarding the other, virtually destroy the theological unity of the Godhead, but it is evidently impossible after such subdivision, that one could reward the other without lessening his own authority, power, or glory. The only standard of comparison or illustration that can be applied to the subject so far as I can perceive, is the condition of the two kings of Lacedæmon, or the two consuls of the Romans. But as both these destinies already enjoyed supreme and equal powers, in what manner could one reward the other but by abasing himself? The Trinitarians fall back on the incomprehensibility of the Godhead, and thus with the fallacy already mentioned, of using "a negative pregnant with an affirmative," they cover their assumption on the subject by a reference to the incomprehensibility of God, whereas that very incomprehensibility condemns their presumption in undertaking to expound the subject, of which it is by assertion of being incomprehensible, every speculation on the subject is either presumptuous and pernicious.

† Hence says Robert Hall, after quoting Phil. ii. 6–11, "Here we see Christ is set forth as the greatest example of condescension, in that though he bore the form of God, yet he took upon him also the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men. These particulars could not have added any humiliation in our Savior on the supposition of his having no previous existence, for a mere man higher than human. No person (man) was ever praised for humility in respect that he was found in fashion as a man, or appeared as the servant of the most High: these are the necessary appendages of the condition and existence quite foreign from sin will, and cannot form a sufficient entry into the complex system of that part of his moral character which respects feebleness of mind."

ORIENTAL SKETCHES.—Second Series. Number 20.

THRESHING FLOORS AND THRESHING INSTRUMENTS.

The threshing floors of Mejdel were near our tents. We went over to them in the grey twilight. They are circles of smooth ground fifteen to twenty yards in diameter. Each had on it a heap of newly-reaped grain: and round the outer edges of the heaps were broad flattened belts, where the threshing instruments" had already been at work. Labor had ceased for the night, and the oxen were feeding freely on the half-trodden grain, as if their masters were resolved to obey to the letter the Scripture command, "Thou shalt not muzzle the ox when he treadeth out the corn." Deut. xxv. 4. The threshing instruments are flat, heavy, wooden slabs, some five feet long by three feet wide, slightly turned up in front. The under surface is thickly studded with knobs of hard stone or iron. A massive piece of wood, with its rows of projecting nail-heads, will give the best idea of a morej, as the instrument is now called. Each is drawn by a yoke of oxen. The driver stands on the morej; and the goad, with which he urges on and directs the movements of his team, is a formidable weapon. It is sometimes ten feet long, and has a sharp iron point. We could now see that the feat of Shamgar, who "slew of the Philistines six hundred men with an ox-goad," was not so very wonderful as some have been accustomed to think. Judges iii. 31. The oxen advance in front, "treading out" the grain, and the morej follows, crushing and cutting the straw with its "teeth," till it is reduced almost to dust. 2 Ki. xiii. 7. How graphic are the words of Isaiah, "Behold I will make thee a new sharp threshing instrument having teeth; thou shalt thresh the mountains and beat them small, and thou shalt make the hills as chaff!" xli. 15. How terrible must have been the cruelty inflicted by Damascus on Gilead, when Amos thus describes it: "They have threshed Gilead with threshing instruments of iron!" i. 3.

The people were at their evening meal. Each group squatted in a circle round a huge bowl of burghul—masters and servants, with equal freedom, tearing off little bits of thin, soft bread, and using them as spoons to lift the savoury stew—thus dipping their "morsels" (Ruth ii. 14), or "sops" (John xiii. 26), into the dish. It was a most interesting scene, again bringing vividly before our minds the narrative of the threshing-floors of Boaz at Bethlehem.

ASCALON.

With the first dawn we were in the saddle, and bounding away through the groves of Mejdel. The morning air was fragrant with the perfume of wild flowers, and filled with the sweet, soft "voice of the turtle," which seemed to float from tree to tree—now behind, now in front, now close on the right, now far away on the left, as if given back by a thousand echoes. The groves and fields are soon left behind, and we enter the sandy waste. Giving our eager horses the rein, they plunge on madly, over ridge and through hollow. The Mediterranean soon came into view; and a noble view it was—a boundless expanse of blue water,

"Canopied by the blue sky.
So cloudless, clear, and purely beautiful,
That God alone was to be seen in heaven."

Before us, on the shore, was a green oasis, in the midst of the white waste of sand. Orchards of apples and apricots, palm trees rising gracefully over them, and the soft and varied foliage of vines and pomegranates forming a dense underwood. Behind this desert paradise, and protecting it from the all-devouring drift, rose what appeared to be a line of jagged cliffs. We rode straight to the oasis, and entering, discovered in the midst of it the little village of Jurah. Looking up we now saw that the cliffs resolved themselves into the ruined ramparts of Ascalon. We rode on. Our horses saw the rugged heights and seemed to know their task. Onward and upward they pressed, now gathering their feet close together on a block of masonry, now springing lightly as gazelles across a chasm, now scrambling painfully up the shattered wall; and at length, with a leap and a snort of triumph, gaining the very summit of the battlements.

What a scene of desolation there burst at once upon our view! With all my previous experience of Syrian ruins—and I had seen Beerah and Kenath, Gedara and Samaria, Baalbeck and Palmyra—I was not prepared for this. Such utter, terrible desolation I had never met before. The site of Ascalon is in form like an old Roman theater—the sea in front, and the ground once occupied by the city, rising gradually and uniformly to the wall, which runs in a semi-circle from shore to shore. The whole site was before us. Not a house, nor a fragment of a house remains standing. Not a foundation of temple or palace can be traced entire. One half of it is occupied with miniature fields, and vineyards, and fig orchards; rubbish-mounds here and there among them, and great heaps of hewn stones, and broken shafts, and sculptured slabs of granite and marble. The rude fences exhibit similar painful evidences of ancient wealth and magnificence. The other half of the site was still more fearfully desolate. It is so thickly covered with drift sand, that not a heap of rubbish, not a vestige of a ruin remains visible, save here and there where the top of a column rises like a tombstone above the smooth surface. The sand is fast advancing; it has already covered some of the highest fragments of the southern and western wall, and ere a quarter of a century has passed, the site of Ascalon will have been blotted out forever.

Dismounting, I took out my Bible and read the doom pronounced upon Ascalon by the prophets Zechariah and Zephaniah—"Askelon shall not be inhabited"—"Askelon shall be a desolation." Zech. ix. 5; Zeph. ii. 4. Ascalon is a desolation; it shall not be, was not be, inhabited! As we stood there and looked, we said to each other, "The eye of the omniscient God alone could have foreseen such a doom as this."

We lingered long among the ruins of Ascalon, visiting every rubbish heap, and inspecting every column. The walls were interesting to us, not so much from their high antiquity, or the almost miraculous way in which they have been rent and shattered and tumbled down in huge fragments, as from the fact that they were last built, in crusading times, by our lion-hearted King Richard.

GAZA.

Gaza is ten miles from Ascalon as the crow flies. In three hours we were at our tents, which we found ready pitched in an olive grove some distance from the town. We had a long evening before us, and sufficient time to see all the objects of interest in and around the place. We were anxious to gain admission to the great mosque—the only building of any historic note now standing in Gaza. It was formerly a Christian church, built by the Empress Eudoxia, about A. D. 406. We were disappointed, as we found the fanatical populace prepared to resist by main force any attempt at intrusion.

Gaza still contains about 15,000 inhabitants. The town resembles a cluster of large villages. The principal one stands on the top of a low hill, and the others lie on the plain at its base. The hill appears to be composed in a great measure of the accumulated ruins of successive cities. We can see portions of massive walls and the ends of old columns cropping up everywhere from the rubbish. There are no walls or defences of any kind; and the inhabitants have long been known as a fierce and lawless set of fanatics. Between Gaza and the sea is a belt of sand, about three miles wide. A mile east of the town a ridge of low hills runs parallel to the coast. Between the sand and these hills the ground is of unrivalled fertility, and supplies the town with abundance of the choicest fruit and vegetables.

As we stood examining the architecture of the great mosque, which occupies the crown of the hill, an old Moslem sheikh came up, and said, pointing with his pipe to a deep cutting in a mound of rubbish near us, "There is Samson's Gate." "Who is Samson?" we asked. "A giant who came to Ghuzeh; and when the infidels who then lived here shut the gate to keep him in, he pulled it off, killed the keepers with a blow of the bar, and carried the whole away under his arm." "Where did he take the gate to?" we again inquired. "To the top of that hill where you see the tooly"—turning the end of his long pipe to the highest point of the ridge to the eastward.

The sheikh was in all probability right. Whether or no, we were gratified to hear such a tradition lingering on this spot. I wandered away alone through the gardens and orchards, and climbed Samson's Hill. I was amply repaid for my toil. The view is wide and most interesting. The town lay at my feet with its circuit of verdure; beyond it the white sandy downs; and farther still, the Mediterranean, gleaming in the sunlight. On the south, the great road to Egypt, so often trodden by the Pharaohs, running away along the plain, a meandering line. The valley of Gerar was visible—a depression in the plain, extending from the coast far inland. I could see in it the black tents of the Arabs, who now feed their flocks on the pastures once so highly prized by Abraham and Isaac (Gen. xx. 1–16; xxvi.) On the east and northeast was spread out the great undulating plain of Philistia, patched with green and red in the foreground, but dissolving into a uniform grey in the distance, and shut in in the far distance by the mountains that encircle Hebron now ruddy with the evening sun.

I took the candle and proceeded down the staircase, when we entered a large room, called the Hall of Judgment. In the centre of it was a large block, and a chain fastened to it. On this they had been accustomed to place the accused, chained to his seat. On one side of the room was an elevated seat, called the throne of judgment. This the Inquisitor-general occupied, and on either side were seats, less elevated, for the holy fathers when engaged in the solemn business of the holy Inquisition. From this room we proceeded to the right, and obtained access to small cells, extending the entire length of the edifice; and here what a sight met our eyes! How has the benevolent religion of Jesus been abused and slandered by its professed friends?

These cells were places of solitary confinement, where the wretched objects of inquisitorial hate were confined year after year, till death released them from their sufferings, and their bodies were suffered to remain until they were entirely decayed, and the rooms had become fit for others to occupy. To prevent this practice being offensive to those who occupied the Inquisition, there were flues or tubes extending to the open air, sufficiently capacious to carry off the odor from these decaying bodies. In these cells we found the remains of some who had paid the debt of nature; some of them had been dead apparently but a short time, of others nothing remained but the bones, still chained to the floor of their dungeon. In others we found the living sufferers of every age and of both sexes, from the young man and maiden to those of three-score and ten years, all as naked as when they were born into the world. Our soldiers immediately applied themselves to releasing these captives from their chains, stripped themselves in part of their own clothing to cover these wretched beings, and were exceedingly anxious to bring them up to the light of day. But aware of the danger, I insisted on their wants being supplied, and that they should be brought gradually to the light, as they could bear it.

When we had explored these cells, and opened the prison-doors of those who yet survived, we proceeded to explore another room on the left. Here we found the instruments of torture, of every kind which the ingenuity of man or devils could invent. At the sight of them the fury of our soldiers refused any longer to be restrained. They declared that every Inquisitor, monk and soldier of the establishment deserved to be put to the torture. We did not attempt any longer to restrain them. They commenced at once the work of torture with the holy fathers. I remained till I saw four different kinds of torture applied, and then retired from the awful scene, which terminated not while one individual remained of the former guilty inmates of this antechamber of hell, on whom they could wreak revenge. As soon as the poor sufferers from the cells of the Inquisition could with safety be brought out of their prison into the light of day, news having been spread far and near that numbers had been rescued from the Inquisition, all who had been deprived of friends by the holy office came to inquire if theirs were among the number.

O what meeting was there! About a hundred who had been buried alive for many years, were now restored to the active world, and many of them found here a son and there a daughter, here a sister and there a brother, and some, alas, could recognize no friends. The scene was such a one as no tongue can describe. When this work of recognition was over, to complete the business in which I had engaged, I went to Madrid and obtained a large quantity of gunpowder, which I placed underneath the edifice and its vaults, and as we applied the slow match there was a joyful sight to thousands of admiring eyes. O, it would have done your heart good to see it; the walls and massive turrets of that proud edifice were raised towards the heavens, and the Inquisition of Madrid was no more. —American Tract Society.

MY SHEEP HEAR MY VOICE.

Rev. W. C. Gilbert.

The shepherd of the fifth id
Leadeth all his flock along.
Over mountain heights—over lowlands fair,
As I hear through the vibrant air
Ringeth his well-known song.

He goeth on and—upward still.
Thro' mist and brush and brake—
I remember still the parting sheep
And question of the rocky steep,
Over which their path they take.

The ramblers' pilgrimage of pain
Fall on his watchful ear.
He sees their bleeding, tender feet,
He listens to the feeble bleat,
And pauses—quick to hear.

He gathers them in loving arms,
To folds them to his breast,
And comforts—till his shepherd's call,
Right cheerily they follow—all
Unto a place of rest.

Dear Shepherd of thy earthly flock,
Help us to follow thee!
Thro' rough thy path, thro' dark and drear,
Or 'mid the flowers let us hear
The cheering voice of love.

GENESIS THE THIRD: HISTORY NOT FABLE.—Lecture III.—Part 2.

THE SENTENCES PRONOUNCED ON THE MAN, THE WOMAN, AND THE SERPENT-TEMPTER.

I consider then the account of the action of the serpent in two aspects. first as it would have appeared to Adam and Eve, and then in the light thrown upon it by subsequent revelation.

I. It is on the face of the narrative that Eve, on hearing the serpent speak, suspected no hostile agency, and regarded the power of speech only as the newly-discovered faculty of a creature already noted for its intelligence. Mr. Romanes, in his charming book of the "Animal Intelligence," tells wonderful and well-authenticated stories of the intelligence, and even affection, of the non-poisonous order of boa-constrictors and pythons, which have been trained by English ladies to come at their call, to fold gently their mighty forms around the persons of entertainers, and to give and receive marks of affection in perfect amity. Sir Emerson Tennant adds, that in Ceylon, even the poisonous and deadly cobra (the Naja of India, whose Sanskrit name was believed by the late learned Mr. Cooper to recall the root of the Semitic Nachash of Genesis) is trained as a protector in place of dogs, by wealthy natives—to glide about the house, a terror to thieves, but never harming the inmates." (Romanes, p. 265.)

If Eve had heard any of the parrot kind imitating speech, the wonder at the speech of so intelligent an animal as the serpent would have been less. Both Adam and Eve were new to nature, they were not philosophers, and through inexperience could not tell what phenomena might not appear in the wonderful creatures by whom they were surrounded. What must have been clear to her mind was that no animal and action, hostile to the command of their common Maker, ought to weigh for a moment against the authority of God. The evasion of the intelligent serpent increased the force of the temptation presented by the mysterious tree, whose fruit would impart a certain lofty sort of wisdom or knowledge; but this only doubled the pull of the attraction on her lower nature, on her senses, her curiosity, her wish for independent knowledge, while the higher nature within her was still drawn in the opposite direction by her duty to her husband and to her God. It was choice on the wrong side between two powerful attractions—for minds, like worlds, are placed between two forces. As is usual with sinners, she laid the blame afterwards on the temptation. This was only the first example on earth of the general law in all worlds, that a free agent, serving God, must resist when tempted to disobedience, even the attraction of the universe; and obedience under such temptation is more precious to God than any other form of character in the creation. It is tried character—"the trial of faith" which we value, and which our Maker values so highly; trustworthiness, based on the fixed loyalty of trust and love.

II. Now, if we look at this narrative in the light of the later revelations of Scripture, what do we discover therof

First, we find everywhere in the New Testament, not only the general doctrine that God's servants on earth are compelled to accept a combat with "principalities and powers in heavenly places," with a "power of darkness," a "power of the air," against which they are to "wrestle and pray," a power secret and unseen, acting from an ambush, and ready to deceive and mislead, and lead to death all who will not watch against temptation and "resist, steadfast in the faith," but we are assured by Christ and his apostles, speaking in God's name, that this was the same power which lay hid beneath the serpent in Paradise.

Christ himself is represented by two of the evangelists as being tempted at the beginning of his work, or tried "by the devil" in the same three directions in which Adam and Eve were tempted—through the appetite, through the imagination, and through the lust of ambition and independence. Christ declares in the plainest language that the Devil, whom he terms "the Father" of the Scribes and Pharisees, was a "man-killer from the beginning, and a liar" obviously referring to this narrative in Genesis, and identifying Satan with the serpent. St. John, in the Apocalypse, speaks twice of "the Devil and Satan" as the "Ancient Serpent"—still more distinctly touching that the act and speech of the serpent was inspired by a mightier Power who sought to take away the eternal life of man, to hinder him from attaining an immortality of life and glory.

Again, I fall back on Scripture history, taken literally as it stands, for a precedent which confirms my faith in the literal narrative. Thrice in the Evangelical history, in St. Matthew, Mark, and Luke—there appears a wonderful account of the expulsion of daimonia, or evil spirits from possessed men, who lived in restraint and hideous misery among the tombs of Gadara, crying and shrieking night and day. That they were evil spirits is clear from their awful question to the Son of God, "Art thou come hither to torment us before the time," indicating their knowledge that a certain time was fixed, so many ages hence, when they are to undergo the damnation of hell, everlasting destruction by the hand of Christ, the queller of the Power of Darkness. Those numerous spirits (a legion) prayed him not to send them out—i. e., of the world, "into the deep"—i. e., the abyss, or bottomless pit. They further asked leave to "enter into the vast herd of swine feeding on the mountains." It is said, "Then he suffered them." Now such things are wholly beyond the range of ordinary experience, but for one I believe this history, thrice persistently asserted by the evangelists; and it proves that the almost universally diffused notion of transmigration of departed souls and spirits, (if Josephus is right the daimonia were held by the Jews to be the departed souls of wicked men,) was not so wholly contrary to fact as must have supposed.* We do not yet know all the facts respecting the demons and their relations to the spiritual world. Perhaps there are some mysteries as yet unstudied by biologists in the connection between that spiritual world and animated nature.

But my object in referring to the gospel narrative here is to show to believers in the New Testament that if a number of evil spirits once entered into swine, similar events may have occurred before, and that hence it is not so wholly incredible that much earlier a mighty evil Spirit, when no other mode of man-killing was possible or permitted, entered into a splendid serpent, in order to deceive the first woman, and to achieve, through her, the destruction of mankind.

Later on we read, in St. John's gospel, xiii. 27, that this same Satan, "after the sop, entered into Judas"—language quite distinct from the earlier words, "Satan having now put it into the heart of Judas to betray him," and marking some more direct possession and incarnation after that audacious, "Lord, is it I?" For when Gethsemane was reached, Christ attributed the treachery of Judas to the "coming of the Prince of this world"—"the Prince of this world approacheth"—just as he had said still earlier, "Have not I chosen you twelve, and one of you is Diabolos?" John vi. 70.

On these grounds, then, I do not find so insuperable a difficulty as some Christians do in believing that the action and speech of the serpent in Genesis were real, supernatural, and diabolical.

Next, I suppose no one who admits the existence of Satan, and of the lying wonders which are attributed to his agency in the Bible, will doubt that it may have been within the compass of archangelic power to produce vocal sounds from the moth even of a serpent. Much more astonishing things have occurred through, I believe, inferior demonic power, in our own day, among the necromancers and spiritualists, if we are to give credit to such careful and practised witnesses as Mr. W. Crookes, F. R. S., Mr. Alfred Wallace, F. R. S., and many others. But on this argument, since the facts are disputed, I rest nothing.

But now you will ask, "Granting all that can fairly be said of evil spirits, and the possibility of their actual and human incarnations, what conceivable advantage can be given of this entering specially into a serpent? Temptation in human form, or even through one of the nobler animals, would be much more credible."

That is one hypothesis. Now, here I can only offer another hypothesis; but, I think, one strong enough to overbalance the opinion that no such event can have occurred. Suppose it to be true, as is laid down uniformly in the Scriptures, that although man is tempted by the envious evil power who receives permission to try his faith, this whole process of trial is, in all its details, under the strictest divine limitation and control, so that Satan can, neither by himself, nor by angels, nor by his human agents, go one step further than God "suffers them." Suppose it be true that God will permit no well-disposed person to be "tempted above what he is able to bear," suppose, as in the dramatic history of Job, revealing ancient beliefs, Satanic power is never allowed to advance beyond the line dictated by a merciful regard to man's infirmity, and that each trial is regulated and limited by the divine knowledge of an honest soul's resources of resistance. Suppose that this law was applied to the temptation of our newly created first parents; and that, in their youthful and inexperienced state, knowing nothing of the history of the universe, or of the fall of angels, or the purpose of God, it was forbidden to Satan to assail their life or tempt them in the form of an equal or a superior, so that the permission to tempt was limited by the most humiliating condition—that the temptation must come, if at all, through the apparent action of one of those undeveloped and inferior animals which sported around them. Under such conditions the action of the murderous adversary becomes, at least, more intelligible. They were placed midway between the animals and their God, on trial for life eternal, or for a death like that which reigned over the peri-hable creatures of the earth. All nature beneath them, animate or inanimate, might appeal to their senses, their imagination, even their understanding and their faith, against God: but they were bound to obey him whom they knew—the Creator of all things. To listen to any inferior teaching could not be right, and must be fatal. Satan had permission, then, I suppose, to do his worst, under the miserable condition of adding the temptation which a reptile, become vocal, could offer to that of the forbidden tree in Paradise. little dreaming that in thus lowering himself, and descending, with murderous intent, to blot out their lives from the creation, he was entangling himself in a complication of defeat, through which evil would be crushed forever, and man raised, by "the seed of the woman" to the government of the universe and life everlasting.

It may be that Satan is one of the oldest beings in the universe, one who has lived and thought longest through numberless ages; to whom, therefore, the condition and necessary law of child-like faith in God's word, to be continued for ever, has become a burden, and tempted him to his ruin. It may be that we have here the oldest of intelligences become rebellious, striving through envy to destroy one of the youngest and simplest of beings, by assailing this very principle of faith in God. The history of man in Paradise, I suspect, has quite as much to do with a more ancient conflict between good and evil as with this world and its destinies. "The principalities and powers in the heavenly places are learning" here; so that the phrase, the "Ancient Serpent," perhaps carries at once a biographical reference and a contemptuous record of the meanest of incarnations for an evil end. And, further, we may suspect that this seemingly incredible narrative of the serpent's guile contains the history of a crisis in the establishment of God's sovereignty over "principalities and powers in heavenly places." A great king will sometimes lay a terribly humiliating trap to catch and to castigate a powerful and traitorous offender. But you will ask, last of all, What reasonable explanation can possibly be given of the alleged curse on the serpent—"On thy belly shalt thou go, and dust shalt thou eat all the days of thy life." Professor Huxley has sometimes said, in former years, to his pupils at Jermyn-street, "Serpents have in all ages of the world, so far as I know, gone upon their bellies; yet in the Book of Genesis it seems as if at least an early specimen once went erect, a thing unknown before; and he was punished by being reduced to crawl and crawl for ever, on the general plan of the ophidia."

Professor Huxley has an excellent defence for his sardonic gloss, in the example of some Christian commentators, who have alleged this to be the meaning of the divine curse on the serpent. But there is not a word in the narrative supporting such a notion. Suppose we take the history then, and offer an explanation in the terms following to the evolutionists and paleontologists, which from their point of view will, I think, be acknowledged to be more credible, because more consonant to the facts.—"Gentlemen, you have taught us as the result of your studies of animal nature, of which we all alike are proud, that the probable doctrine—at least over large areas of life—is that of the evolution of species, the one from the other, through all past history. You have taught us that the class of reptiles filling up the space between fishes and birds has in part ages, and in the existing world, contained nine orders, of which four are now existing, and five are extinct, having left their fossil remains in the sedimentary rocks below. These all you believe to have gradually descended from each other, or from other ancestors, in the course of illimitable time, rising, and sometimes falling and sinking in the scale of nature: for there are arrested developments and even degraded types.

"The five extinct classes of reptiles are denominated:—1. Ichthyo-ptorygia; 2. Sauro-pterygia; 3. Ptero-sauria; 4. Anomodontia; 5. Dinno-sauria—all of them confined to the secondary period of geology, all of them marine or amphibious monsters, and all of them furnished with powerful organs of locomotion in the water, on the land, or in the air—paddles, feet or wings.

"The four orders of reptiles now existing are—1. Chelonia, or turtles and tortoises: 2. Ophidia, snakes; 3. Lacertilia, lizards; 4. Crocodilia, crocodiles.

"Among these nine orders of reptiles, one order alone—that of serpents—is, and always has been, through all past ages, wingless, finless, footless. The germs of hinder legs are concealed in some few kinds of serpents, as in the boa-constrictor, enough to show their relationship with the eight other orders of limbed reptiles, which fill up the space between fishes and birds.

"Now of you, gentlemen, as evolutionists, I as an expositor of Scripture respectfully ask;—Supposing this curse on the serpent was really uttered by the Author of nature, by a living God, who knew all past history, and all anatomy, and therefore knew the strange abnormal history of the serpent order, though all its generations up till then—that is, know the history of the quee-pile order which alone among nine never developed its limbs, or any of the organs of locomotion which belong to all the other eight, since the Permian epoch; and supposing, as I must ask you to suppose for the sake of argument, this narrative of man's trial in Paradise, as explained in the later portions of the Bible, were true, so that the serpent was the organ of a brighter but viler intelligence, I put it to you, evolutionists — Would it be utterly irrational to take the words of the Supreme Judge thus, speaking first to the serpent, but more profoundly to the evil power which had sunk so low as to employ this reptile form?—'Because thou hast done this, thou art cursed above all cattle, and above every beast of the field. Upon thy belly hast thou gone from the days of old, the one undeveloped, crawling, limbless reptile among all the kindred orders above thee and beneath thee! And on thy belly shalt thou go all the days of thy life, so long as the world shall last; no higher development awaits thee, no evolution into a nobler type; but still carrying the marks, in thy unborn hinder limbs, of a better kinship thou shalt go on hissing, crawling, poisoning the world, hateful and hated, striking man's heel, yet punished by his cruelty, until the time comes when thou shalt be added to the already extinct orders of reptiles, and the 'woman's Seed,' destined to endless duration, shall bruise thee out of the creation.'

Such a meaning, I think, might have been conveyed in full biological truth by such a Divine Speaker to such a serpent. Here would be no implication of his being reduced from a previous higher form to a limbless creeper, but a sentence of continued crawling on the ground, without any hope of evolution into a noble development. And, on the supposition that the typical serpent form concealed some mighty Spirit of evil, the antagonist of human life, how awful the deeper enigmatical meaning of the words of the Judge, not understood by the fallen pair, but understood well enough by the object of the curse;—Origin of evil! thou hast sunk so low from thy once heavenly brightness — so low in envy, spite, and murder, as willingly to take even a reptile form, and that form the hatefullest, to reach thy end. Crawl then, Spirit of darkness, to the end of thy days, and lick the dust with all the enemies of light and righteousness. For evil is conquerable, and is not eternal, and has no further evolution into greatness and victory. Thou thoughtest to the narrative supporting such a notion. In your thirst after truth in the abstract, and your love of science, you have not forgotten the Author of truth and science. You have not forgotten the Author of truth and science. You have not forgotten the Author of truth and science. You

THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXII. Read PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, JULY 25, 1883. NO. 28.

THE RESTITUTION.

TERMS—TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR, Payable in advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.

Address all Letters and Communications to THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

BRITISH PHASE OF THE EASTERN QUESTION.—No. 36.

Colonization period continued—Solomon and Hiram, kings of Tyre—Spain, its colonization—Tin-Islands—Ireland, its name—Early colonization and civilization—Scotland and England—Colonization period concluded—Refugees—All these were pioneer movements, preparatory to the Gothic, Germanic or Scythian emigration.

Colonization period continued.—We have already traced the Hebrew colonization and traffic, westward as far as Italy. Let us notice another channel of communication, that of the south, through the Red Sea. A fleet of merchant vessels was constructed by Solomon at Ezion-Geber, east gulf of the Red Sea. This fleet was composed of ships constructed of the pattern of the Phœnician vessels, used in their voyages to Tarshish, Spain. Hiram furnished the pattern and most of the men, while the vessels were built at the expense of Solomon. This fleet sailed on voyages of three years duration; visiting Indian, Arabian and African ports. Some authors hold that they sailed around Africa to Spain. Why could they have not sailed directly into the Mediterranean Sea through the ancient Suez canal? It may be said, that that canal was not so ancient. This is not known.

These voyages made the Hebrews a commercial people, and their colonies grew up in every quarter of the globe. It cannot be supposed, that, in these times their European colonization and traffic were suspended. The maritime tribes, with Phœnician merchants, were still extending the boundaries of their commerce. We shall now speak of the Israelites in Spain. That Tarshish was in Spain, is so generally conceded, that but little is required on that point. Tarshish became at length to be the name of any port visited by ships of Tarshish, or by those constructed after that pattern. The articles which Tarshish is stated by the prophet Ezekiel (xxvii. 12) to have supplied to Tyre are precisely as we know through classical writers to have been productions of the Spanish Peninsula.—Wei. Smith. Tin was in early times obtained from Tartessus, Spain, a small amount from Lusitania; but principally in Cornwall, England. The Phœnicians and Israelites visited and colonized part of Spain. That there were anciently Israelitish colonies in Spain, would appear from Paul's desire to visit Spain, those being descendants of the ancient colonies. It is reasonable, also, to suppose that Tarshish would carry its name still farther to the N. W.—"To the Isles of the Gentiles."

On an ancient map of Ptolemy, England and Scotland are called Javan. In the Bible they are called "Isles of the West." Javan was the son of Japheth, who was given Europe. Tarshish and Kittim were sons of Javan, who settled on the western coasts of Europe, Spain, Portugal and France. Europe is called "Isles of the Gentiles" (Gen. x. v.), since it included all the surrounding islands of the seas and ocean. Including all the countries visited by the Hebrews in ships. Tarshish, proper, must therefore have a European location.

"The ships of Tarshish" were Phœnician, of Hebrew vessels (principally of Dan and Asher) that carried on commerce with those western countries, which afterward gave its name to the commercial fleets of Solomon at Ezion-Geber. Wherever they went they went by the name of "The ships of Tarshish."

The following are from histories:—"Tin and bright iron were brought into Gaul from the western isles, 620 years B. C.—Diodorus.

"The whole of the Roman empire was supplied with metals and with tin from Britania. Also Greece as early as B. C. 907."—Pliny.

"The Phœnicians took purple, scarlet, rich stuffs, tapestry, costly furniture, and curious works of art to the west beyond the Straits of Hercules; and brought back gold, silver, iron and tin."—Rollin. "Voyages to Cornwall, England, for tin and iron, were of frequent occurrence. 620 B. C."—Von Humboldt and Lewis. "Xenophon, who went 100 years later than Ezekiel, describes one of those ships of Tarshish starting for Gades, now Cadez." "Some will inquire why having made so long a discourse of Lybia and Iberia, we have not spoken more fully of the outlet at the Pillars of Hercules, nor of the interior sea, nor yet indeed of the Britanic Isles, and the working of tin, nor of the gold and silver mines of Iberia."—Polybius.

"Beyond the Pillars of Hercules (straits of Gibraltar) the ocean flows round the earth. In this ocean, however, there are two islands, and those are very large, and are called Britanic, Albion and Ierne, which are larger than those before named. They lie beyond the Keltic, and there are not a few small islands around the Britanic Isles and around Iberia."—Aristotle. "I cannot speak with certainty nor am I acquainted with the Islands called Cassiterides from which tin is brought to us."—Herodotus. An English historian says that the tin, named here by Herodotus, came from Cornwall, England. The country was known to the Phœnicians, who traded for tin, which, when mixed with copper, was the ancient bronze. This "bright iron" was used in Solomon's temple.

"The British tin mines mainly supplied the glorious adornment of Solomon's temple."—Sir Edward Creasy's History of England.

After the overthrow of the Persian empire God says to Israel, "Pass ye over to Tarshish. Pass through thy land as a river, O daughter of Tarshish." Isa. xxiii. 6. (See Isa. lxvi. 19. "Islands afar off," (Yarish Islands).

The Hebrew influence went along the southern coasts of the "Great Sea." It went to Carthage, Rollin says, The Carthaginians were indebted to the Tyrians, not only for their origin, but for their manners, language, customs, laws, religion, and their great application to commerce. They spoke the same language with the Tyrians, and these same with the Canaanites and Israelites, that is, the Hebrew tongue, or at least a language which was entirely derived from it.

From the quotations given, no one will question the fact of the early Hebrew colonization and commercial enterprises. Nor is it a matter of any doubt, that they extended along the northern and southern coasts of the Mediterranean sea, or the Atlantic coast with its immense clusters of islands about Ireland and England. That these countries were full of Israelitish colonies from B. C. 1200 to 720 B. C., that when, as in 2 Esdras xiii., they resolved to go to the far-off west they were going to their own countrymen, where they would not be molested. From Media and Persia their route would be overland in the direction of the metallic image, through those countries of the four Gentile monarchies, which, as four horns, which have scattered Judah, Israel and Jerusalem, Zech. i. 18.; in the line of the mounds of Asia Minor. Their trail is still seen along the zone of mounds and empires.

The land, requiring a year and a half to reach it, was called Arsareth. What land was entitled to that name "far-off land?" Arsareth is said to be composed of two Hebrew words: "Ars" and "Areth." Areth, or Aretha meaning land, or earth, or country, giving us Ars-land, or Erse-land, or Ireland, (Yarish) far-off land, "land of Espousals," see Isa. ii. 14-20. The same author traces the word Kelt, or Celt, and Gael, or Gaelic, and Kymbri, and Engli, or Angli, and Saxon, all to their original Hebrew; and says, "All these races, then,—the Danes, Saxons, Angles, Gaels, Celts (Kelts), Cymbri (Kymbri), and the Northmen (German W.), are the lost tribes." Mr. McIntosh, learned in the Hebrew, says further, "We have clearly proved that the place "Arsareth," to which the ten tribes journeyed, was no other than Ireland, a word which is nearer Erse-land in its form than is Ireland; and that all the peoples of these Islands can be identified with the lost tribes." Parkhurst says, "It seems not a little remarkable that the Northern nations should have retained the Hebrew word so nearly in its physical sense. The Saxon 'Bael' signifies a fire. Bel, or Bael, was the name of the chief deity of the ancient Irish, which, according to Col. Wallancy, they derived from the Punic."

"The people of South Ireland are the descendants of the Canaanites, who spoke the Phœnician language, having an alphabet of sixteen letters. The Irish language is identical with the Phœnician, containing the veritable sixteen letters. They themselves boast of this descent. There are many ethnological proofs that they are an descended."—Edward Hine.

As to Ireland, allow us another quotation: "I have noticed those Island of Britain, as named in the Bible, called the 'Isles of the West.'" The Isles of Tarshish, Javan, and Earsland or Arsareth, we find other names given, at an early day. They were called "Yarish," a Hebrew word, which means the land of the sun setting, or the land afar off. This name comes very near the word Irish. The Phœnicians, or men from the country of palms, who were the first traders to these islands, called them "Bretanse," the land of tin, from this name comes our word Britannia. The Phœnicians also called them "Iberne," the farthest off land. To them Ireland was called the farthest off land. They knew nothing of America. From this name "Iberne" came our Hibernia. In the days of Grecian conquest the names of all those places were changed; those Islands were called "Skotes," which means the land of the sun setting; from this name by the ordinary changes, we have Skuthes, or wanderers,—and Southei, Southe, Souit, Souithan, Scythian, Scots, Scot, Scottish, Scotland. The Greeks also called those Islands "Cassiterides," from Cassiteros, the name given to the tin islands.

Aristotle, in his treatise of the Globe, called "De Mundo," dedicated to Alexander the Great, calls those islands "Albion," as did Festus in his account of the voyage of Hamilcar. The inhabitants in Scotland spent a long time in Albania in the east, and, as was often done, they named their country after the one from which they came; the same people do the same thing now when they emigrate. In the account of the Argonautica, Ireland was called "Iorinda."

Ptolemy called those Islands "Iouraa." He says, "They were peopled by the descendants of the Hebrews, and were skilled in smelting operations, and excelled in working metals. The Romans called them Anglisea."—Ibid.

Dan, the head tribe of traffic and colonization.—This will fully appear from what has been said, and from the following supplementary items. Dan's lot of land along the Mediterranean sea, was the least of the tribes. The Jowlands he could not conquer. He conquered a form between Lebanon and the sea,—pushing the inhabitants out of it. Here he found timber for ships, and being on the commercial highway from Damascus to Tyre and Sidon, he found an excellent market for his surplus produce, selling ship timber at the same time to the chief sea ports of Phœnicia. Such commercial associations soon put him onto the sea with ships. In the day of Deborah's victory, Dan was missing, for sang Deborah, B. C. 1269. "Why did Dan remain in his ships?" For 5½ centuries Dan (the tribe of) was upon the sea, as we can trace by the names of places. The Danites were not confined simply to the sea; they entered the mouths of the rivers, and scattered their tribal name all over Europe, and the western Asia. Dan-ube-Dan-lester, Dan-au, Dan-au, Dan-ina, Dan-taig, Dan-embury, Dan-ois, Dan-ester, Dandari, Dan, Dan-mark, Dan-rio Alps, and the Danish Archipelago. In Ireland we have Dan's-Lough, Dan-Bower, Dan-Sobairse, Dan-gen Castle. "The old inhabitants of Ireland were called Dan-onians. There was a Daniel in every house down to Dan O'Connell. There were Dan-ans in Argos, Greece. When all Israel was numbered, 1 Chron., Dan is not there; nor is he among the tribes in Rev. vii. But he is in his place in Ezekiel xlviii. 1, 2. These facts show that in the first two periods of time, Dan was absent; but, in the future division of the land, he would be found in his place. These facts are worthy of special attention.

"Eldad, an eminent Jewish writer, says, 'In Jeroboam's day, 975 B. C., Dan refused to shed his brother's blood; and, rather than go to war with Noah and Enoch; and how the words "land drawn nigh" reminds us of the words of the Son when he comes, "the kingdom hath drawn nigh unto you." "Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." Then we read of other bond-servants sent more than the first, and lastly and finally (the I. 2. 3. type again) the sending of the Son. Ah, but this part of the parable is very clear to us. Are we not all of us in one way and another saying in our hearts one thing that those wicked husbandmen said, let us have (i. e., keep possession of) his inheritance. Do we realize as we ought that all we have and are belongs to our Lord the Christ? That the whole cosmos of this heavens and this earth is his by legal inheritance, whether it is our "dominion" of life or any material wealth or possessions that may have been added to it? That he is willing and ready to divide it with brethren, but that he does not purpose to and will not be robbed of any the least part of it? "That which the Father hath given me is greater than all, and no one can rob from out the Father's hand." "Everything that the Father hath given unto me will come unto me" does not relate to persons alone. John vi. 37. The "palingenesia" includes more than persons.

But we read again "Therefore the kingdom of God will have been taken away from you and given unto a nation that produceth its fruits. And the chief priests and Pharisees when they had heard his parables knew that he spake of them."

Now who and what is this other nation here spoken of. Is the church as it now exists such a nation? Is it that nation? Is it not designated parenthetically, I mean the period of time which we are now in as the times of the Gentiles (i. e., of the nations)? Are these nations the Christian nations, I mean, in some an organic nation, such as was the Jewish nation here referred? Is there not a time coming, yea, comparatively near at hand when those who have been and who are being called out are to be re-organized into a nation with a king and a law, the object of which shall be to produce the fruits of righteousness? Will not the law go forth again from Zion and will not the kingdoms of this earth be broken in pieces as a potter's vessel? Is this change to take place by the slow processes of disintegration and decay even and so the change take place? Is that the way a potter's vessel is broken? Do not all the teachings of Scripture point to a sudden change and a violent disruption of this order of things. Does it seem to you my brother that the selfishness of this world is gradually growing less and that the church as an organic body is yet fitted to rule the world any better than it now rules itself? We have had one experience of ecclesiastical rule, the Catholic; does the world, do good Christian men and woman want another? Would they like to see Protestantism as an organic body try the same experiment? No, "Ye are not of this order of things" (this cosmos). "My kingdom is not of this order of things." No, there must be a great change before the saints can rule in righteousness. One must learn obedience before he is fitted for rule: even in this order of things, much more in a heavenly order. The object of this period of humiliation and tribulation, as I apprehend, is to learn obedience and fit us if possible for the exalted responsibilities of rule. Let the church not forget this and the instruction, "Know ye not that the rulers of the nations lord it over them and their great oppress them? Not so will it be among you, But whoever among you shall have purposed to be great will be your servant (deacon), and whoever among you shall have purposed to be first (chief) will be your bond-servant. Even as the Son of man come not to be served but to serve and to give his life a ransom for many."

Then we are reminded in the parable that this Master of a Household is going to return some time—come home. David says in the 67th Psalm moreover, "Yea indeed, the Lord will pitch his tent at last." John in the apocalypse does not see the saints going up from earth to heaven and God, but God coming down to his saints and a new heavens and a new earth in which dwelleth righteousness, and he heard a great voice from out the throne saying, the tabernacle (the tent) of God is with men and he will tabernacle with them, and they will be his royal people and he will be their God. And David in the same Psalm says again, "Thou (God) hast received gifts in man (kind), though they disbelieve that thou wilt pitch thy tent." The blessed event is coming then whether men believe or not. What a comfort this is in this age of unbelief. And let us remember that the Christ said, "When I come again shall I find faith on the earth?" The original vineyard of God's planting in this earth it seems to me was Paradise and the gentile man, and when God comes home and talks face to face with man again, Paradise will have been restored, but the vine will have filled all the earth, "and its fruit will shake like Lebanon." And the Master's household will be indeed a Household of Faith.

THE VINEYARD AND THE MASTER OF A HOUSEHOLD.

In a previous article I gave an interpretation of the parable of the Master of a Household who went out straightway at dawn to hire laborers for his vineyard, and I have referred to a deep undercurrent of divine reasoning which marks the channel in which all the parables of the Christ run. I now purpose to comment upon the parable given in the 21st chapter of Matt. 32-42 verses, and call the reader's attention to the intimate relation existing between the two parables in the flow of the divine argument.

Now the household here spoken of can be no other than the "Household of Faith" as I have already shown and the general teaching of the Scriptures is clear as to its being one and but one. Moreover there can be but one (oeconomos) master of the household. Therefore this Master must be God, and the vineyard here spoken of must be the same as the one referred to in the preceding parable. The only two places spoken of in that parable were the vineyard and the (agora) market-place, the one the typical place of God's work, the other the typical place of man's selfish employment, and God's call for laborers comes from one to the other. In that parable we find the Master exerting a general supervision of the labor, but having a head-servant or steward who is managing the affairs of the vineyard and who finally pays the "wages" of the laborers. The Master appears to be away from home, as he finds idlers in "the market-place" and tells them to "go" (not come) work in my vineyard.

In this latter parable it is stated that the Master after planting his vineyard, etc., "went away from home." (apedemesen). It does not say as translated in the Common Version, and "went into a far country." It simply states the fact that he went away from home. What a world of suggestive thought there is in that simple statement. Then when God is away from his vineyard he is away from home. O, what comfort to all faithful laborers. God is away from home. Think of that. There is too much of "the far country" theology in the church it seems to me. Away in the busy mart of men looking for laborers it would seem, away in the mountains of mystery, perhaps, looking for lost sheep. Suffice it to say that in both parables he is away from home. And in this last he is represented as finally after perfecting his vineyard in all its appointments of planting and hedging, and hewing out its wine-vat and building a watch-tower, to have let it out to husbandmen, before departing, and then to be looking for revenues of fruit in due season. How plainly we see the lingering, loving look of the departing Master at the vine of his early planting, planted in the dew of that dawn when the first call for laborers went forth, so beautifully and touchingly referred to in the prophets, that perfect hedge of the law with never a break of a flaw in its symmetrical beauty, that wine-vat for the fruitful expression of man's life in sacrificial love; that watch-tower of Zion high above the surrounding verdure with its 1, 2, 3 typical periods of watch the first, middle, and morning watch, and hear the typical call, "watchman what of the night?" and the typical answer, "the morning cometh."

But we read that when the season for the fruits had drawn nigh, he sent forth his bond servants unto the husbandmen to receive his fruits. How this reminds us of John the Baptizer's exhortation, "bring forth fruits meet for repentance," and the exhortations of all the prophets back, back, back to Noah and Enoch; and how the words "land drawn nigh" reminds us of the words of the Son when he comes, "the kingdom hath drawn nigh unto you." "Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." Then we read of other bond-servants sent more than the first, and lastly and finally (the I. 2. 3. type again) the sending of the Son. Ah, but this part of the parable is very clear to us. Are we not all of us in one way and another saying in our hearts one thing that those wicked husbandmen said, let us have (i. e., keep possession of) his inheritance. ### BIBLICAL RESEARCH.

As the result of ten years' study over the problem of the present Holy Sepulcher, Lieutenant Conder concludes: 1. That the Tomb of Nicodemus, immediately west of the traditional Holy Sepulcher, is the monument of the Kings of Judah, including the tomb of David and of Solomon, and existed as such at the time of the crucifixion. 2. That a Temple of Venus, or of Ashtoreth, stood in Constantine's time over the supposed Holy Sepulcher, and that this was seen by Eusebius, and is the same shown on a coin of Antoninus Pius, which has the legend C. A. C. (Colonia Aelia Capitolina), with figures of Venus and Cupid; and that the tomb was either covered up or not known to exist, or was a crypt used for the mysteries known to have been connected with the worship of Venus (as, for example, at Apheka on Lebanon, where the temple of the mourning Venus was destroyed by Constantine's orders, like that at Jerusalem. Jerome declares that the Bethlehem crypt, over which Constantine also built a basilica, was long used as a mithræum, where the birth of Tammuz was celebrated. It will be also remembered that Constantine built another basilica on the summit of Olivet, where the footmark of Christ on the rock is still shown, and is supposed to have been imprinted at the Ascension, which traditional site, visited by Saint Helena before the Holy Sepulcher had been found, cannot be reconciled with the statement that Christ ascended near Bethany, Luke xxiv. 50; cf. Acts i. 12. It is quite possible that an old temple of Ashtoreth was restored in the second century on the spot now shown in the Holy Sepulcher Church, and was re-consecrated to Christian use by Macarius as the sepulcher of Christ. 3. That there is not a single allusion in any Christian writer earlier than Eusebius (of the fourth century A. D.) to the site of the Holy Sepulcher or of Calvary, and that we have a complete break in tradition of three centuries. The Christians left Jerusalem for Pella before the siege of Titus; and we do not know when they came back. Thus, even if they had preserved at first a feeling of veneration for the sepulcher, there is nothing to show that any tradition of its site was handed down by the apostles to their successors; so that had the site been considered very sacred by the Evangelists, they would have been more careful to describe its position. The Jews considered that a man became unclean by stepping over a hidden tomb. Yoma iii. 3; but the facts that the Holy Sepulcher was a new tomb never as yet used. Luke xxiii. 53, and that the body of Christ was raised again may have modified the regard in which this particular tomb was held. 4. That all the evidence as yet collected points clearly to the fact that the present traditional sites were not outside Jerusalem at the date of the crucifixion. This is admitted by most writers, ancient as well as modern, and it forms an objection which of itself is fatal to the authenticity of these sites.

The same officer's experience in the Egyptian campaign afforded illustration of two passages bearing on the route of the Exodus. The first is that which states, "God led the people about through the way of the Yam Suph," "God led them not through the way of the land of the Philistines, although that was near." Exodus xiii. 17. The second states that "Pharaoh will say of the children of Israel, They are entangled in the land; the wilderness hath shut them in," ch. xiv. 3. Both of these statements appear to favor the southern route. The way to the land of the Philistines was clearly that from Zoan to Quntarah, and thence to Gaza, which is still the road to Syria, the only line which can be followed, because there are wells along it, and one which was probably not far from the Mediterranean shore at the time of the Exodus, when Zoan and Baphne were almost seaports. This route was near to the Israelites in Zoan, being the direct one to Palestine, and a very possible one, even if they were going to Sinai. When the British army was advancing to Quntarah, the import of the second passage was vividly demonstrated. There was wilderness on either hand; and could the army have been driven from the Sweet Water Canal, it would, indeed, have been entangled in the land, being so completely shut in by surrounding deserts. The mixed host, if it went out along Wadi Tumeilat, by a branch perhaps of the Nile, were actually going by the way of Yam Suph. Their enemies were behind, or perhaps northwest of them; and a forced march from Pi-Ramesses and Salahiyeh would have enabled the Egyptians to seize the head of the gulf, as then existing at Ismailia, and to drive the fugitives into the sea, which was in front of them; for the chariots and chariot-horses (wrongly rendered "horsemen") of Pharaoh could have covered the ground at least twice as fast as the women, children, flocks, and herds of Israel. Here an exodus occurred which had much in common with that of Israel. The poor peasants of Port Said and Ismailia had been taught to expect every sort of outrage from the Franjis; and even when they had learned to the contrary, the humanity of the English troops, they were still afraid of the "booms"—the gun or cannon reports. The women, with great bundles on their heads, their babies hung behind them in their veils; aged men helped by their sons; the family property on a donkey; the weeping children, and the hungry looking men, recalled at once the plight of that motley host which accompanied the armed men of Israel; and the slow progress of the departing Fellahin, even though left quite unharmed, gave a practical test to the theory of Brugsch-bey requiring a march of forty miles in one day. With the chariots of Pharaoh dashing over the pebbly desert on the North, or down the valley behind; with sand-dunes covered only with dry tussocks of grass to north and south; with the swampy river-mouth in front and the sea to the right, the yellow hills of the wilderness beyond the sea, the dry wind from the north-east burning their lips, what position could have been humanly more hopeless than that of the children of Israel when Moses "stretched out his hand over the sea?"—N. Y. Independent.

Queen Victoria, who is never above womanly superstitions, must have attached a foreboding importance to that terrible disaster a week ago by which nearly 200 little children were slain. The accident happening in a hall named after the Good Queen probably deepened the melancholy which had already impelled her to seek the disconsolate seclusion of the Scottish highlands rather than witness the gayety of the London season. Everyone remembers the loss of the steamer "Princess Alice," five years ago was followed by the death of the Royal Princess for whom the ill-fated vessel had been named. Misfortunes, though scarce, have seldom come singly to Queen Victoria since the loss of her mother and her husband within a few months, in 1861, affected her with such profound grief that she retired to Balmoral for nearly fifteen years of mourning.—Philadelphia Times.

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, July 25, 1883.

OUR brethren have decided to hold our next Quarterly Conference at Argos, Ind., so as to include the second Sunday in September. Further notice hereafter.

THE letter from our new correspondent in Jerusalem—P. H. Winterstein—presents some important facts. We hope for frequent letters from that wonderful city that is so soon to be the theatre of the grandest events connected with the closing scenes of the present dispensation. We shall soon need some financial aid to our correspondents there.

THE Phrenological Journal for August is an excellent number. The article on language as connected with the invention of the art of printing is notably important. Another article, finely illustrated, entitled, "The American Switzerland," descriptive of the sublime scenery of the Grand National Park in the northwest corner of Wyoming, is a creditable article indeed.

A SELECTION that we take from the International Standard for the current month under the head of A Preface to a Work entitled "La Campagne de Moise"—the campaign of Moses—will be read with interest. It will be seen that the writer of the book is sanguine in his conclusion that—"the solemn remains of the Egyptian army swallowed up in the Red Sea, with its chariots, its horses, its arms, its treasures, its archives, and perhaps its king, the Pharaoh vanquished by Moses" may yet be brought to light by careful exploration. We do not know what might be the result of such a work, but it is certain that remains of very ancient date have been unearthed by the explorations of Heinrich Schliemann to whom allusion is made in the selection. This latter person in the years 1871–3, by his excavations on the supposed site of ancient Troy "unearthed a vast number of arms, household utensils, and ornaments of various degrees of workmanship and kinds of material. He produced a treasure of vases and various ornaments of gold, amber, and silver, which he thinks belonged to Priam, the Trojan king." It would be truly wonderful if some remains of this proud army of Egyptians, should be found embedded in the saline deposits to which allusion is made by the author. Wonderful though it might be, still such a discovery would scarcely surpass the discovery of the royal mummies at Dayr-el-Baharee in the summer of 1881, and which are now deposited in the Boulak museum at Cairo. Here, "in the central hall ranged side by side, shoulder to shoulder, lies a solemn company of kings, queens, princes, and priests of royal blood, who died, and were made imperishable flesh by the embalmer's art four thousand years ago." In the rock-recesses, where slept the greatest kings of Pharaonic Egypt, were also found hoards of bronze, silver, and gold, as well as alabaster cups, goblets of exquisite variegated glass, and many other things that belonged to those that lived before Jacob and his sons went down into Egypt. Read all such pieces with care and watch developments.

THE RENOVATION OF THE EARTH.

The Psalmist David declares, "Thou wilt renew the face of the earth." Diaglott. Jesus promised the twelve apostles that in the renovation, when he should sit upon the throne of his glory, they should "sit upon thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel." Renovation is to make new again "the face of the earth." Paul testifies, Heb. ii. 5, that unto Christ will be subjected "the world to come" ("inhabited earth to come," new version). He also declares (Rom. viii.) that the creation itself shall be delivered from its bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God. Then the creation now under the curse groaning for deliverance will become the incorruptible inheritance of the saints. He also says that the ancient worthies were pilgrims and strangers in the land promised, looking for a better—a heavenly country—the promised Canaan in its renewed state.

Paul in Heb. xii. 26, quotes the words of Haggai, ii. 6, "For thus saith the Lord of hosts, Yet once, it is a little while, and I will shake the heavens and earth and the sea and the dry land. And I will shake all nations." After this great shaking of the literal heavens and earth and sea and dry land and the literal nations besides, the desire of all nations" will come and Paul and other faithful ones will receive a literal kingdom that cannot be moved, because it will be under heavens and upon an earth that will experience no more earthquakes, or cyclones. The apostle John, in his visions of the future, saw new heavens and a new earth, for the first heavens and earth would pass away, and there would be no more sea, no more pain or death in that beautiful world—Paradise restored—restitution of all things! The New Jerusalem, whose builder and maker is God, will be in the midst of the new earth with its pearly gates and golden streets, illuminated by the glory of God and the Lamb,—God's tabernacle seen by John coming down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband. This is the city that the patriarchs and primitive Christians looked for by faith and hope for Paul says, Heb. xiii. 14, "For here have we no continuing city, but we seek one to come."

But some object that the new heavens and earth of Peter and John cannot be literal because it is said that the first heaven and earth were passed away. Let other testimony of David as quoted by Paul explain this difficulty. "And thou, Lord, in the beginning hast laid the foundations of the earth, and the heavens are the works of thy hands; they shall perish; but thou remainest; and they all shall wax old as a garment, and as a vesture shalt thou fold them up and they shall be changed." See Psa. cii.; Heb. i. 10. God, in the beginning, laid the foundation of a literal earth and the literal heavens are the works of his hand. "They shall perish" but not in the sense of annihilation, for "they shall be changed." The old earth is to be changed to a new and thus become again "very good." This change will be so great that it will be as if the old earth and heavens with all their curse, sin and death had passed entirely away and new ones created in their place. The passing away is a figure representing the stupendous change of the literal planet on which we live and the atmospheric heavens above us. "And he that sat on the throne said, 'Behold, I make all things new'"—not all new things. "He that overcometh shall inherit all things," i. e., when made new. Rev. xxi. 5. Here then is the blessed hope and mighty motive power of the gospel to begin the good fight of faith and to overcome in the warfare against the evil of the world, that we may inherit the "better country" that will be like heaven where God, our Savior, and the angels are. In that land there will be no more tears or death, neither any more crying or sorrow, neither shall there be any more pain. There will be the tree of life and those who eat shall live forever—there will be the kingdom of God with its bright capital city—there shall be no night there and they shall reign for ever and ever.

SELECTED MISCELLANY.

European statisticians are generally revising and reducing their estimates of the population of China. The great famine a few years ago swept away millions, and there is good reason for believing that the population is nearer 300,000,000 than 400,000,000. Behm and Wagner reduce their estimate for China and Corea from 434,500,000 to 379,500,000. Peterson reduces his estimate by 75,000,000, making the present total 350,000,000. Dr. Happer, missionary, believes this can safely be reduced another 50,000,000. Mr. Hippisley, Acting Commissioner of Customs, thinks 250,000,000 more nearly correct than 350,000,000. The losses by the Taeping and Mohammedan rebellions and by the famine and pestilence which swept the provinces of Chili, Shantung, Shansi, Shensi and Honan, are variously estimated at from 51,000,000 to 81,000,000.

Muley Hassan, Sultan of Morocco and "Absolute Ruler of True Believers," is probably one of the richest sovereigns in the world. Unlike other millionaires, however, he does not invest his wealth in profitable securities, but, like a monarch of the Thousand and One Nights, he hoards it in underground vaults, with which the greatest bank and trust vaults of civilized cities cannot be compared. The treasures of gold, silver, and gems, are buried a hundred feet deep, surrounded by fenfold walls of alternate stone and metal, fifty feet thick. They are reached only through a subterranean labyrinth of the most intricate description, and are guarded by a band of armed Africans who, having once entered this service, never again ascend to the light of day. They live and die in an Aladdin's garden.

DR. LUTHER'S BIBLE.

Martin Luther's hand Bible, preserved as a most precious relic in the Berlin Markish Museum, gains additional interest with the approach of the fiftieth anniversary of the great reformer. It came originally from Wittenberg, from the library of the Theologian Professor, Lommatzsch, who sold it in 1855 to Sanitary Councillor Lutze, of Koethen, for 9,000 marks and a life rent. Of the latter the Markish Provincial Museum acquired the Bible by purchase on January 27, 1877. The Bible is the large Basle Latin edition of 1509 cum pleno apparatu, and annotated throughout by Dr. Luther, who made use of it in his preparatory study for its translation. His characteristic coarse handwriting covers every page of the text, and the commentaries as well as the inside of the parchment covers. The title-page contains the Biblical quotation: "If thy word, oh Lord, do not comfort me, I should perish in misery. 1542 Mart. Luther D."

A VIRTUE TO KILL PROTESTANTS.

The Rev. Pastor Chiniquy said: "I count it a great privilege to stand amongst God's people who meet for prayer here at the noon-hour daily. I myself am the child of the prayers of the Canadian people. At one time I was the greatest enemy and persecutor of Protestants, and used to lecture against them. One day six ministers came to preach the Gospel near my place. I invited the people to beat those men, for, say what they will, Roman Catholics do not count it a sin to kill a Protestant. Their priests are instructed in the book which I hold in my hand, and which they are expected to learn by heart, that it is a virtue to kill Protestants. You may not believe it, but it is true. The people, excited by my words, fell upon and beat those men, tearing off their clothing, and wounding them till their blood reddened the snow. They escaped with their lives to a friend's house, and going on their knees, prayed for that Chiniquy who was hot with anger against them. They said, 'He is in earnest on the side of error; how much more earnest will he be on the side of truth?' Their prayers were heard, for the Lord opened my eyes, and I saw Christ as my only Savior, and am now trying from love to him to serve him."

HOW WE DIE.

The New York Herald gives a long list of fatal casualties in all parts of the world which occurred during the first six months of the present year; "dire happenings of every description" it entitles these fatalities. The disasters attended with the largest loss of life were the burning of a circus building at Berditschew, Russian Poland, in which 270 persons perished; the collision of the Cimbria and Sultan off Borkum Island, when 393 lives were lost; the tornadoes in Mississippi and other States in April, when at least 250 persons perished, and the Sunderland catastrophe of last month, when 197 children were victimized. In March 150 persons perished in snow avalanches in various localities at the foot of Mount Ararat, and 136 lives were lost through the destruction brought by March gales among the Hull and Yarmouth fishing fleet. The long list is a startling one and strikingly suggestive of the very many ways in which human life may be terminated. The record contains a list of 147 casualties, with a total of 2,895 lives lost.

THE BONES OF A MASTODON.

SYRACUSE, July 18. — Yesterday workmen who are digging gravel from a pit in the town of Manlius, eight miles east of this city, for the West Shore Railroad, came upon the remains of an extinct animal. Last evening a huge molar, weighing about twenty-five pounds, and a piece of a tusk nearly five feet long and eight inches in diameter in the thickest part were brought to this city. To-day other portions of the tusk and part of a shin bone were found. The remains lay about thirteen feet beneath the surface in a deposit of gravel. Search is being made for the remainder of the skeleton. Prof. Boynton, who exposed the Cardiff giant fraud, says that these are the relics of a mastodon which must have been fully fourteen feet high, and probably weighed a third more than Jumbo. The tusk, he says, must have been at least eleven feet long. The animal lived in the post pliocene period of the tertiary age. Prof. Boynton is of the opinion that the remains were washed into the gravel pit where they were found. Prof. Brown, instructor in natural history at Syracuse University, thinks the bones are those of a mammoth, rather than a mastodon. The tusk, he says, indicates one of the largest skeletons that has ever been exhumed. The tooth and the tusk are in a state of excellent preservation. The tip of the tusk shows the natural color of the ivory.

Consider the Lilies.

MARIANNE FARNINGHAM.

They have no care:
They bend their heads before the storm,
And rise to meet the sunshine warm,
And dance responsive to the breeze,
And nestle underneath the trees,
And take whatever life shall bring
As gayly as the birds that sing.

They do not toil:
Content with their allotted task
They do but grow, they do not ask
A richer lot, a higher sphere.
But in their loveliness appear
Just grow and smile, and do their best,
And unto God they leave the rest.

They have no sin:
Their pure sweet faces they upraise:
And shrink not from the sun's bright gaze,
Yet if the earth should call the rain
Comes down to make them clean again,
And, scented, beautiful and white,
They live their lives in God's dear sight.

They weep no tears:
No shadow dims their happiness,
They do but live the world to bless:
Enough for they of cloth of gold,
They lift the cups the dew to hold,
About them sue the light and song,
And they are glad the whole day long.

God cares for them:
His love is over everyone,
He wills their good, his will be done:
He does neglect no single flower,
He makes them rich with sun and shower.
Their song of trust is sweet and clear—
And he that hath an ear may hear.

Remember there are, thank God, myriads of saints whom the world has never heard of. Their names are in no calendars; their graves are never visited; no lamp is kindled at their shrines; yet in the midst of sin and sorrow God has seven thousand who have not bowed the knee to Baal, and whose mouth has not kissed him. Strive to be of these faithful ones, though they were not famous, and our lives, however insignificant, will not be in vain. Each grain of rock helps to build the mountain bastions; each coral insect has had his share in laying the bases of continents; each drop in the rain shower lends its minim to fertilize the soil; each grain of sand on the shore does its part as a barrier against the raging sea. If in life we can be neither saints nor heroes, we can delight in helping them to carry out God's work; we can at least be companions of them that fear him, of them that delight in his counsels. The work of the very humblest may be necessary to make it clearer to all that come after us that man was created for holiness, as the trees of the forest for light; that good and not evil is, and is to be, the law of our being; and that is the course of all mankind as it sweeps across the universe from the great deep of nothing to the great deep of death.—Farrar.

"By Their Fruits Ye Shall Know Them."

He tried it and found it wanting. Last Friday a train robber was in his cell in an Arkansas prison, waiting to take up the death march. The gibbet was ready, and the hangman was waiting. But a brief hour was all there was between the murderer, "Gov." Johnson, and eternity. A reporter of the Herald visited him, and then and there the dying man made this confession:—

"I have been a fast disciple of Bob Ingersoll. His doctrines have failed as a rule of life, and they will not at all serve as a basis of hope in death. Ingersoll's doctrines have brought me here."

There it is—you have the whole of that dying man's awful commentary on Ingersollism. He tried to believe there was no God, no future, no retribution; but when the test hour came it all failed him. "I have done wrong—young men, take warning," he said as he stood under the noose; and he added, "I have made my confession to God." And so there is a God who will render to every man according to his works,—there is a Judge of all the earth to whom confession must be made, and by many with the white lips bespeaking the terror which the tongue will refuse to utter.

"Ingersoll's doctrines have failed as a rule of life; give no hope at death; have brought me to the gallows"—this was the awful confession of that dying man. Did the doctrines of Jesus ever fail as a rule of life? Did a believer ever find hope denied him at death? Did Christ's teachings ever lead a man to say, "They made me a robber and a murderer"? And yet there are those—there was one on that star route jury—who "believe with Ingersoll." And though they be no murderers, yet sinners against God's law that they are, what will they do, when with imploring eyes, they will stand before the great Judge? What will Ingersoll do for them then? Let every one address that question to his own soul, and see what answer it brings him.—Christian at Work.

A Story for the Boys.

JERUSALEM, June 19, '83.

I went to tell my little friends about the camel. This most useful animal is a native of and common to the East, and from early times has been the great Oriental vehicle of commercial intercourse. From early times we see the camel mentioned as constituting part of the riches of the wealthy men of the day. Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Job and others were wealthy in camels. It is a large animal with a hump on its back, peculiarly adapted for the long journey of the desert, being capable of carrying more than any other animal and enduring thirst for a much longer period of time.

The foot of the camel is well adapted for traversing tracts of sand, it being flat and is divided into two toes, which are distinctly marked above but below they are confined with the elastic pad upon which the animal walks. By a peculiar and merciful providence the camel, unlike any other animal, is able to imbibe at once water enough to last him four or five days. His food consists of chaff of beans once every twenty-four hours; also he is fond of the cactus plant which grows to an immense height here and has long sharp thorns. I have watched him with much interest while feeding upon this tough, thorny plant; the sharp thorns seem not to trouble him in the least. The Arabs call him the "Ship of the Desert."

In loading or unloading, the camel is made to lie down, which it does on its knees. Their average rate of travel is about two and a half miles an hour, hardly ever going beyond that. Their pace does not slacken in the course of the day, as at the time of starting so it is at the time of stopping. This, to me most interesting animal, shows the wisdom and purpose of an Almighty God. In my next letter I will tell you something of the donkey of Palestine.

A. E. DAVIS.

My Dear Nephew:

I am glad indeed that you so freely admit feeling quite a new interest in matters of religion since our correspondence has taken the turn it has. And I must acknowledge a little surprise that you already see so plainly how absurd it would have been for the Creator to place the tree of life within man's reach whereby he might have obtained immortality had he already possessed such a nature, and how equally absurd it would have been to deprive him of access to that tree, after he had planned "least he eat and live forever," if he was then in possession of immortality. Yes, of course ask your minister to explain to you how it could be. I smile to think of the answer you will get. But to the subject I promised in my last.

Through a slight mistake of the printer in my last letter, I must repeat a portion of the closing paragraph, "The seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head." The giving of this promise placed man on another platform, opened to him another source of immortality, etc.....That the "seed of the woman" refers to our Lord Jesus Christ all Christendom acknowledges. So I will not stop to talk of the grave errors they have variously mixed up with this golden thread of divine truth. This language was addressed to Satan who had caused the woman to take of the forbidden fruit. I will give you the text entire, Gen. iii. 15, "And I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed, it shall bruise thy head and thou shalt bruise his heel.

The most prominent thought in this text is that the head of the serpent is bruised, which renders him powerless, while only the less important member of the seed of the woman is affected. The latter, though causing pain does not imply helplessness. The first direct prophecy of the birth of Christ you will find in Isa. vii. 14, "Behold a virgin shall conceive and bear a son and shall call his name Immanuel." This you will find again mentioned in Matt. i. 18–25, and again in Luke i. 30–34; in verses 32, 33 we first learn the definite position that Christ will occupy in the future. Here we are told that he shall be great and shall be called the son of the Highest and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David. And he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever and of his kingdom there shall be no end.

Before we turn back to see how he, Christ, was heir to David's throne, I beg to call your attention to one strange fact which is rather confusing to our Orthodox friends when you talk with them. They will readily admit that the first two clauses in this promise have had a literal fulfilment. Then ask if David's throne is set up over the "kingdom of Grace" which they say is "in the heart" and they will at once seek to change the conversation. Such at least has been my experience over and over again. The God whom we worship is the All Wise. Looking down the entire length of life's stream he saw the end from the beginning. From among all the nations of the earth he saw fit to choose one whom he designed to bless. He chose one portion of the earth to give as a special inheritance to that nation or people. In Gen. xii. 1, 2, we read that God said to Abram, "Get thee out of thy country and from thy kindred and from thy father's house unto a land that I will show thee. And I will make of thee a great nation..... 6th verse, last clause, "and into the land of Canaan they came....7th verse, "And the Lord appeared unto Abram and said, unto thy seed will I give this land....See also Gen. xiii. 15–18. "Arise, walk through the land in the length of it and in the breadth of it, for to thee will I give it.

These are the first promises we find in the Bible of an everlasting inheritance, or any place in which the sons of men may hope to dwell forever. In Matt. i–17 we read, "So all the generations from Abram to David are fourteen generations; and from David until the carrying away into Babylon are fourteen generations; and from the carrying away into Babylon unto Christ are fourteen generations." By this we see that Christ was of the seed of Abram. In Gal. iii. 8, 9, we read. "And the Scriptures foreseeing that God would justify the heathen through faith, preached before the gospel unto Abram, saying, In thee shall all nations be blessed." So then, they which be of faith are blessed with faithful Abraham.

Here my dear nephew you learn what the gospel was that was before preached unto Abraham, viz., "In thee shall all nations be blessed." Nothing said of a kingdom of either grace here or glory after death. "Beyond the bounds of time and space." Please note verse 16 of this chapter. Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not, and to seeds, as of many, but as of one, and to thy seed which is Christ.

From the above passages we see what the saints' inheritance is to be, and so perhaps are better prepared now to ascertain how that inheritance may be obtained. But my letter is already too long and so I cannot in this speak of the sacrifice of Christ as I had intended. The whole subject is so full of interest to me that I never weary of its contemplation.

In closing I will quote one text that you may have a definite subject on which to fix your thoughts till I write again which I hope to do soon. John iii. 16, "For God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish but have everlasting life."

Affectionately your

AUNT CARRIE.

THE CHOLERA.

LONDON, July 21.—The Cairo correspondent of the Central News Bureau says that the actual number of deaths during the last twenty-four hours was nearly 600, and that the official figures underestimate the number of fatalities.

The cordon around Alexandria has been moved nearer the city.

Cases of cholera are reported in places which had not hitherto been affected with the disease.

ALEXANDRIA, July 21.—Quarantine has been abolished throughout Egypt except at this city and the province of Fayoum, where it is maintained at the request of Sir Edward Malet, the British Consul General.

The revised list of deaths at Cairo yesterday gives the number at 242. Among the victims were four Europeans.

LONDON, July 23.—A serious outbreak of Cholera is reported at Bombay, as there were thirty-seven sporadic cases of the disease there during last week.

Six persons are known to have been killed and many injured by the cyclone which swept through portions of Minnesota on Saturday, and the loss of property is estimated at $500,000.

Storms in Dane and Iowa counties, Wisconsin, did great damage Saturday, and a portion of the city of Fon du Lac was submerged Saturday night by the giving way of dams in the creek, which was suddenly overflowed by a deluge of rain.

Obituary.

DIED—At Fruitport, Mich., June 7, 1883, Bro. Norman Thompson, aged 72 years and 2 days.

Brother Thompson was born at Ft. Ann, Washington Co., New York, June 5, 1811. He came west in 1836. Was married to Nancy S. Bullock, at Howard, Steuben Co., New York, in 1835. They settled at Dixon, Ill., where they received the true light of the gospel through the preaching of H. V. Reed. Subsequently removing to Chicago they were burned out in the great fire, and came to Fruitport where they have since resided. Brother Thompson was a kind husband, an industrious man, an excellent neighbor, and one of the patient watchers waiting for the coming of the Lord. As he passed quietly away into the last sleep he left true friends to comfort the aged widow who mourns the loss of her lifetime companion, with whom she walked the earthly journey and by whom she stood as the dark shadow fell. But by faith, through the present gloom she can see the true glory of the coming kingdom and the joy in the reunion of the faithful. Sister Thompson will make her home with her grand daughter at Ionia, Mich., where the body of her husband was taken for interment, and where she will find a pleasant home and receive the best of care the remainder of her life. May the prayers of the brothers and sisters be that the sustaining hand of God be over with her, lightening the remaining cares of life, and as she passes into the deep sleep, raise her up at the last day, to receive the crown for which she has been struggling and waiting so long.

Through the deep and clinging shadows,
Through the damp and unwelcoming grave,
There's a hand that ever shelters,
Clasping close—a hand to save.
Pointing to a greeting promise,
That when all life's work is done,
We shall rise to meet the glory,
Welcomed to his kingdom, home.

ARTHUR D. SKEELS.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

The Annual Assembly of the Church of God will, if the Lord will, convene at the House of the Brethren, in Winchester, Va., on Friday the 7th, before the second Sunday in September, and as it is to be a conference of committees, appointed by various churches in the East, in order to effect a more general union to work in the Lord's vineyard, all of the brethren in Christ, everywhere, who have not been conferred with, as well as all who have, are respectively invited, and all who cannot attend in person, are requested to represent themselves whether individually or collectively, by letter. H. V. Reed, J. W. Wilson, Samuel Wilson, and other able ministers of the Word, are expected to be in attendance. All coming by rail will be met at the Winchester depot, and conducted to the House of the Brethren, where they will be cared for as long as it may suit them to stay.

POSTPONEMENT.

The Arkansas State Christian Conference will hold its next annual session with the Palarm church, 6 miles east of Conway Station, on the Little Rock and Ft. Smith Railway, to convene on Thursday night before the third Sunday in September, instead of August, as formerly announced. By order of the Executive Board,

N. B. ETHERIDGE, Sec.

To the Friends of "The Restitution."

The cost of publishing THE RESTITUTION for the year just closed exceeded the receipts over $260. To repay this deficiency and secure means to publish the paper another year, we must raise, outside the regular subscription, at least $500. To secure that amount, the Board of Directors have requested me to appeal to each subscriber to contribute at least one dollar extra. This is not asked as a donation, but brethren are requested to send names of persons to whom they wish the paper sent, with their contributions and the paper will be sent to such persons in payment for the amounts sent by each.

There are a large number of brethren and sisters in different localities who are unable to pay for the paper, and who would be very glad of the privilege of reading it. These are known to Brother Chaplin, the Editor. I would suggest that brethren who have no one to whom they specially desire to send the paper, send their contributions to THE RESTITUTION office with a request that the paper be sent to some worthy Christian who will appreciate it, but who is unable to pay for it. In this way brethren will be able to gladden the hearts of many poor but honest good Christians, and at the same time help to furnish the means to keep the paper going.

The fund will be known as "Free Will Offerings." Let each reader of THE RESTITUTION make a small sacrifice, and contribute at least one dollar, always remembering that the many persons to whom the paper will be thus sent will thank and bless you, and your Heavenly Father will reward you.

H. V. REWOLDS, President.

THE DAY IS AT HAND.

Poor, fainting spirit, still hold on thy way—
The dawn is near!
Time, then art weary; but yon brighter ray
Becomes more clear.
Bear up a little longer; wait for rest:
Yield not to slumber, though with toil oppressed.

The night of life is resentful, but look on—
The dawn is near!
Soon will earth's shadowy scenes and forms be gone;
Yield not to fear!
The mountain's summit will, ere long, be gained,
And the bright world of joy and peace attained.

"Joyful through hope," thy motto still must be—
The dawn is near!
What sights will that dawn unfold to thee:
Be of good cheer!
Lift up thy head; bind sandals on thy feet:
The way is dark and long; the end is sweet.

NEAR THE ASH HEAP.

JERUSALEM, June 15, '83.

Today we celebrate the 55th birthday of our much esteemed friend Mrs. Davis, and the place we have selected for the day's recreation is beside an old ruin of some kind just at the foot as it were of a mountain of ashes; this accumulated during the days of sacrifices, and it is permeated all through with the bones of the animals that were offered. This is a sight truly wonderful, for it is all trodded over save where it is dug into and carried away by the ton and used for one of the ingredients of mortar in the building of the city now going up, call it the "New City" or what you like. In this we see an all wise God brings everything into account. Thousands of years this great ash heap was accumulating, and now since A. D. 70, the "taking away" etc., it has been laying here subject to the storms and atmospheric changes. I wonder was it all chance work that it was all throwed up here in one place? I think not, it shows to my mind the all-wise and all-controlling power of God, who knew from the beginning just what was necessary to further and carry out his pre-arranged plans.

Now let us reason on this a little; it was plain to him, who sees as God and not as man, that first the destruction of Jerusalem A. D. 70, and the scattering of Israel into all countries, until the fulness of the Gentiles, was absolutely necessary, or in other words that was a part of his plan from the beginning; then the requisite means must be used, and that constituted in part in using of pretty much all of the timber for a long distance off (see Josephus) around and about the city; so now while there are great quantities of limestone here, the fuel for burning it is scarce. But we will go back a little ways, say three or four thousand years, I don't know the exact beginning of the sacrifice; however, at the commencement the same all-wise God took this all in, and so ruled that these bones and ashes and what is more wonderful limestone was added to the heap, and now, as stated above, it is and has been since this "building up of the old waste places" commenced, used very extensively for mortar. This to some may appear of little importance, but to me it is the power of God, and his using this ash heap as a means, shows me of his wonderful power, ways and wisdom, as I have seldom seen them before.

But here I am talking away about this old ash heap and perhaps nobody else will see it as I do, and am forgetting our company, which consists of Mrs. Davis, Mrs. W., Horace and myself. Now we have had dinner, no matter what we had, it was good, plenty of it, and thankful hearts to receive the same, and again we have from the north a delightful sea breeze coming to us right over "Neby Samwil" bringing to each of us appetite enough for two. This "Neby Samwil" is an "exceedingly high mountain" away to the north perhaps 4 or 5 miles, where tradition says Samuel judged Israel about twenty years; don't look in your Bible for this name as it is purely Arabic. At this time there is a native village on the top of this mountain, for we read in Ezek. xxxvi. 2, how the enemy are tauntingly saying, "Aha, even the ancient places are ours in possession." This is literally true, they are all in their possession, and to spiritualize this Scripture, making it apply to something else, simply destroys the true meaning of this text and closes the eyes of one so doing to the grand truth found in the balance of the chapter, and the two following. The restitution of this land, containing these high places to the rightful owners.

Reader if you have been sceptical and unbelieving about this subject, just read these chapters as they are once, and forget for the time that man has said Israel means the church, remembering that these lines over the heading of each chapter are not inspired. Then turn to Luke xxi. 24; Rom. xi. 25-27, and see what Christ and Paul say referring to this same subject, you won't certainly claim that Paul was talking about the church, when he says, blindness in part is happened to Israel. I have yet to find a man of the different denominations, who will say their church is troubled with bad eyes. Then for the present I am not going to question but what you will admit that this refers to Paul's brethren—as he puts it—according to the flesh. Then if this is so let us see what we can get out of this in few words. First then, blindness in part is to happen to Israel, they are scattered into all nations, Jerusalem was to be trodden down, etc.; this, we read, all terminates at the fulness of the Gentiles. Then there is a set time, just as there was a set time for the flood, and for John the Baptist's message, and Christ's appearance to the world. So now with the fulness of this time there are great changes to take place, just as there was in the filling up of those times referred to. Our opinion is that those who do not get their eyes open to this truth very soon, will be found napping. Go to the pool, friend, it is a sure cure; to be sure it is quite a let down, but no more so than it was with the blind man. Three or four hundred feet perhaps from where the Master told him what to do, and that, too, over a rough road; but he made the descent and came seeing. Will you come in like manner?

June 17. Well we had a very pleasant day under the olive and fig trees; returned to our homes feeling that we had all been benefitted in many ways. The Lord uses what may seem to us as very trivial means for showing us great light. So now, returning to our picnic and the object of it once more. May we not hope, dear reader, that before very many returns of the day, that the Lord will bring to her and all Israel deliverance.

THE RESTITUTION of May 16 was received yesterday and the article clipped from the Manchester Courier, Feb. 15, with your correspondent's remarks was to us truly interesting. We see so little from the outside world touching on these things that anything of this kind is eagerly sought for; bear this in mind Brother C. and when you see anything good in the dailies on the Eastern Question and kindred subjects let us have it. We are shut out from the balance of the world and all we know of those things is what we get from papers that come to us from three to five weeks old, and what is transpiring here in Jerusalem, and there is not much going on here, save a little talk among the Jews and natives concerning our "American friends" (?) who are now looked upon as transformed into angels of light, 2 Cor. xi. 13, 14, by those whom it is not possible for them to deceive. See Matt. xxiv. 24. Yes, by all who believe that we are nearing the end of this dark age, see in this people, whom we pity with our whole heart, one of the most important signs of the times. I assure you the truth as it shall go forth from this place to God's people. Israel will have a formidable counterfeit to contend with, but then in the closing up of this world's affairs do we look for anything but a mighty struggle between truth and error, the powers of heaven and of earth? the nations of this world fighting against the decrees of the living God, and the devil, who knows his time is short, through human agents whom he has taught to believe are gods, i. e., the body of Christ, will through these present to the world one of the worst and most deceptive phases of spiritualism the world has seen, and the world is ripe to receive it, in preference to truth; and this is the culmination of that God-decying, soul-destroying falsey whose startling-place was Rochester, N. Y. But we have the assurance that the contest will be out short, yes, how glorious the thought in righteousness. May it come quickly for we understand it is the answering of our prayers, "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done, etc." We feel to thank him this morning, that we can see this prayer has not gone up from so many hearts in the past in vain, but that he will speedily answer with a mighty hand, and outstretched arm, with destruction to the tares and deliverance to his people we do believe.

This morning early, as my custom is, I took a walk down among the rocks in what we will term the head of the valley of Hinnom. Just below me all the soldiers from the city were out drilling, and I will add for the past three or four weeks their diligence in this respect has been so unusual as to cause remarks, especially in this hot weather. I am satisfied the head officers know they have got a big job on hands in the near future. However in my meditations upon the coming trouble and God's kingdom of peace that follows, perhaps I was feeling a little impatient, allowing thoughts of delay, etc., to enter my mind; but my eyes were turned to this soldiery all busily engaged in their skirmish drill, and the still small voice said to me, see you not this preparation? open your blind eyes, look about you and at the nations how they are preparing, building forts, arming fleets, and mustering the armies for battle. Says this gentle reprover, keep these things in mind, the nations are getting angry. So peace be still; the Lord can not delay, but will do all his good pleasure in his own time.

Then I returned home, looked over the article referred to again, and my mind looks away beyond the city, and settles down on the Dead Sea, this side of Moab in plain view from my window. The question that arises is: what is it there for? can some one tell me of what earthly use it has been in the past? the water cannot be used for anything, neither fish nor any living thing can dwell therein. Has God made this in vain? We think not, and believe its use is yet future. We find by inquiry that it is about seven hundred feet below the Mediterranean sea. [Lieut. Lynch gives 1316.7 ft.—ED.] where the water to fill the valley of the Jordan is to come from. We find the Dead Sea large enough for a harbor for the capital of the world, and it will undoubtedly be the finest one in the world. And these waters will be crowded out by the enormous volume coming from the Great Sea, rushing through and filling the valley of the Jordan through the deep canal and on to the Red Sea, and what is done? Just what we are told B. C. 574 should come to pass, "these waters shall be healed." Ezek. xlvii. 8. And the fish in it are to be according to the kinds found in the Great Sea, showing beyond doubt that when this work is done it is the fulfilment of God's word, and should make skeptics feel very small indeed.

June 18. Since writing the above, have had a little conversation with one of our native merchants, who speaks very good English and is agent for the Arabic paper, published, I think, at Beyrout. He says there is something unusual going on among the army dignitaries. The Pasha received a telegram from the Sultan at Constantinople to call out 5000 soldiers of those who have served their five years. This is looked upon as something new, as five years' service is supposed to exempt a man from any further service; and the orders are to have all troops kept drilling. I noticed many very young men, mere boys from 16 to 20, drilling on the morning referred to; I think likely they are just starting on their five years (without pay) for one of the most contemptible governments on earth. However this call of the Sultan is set aside, or delayed till the "Ramadan fast" is over; this lasts a month, fast during the day and feast at night.

It just occurs to me that these people expect to be wound up this year, if no prophet comes, the Jews are expecting something, they hardly know what, but they are living in the 5543d year of according to their reckoning, and they look upon the time since the 6000th year as "tarrying time." How strange this appears to me. Again how many of the Christian world are looking for something, and they, too, hardly know what to look for first; but these are facts and well may we cast aside this present world, its cares, desires for the things of this life, etc., and with strong crying to the God of Israel, plead for deliverance from this spiritual darkness that all honest hearts must admit we are wrapped up in. I see the world full of idols, and idol worshipers, and I am going to be bold enough to assert that the ages down to the present time have seen nothing like it. And yet it is called the Christian age or dispensation; if so what a failure was the life, death, and resurrection of our Redeemer. And over the place where it is said he was crucified (which is false) is erected what is called a sepulchre; it is an immense building, decorated and arrayed something like our theatres; this place is completely filled with idols, and here poor deluded souls some hundreds of miles to worship before them. Women from Russia by the hundred come and some stay a year or two at a time, and as 'tis said, and I believe truthfully so, to become the common property of these 500 nasty priests.

P. S.—A Russian Jew has been in for a moment, and in broken English tells me 15,000 Jews are on their way from that country, which the Lord will utterly destroy (as a nation) before very long, we believe.

A Preface By M. l'Abbe Moigno to a Work entitled "La Campagne de Moise," By M. Lecointre.

It is a wonderful and interesting fact that the attention of the scientific men of all nations is being drawn towards the land of Egypt and the Great Pyramid of Joseph. In addition to the works of the great men with which we are familiar, there have come to us within the past few weeks — in fact since our last meeting—a new book on the pyramids by Mr. Ballard, an English engineer, residing in Australia, and another upon the Campaign of Moses in the Exodus from Egypt, by Monsieur Lecointre, a French engineer, with a preface by the celebrated Abbe Moigno. This preface is so interesting that I cannot refrain from giving you a translation of a portion of it.

After giving the Biblical account of the departure of the Israelites from Egypt under the generalship of Moses, of their safe passage through the Red Sea, and the entire destruction of Pharaoh and his army, and the sublime canticle sung by Moses and the children of Israel when, by the glorious manifestation of God's power, they found themselves safe from their enemies he says:

"Thus glorified by Moses, the grand fact of the passage of the Red sea has been told again from time to time by all of the sacred writers — Joshua, Esdras, Judith, Job, David, Solomon, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Habakkuk, the author of the book of Maccabees, St. Luke and St. Paul. Never has there been seen a grander and more living tradition than this, in the hearts of a great people, who still exist, dispersed, but visible among all the nations of the world.

"And yet they have endeavored to reduce to common proportions this grand fact, of which the illustrious traveler, Bruce, has said: 'The passage of the Red Sea is told us in the Holy Scriptures as a miraculous fact, and there is no reason why we should seek natural causes.'

"Spinoza says, 'That the passage of the Red Sea was the effect of a violent wind which blew all night.' This is a purely gratuitous assertion. Moses caused the wind to blow but it was only to dry up the slimy bottom of the sea. Moreover, the wind, so propitious, to the children of Israel, so fatal to the Egyptians, could have easily been employed as the instrument of the miracle.

"Many ancient authors have pretended that the Hebrews did not really cross the Red Sea, and the proof which they pretend to give is that the sacred text speaks of Etham before and after their entrance into the Red Sea. But they forget that the word Etham is a generic word, meaning a dry and sandy desert, and that all the vast solitude extending from the east and west of the Arabic gulf to the Read Sea was called Etham.

"To the eyes of Monsieur Salvador the passage of the Red Sea was a very prosaic event. A low tide permitted the crossing of the Hebrews, the reflux tide swallowed up the Egyptians. It is thus reduced to the experience of a camel driver and to the stupidity of a general who led his men through at the reflux of the tide. This, too, is a gratuitous supposition, incompatible with the distinct and precise language of the Bible. The ebb and flow of the tide could never have made two walls of heaped up waters—a sea divided in two, between which they entered and from which they went out.

"Other critics say that Moses, who had lived many years in the land of Midian, and was familiar with the banks of the Red Sea, led the entire multitude of the Hebrews to a ford which he knew from experience. This account is not less incompatible with the recital of Moses. To go through a ford is not to march on foot between two walls of water.

"Professor Richard Owen has said that the isthmus of Suez, which unites the Red Sea to the Mediterranean has come up or been formed since those times, and that in historic days the two seas have never been in communication. He gives for proof an assertion of his own, that there exists no species of marine animals common to the two seas, thus ignoring the fact that one of his most learned compatriots, Mr. Woodward, has enumerated more than fifty species of fish and mollusks common to the Mediterranean and the Red sea, but here is the declaration which Monsieur De Lesseps, the faithful and learned reporter of all of the engineers of the Suez canal, has solemnly made in the meeting of the Academy of Sciences on the 22d of June, 1874:

"'At the time of the departure of the Israelites from the land of Egypt under the guidance of Moses, the tide of the Red Sea reached at least to the foot of Serapeum near the lake Timsah. It is not more than eleven hundred years since these bitter lakes were filled with brackish water, and they have continued at intervals of time to receive the waters of the Red Sea. When they have no longer been overrun by the equinoctial tides, or even exceptional tides, banks of salt have commenced to form. To-day the whole of these banks constitute an enormous mass of 980,000 millions of kilogrammes—the result of the evaporation of 24,000 millions of metric cubes of water of the Red Sea. It is then false—absolutely false, that the isthmus of Suez was entirely consolidated; moreover the passage of the Red Sea at the time of Moses could have been made at the north of Suez, and not necessarily to the south of the actual point of the Red Sea.'

"When then was this passage really made? As we shall see presently, this question is of immense interest. Now we cannot doubt that the passage was made at a place called in the Holy Scriptures Pihahiroth—opposite Baalzephon—and the question is to know the exact position of Pihahiroth.

"R. P. F[illegible] a Jesuit missionary, studied the [illegible] very carefully upon the spot—from Rameses to Ethaim and Pihahiroth, places in the plains of Sede, six leagues from the sea. The Hebrews would have encamped at the extreme end of this plain—near the sources of Thounireg; but the plains of Sede are now a desert, and the Hebrews could have entered into the desert only in coming out from the sea. Moreover, the width of the Red Sea at this point is six or seven leagues, a distance which it would have been impossible to cross in seven or eight hours. In fact, according to the local geography, this theory of Monsieur Seoard is much less in accord with the text of the Holy Scriptures.

"But we agree fully with the solution of this very difficult problem given by Monsieur Lecointre, a distinguished engineer of naval constructions, who has participated in the labors of the opening of the Suez canal. A very careful and minute explanation of these countries where he has sojourned in the progress of his work has led him to locate the passage of the Red Sea at that point of the sea which for some time formed the bitter lakes, and to identify Pihahiroth with Chebrewet. But how could the region of the bitter lakes have been separated from the Red sea, and at what epoch?

"'I have been the first to discover the full and complete solution of the second problem in the psalm concerning the exodus of Israel from Egypt, which we all have sung and recited a thousand times without comprehending the import or even the sense of it. This separation was the result of the earthquake of Sinai which occurred fifty days after the passage of the Red Sea.

When Israel came out of Egypt and the house of Jacob from among the strange people, Judah was his sanctuary and Israel his dominion.

The sea saw it and fled. Jordan was driven back.

The mountains skipped like rams and the little hills like young sheep. What ailed thee, O thou sea, that thou fleddest? and thou Jordan that thou wast driven back?

"This signifies in a figurative language that a thrusting up of the ground took place; on one side the entrances of Chalous and of Serapeum in making the Red Sea to flow back, separating it from the bitter lakes, on the other side the lines of the highest point of the double valley of Akabah and of Arabah, barring the passage to the River Jordan, shutting up the opening of the sea of Elam and, forcing it to return to the Dead Sea.

"This happy explanation is the natural complement and definite proof of the beautiful discovery of Monsieur De Lecointre.

"This skillful engineer gave for the first time his views on this Campaign of Moses in a little pamphlet, which I analyzed at length, including it in the third volume of my 'Splendors of the Faith.' This theory of Monsieur Lecointre was then very little discussed, but since that time many Christian Apologists—R. P. Pafol, of the Society of Jesus, Monsieur l'Abbe Vigouroux, director at St. Sulpice, and others,—opposed this happy solution of the grand problem given by my friend, by presenting other theories, other views. M. Lecointre was thus brought to retouch his work, to present it under a new and much more complete form, and even to discuss with their authors, particularly with the Abbe Vigouroux, the objections which they offered to this theory. From these new studies, these serious discussions, is born the little volume of The Campaign of Moses in the Exodus from Egypt, which I am happy to publish, with a grand scheme which it remains for me to explain.

"Since, thanks to the researches of modern science, and to the gigantic labors of the opening of the Suez canal, the place of the passage of the Red Sea is indicated in a certain manner, has not the moment come to invite the entire Christian world to a noble and holy enterprise? to provide the necessary funds for making researches, which have for their aim to bring forth the solemn remains of the Egyptian army swallowed up in the Red Sea, with its chariots, its horses, its arms, its treasures, its archives, and perhaps its king, the Pharaoh vanquished by Moses?

"This discovery would evidently be a magnificent splendor of the faith which Christians would be happy to achieve at the price of even great sacrifices.

"Shut up in the salt heaps of the bitter lakes, sheltered at least at many points by the salt beds of sufficient thickness, these historical remains are perhaps in a state of unexpected preservation.

"I estimate that the expenses of these researches would be three hundred thousand francs, or $60,000. It is for this sum that it is necessary to open up a subscription—but the amount subscribed would be paid only in fourths. These funds would carry no interest, but the sale of the results of these researches would bring profit enough to cover largely the capital subscribed and to give even a handsome bonus to the subscribers. The explorations of Troy and Olympus have made the fortune and the glory of him who has undertaken them. They have put him in possession of treasures, even materials of very great value. Why would it not be the same, and in a far greater proportion, from the excavations of the ancient bed of the Red sea? This concerns an entire army. If the utensils which shall be found there are not of precious metal, the archæological documents accompanying them will have perhaps a very great value.

"If the proper time had arrived—If the revolution were not too triumphant, I would open to-day in the bureau of Cosmos-les-mondes the subscription for the exploration of the bitter lakes opposite Chebrewet. I would place it under the administrative patronage of a commission, to which I hope would condescend to join themselves M. De Lesseps, De Rouge, Le Normand, Robiou, Maspero, and others. It would be for this commission to choose a director of this undertaking. I would like to propose to-day Monsieur Victor Guerin, the glorious historian of the Holy Land, who has done more by himself than all the English jointly for the exploration of Palestine.

"The army of Pharaoh brought to light and proclaiming by its presence the power of Moses, the absolute truth of the Holy Bible—what hosannas! How blessed will be the day when success shall have crowned my novel suggestion.

"This will not be my first triumph. I at one time suggested to the Abbe Richard, the celebrated geologist, who alas, has just died, that he should go to Oligel upon the borders of Jordan and search in the tomb of Joseph for the stone knives of the circumcision. He went there—he found the knives by thousands, and returned rich with an incomparable collection of silex cuttings—older, I have proved beyond a doubt, than the silex cuttings of Saint Acheul of the Eyzies—of Montiers, of Solutre, and which settles, in an unexpected manner, the great question of the neo-antiquity of man.

"Dare I to say that I aspire to a third triumph? I would have them connect with the excavations of the ancient bed of the Red Sea, and that it should be comprised in the same subscription, the search for the aerolites fallen from heaven, the crossing of the famous battle gained by Joshua, meteors which covered the earth from Bethoron to Azeca and which crushed more Philistines than had been killed by the sword, embedded, without doubt, at a depth of some metres; they could be found without trouble, and they in their turn would be sure of the splendors of the faith, and at the same time their purchase by museums and amateurs would cover largely the expenses of the excavations.

"I finish with a last wish—the Great Pyramid of Joseph, as everyone knows, is the object of my most profound admiration, I would say almost of my pious veneration, because of the treasures of ancient and modern science which it has already revealed to the astonished world,

"I desire that it should become an international monument; placed under the protection of all Christian nations, who shall restore it, who shall again give it its original covering of polished limestone, who shall defend it from further devastation; and for this purpose I desire that all the riches of the army of Pharaoh, which may be found, shall be gathered into a vast museum, built near the Great Pyramid, so that this museum, visited by pilgrims from all the countries of the world, should furnish in abundance the necessary resources for the investigation of this incomparable monument, which hides within its prophetic sides even the mysterious date of the last judgment and of the end of the world.

"Allow me to say in closing that however venturesome my project may appear at the first glance, it has already excited lively sympathy in Germany, in England and America. A most esteemed German newspaper, the Oditchen Blatt, has at once referred to it in these words:

"'The very celebrated Abbe Moigno has conceived a wonderful thought: It is to make researches at the bottom of the Red Sea, to discover the proofs of the event recounted by Moses,' and which took place more than three thousand years ago. If this enterprise succeeds, its success will be one of the most incontrovertible proofs of the authenticity and veracity of the account of Moses, at the same time it would be a splendid refutation of the objections by which modern science has endeavored to show the Bible in flagrant contradiction with their new discoveries.'

"P. S.—Since I have written the above I am confirmed in the opinion that the Great Pyramid of Gizeh, constructed under the direction of Melchisedec, the great priest of God, the great astronomer, the great architect, the great mathematician, is almost certainly the monument to which Isaiah alludes in these mysterious terms, chap. xix. 6-19: 'In that day shall there be an altar to the Lord in the midst of the land of Egypt, and a pillar at the border thereof.' In truth, the most experienced eye can discover nothing either pagan or idolatrous in the Great Pyramid of Gizeh.

"I would add that after having translated the grand book of Piazzi Smith, royal astronomer of Scotland, Our Inheritance in the Great Pyramid of Gizeh, I have requested that it should be examined in Rome, and the examiner, R. P. Torquato Armellini, has answered by a nihil obstat, which has delighted me inexpressibly.

"The issuing of this volume, which I shall entitle the Splendor of Splendors, and which will be as a glorious crown of my Splendors of the Faith, will cost 7,000 francs. However adventurous I may have been thus far, I should believe to tempt the good God if I should myself make the expenses of this issue. But I have counted upon a great and generous soul who should make this advance of funds, and should this soul not appear, I shall resign myself to the opening of a subscription list with a profound hope that it will soon be complete. This will be the prelude of the subscription for the search of the army of Pharaoh.—Abbe Moigno, in The International Standard.

Perfume of Paradise.

"All thy garments smell of myrrh, and aloes, and cassia, out of the ivory palaces."—Psalm xlv. 8.

The staff of a printing office were once surprised and delighted by a delicious perfume which suddenly filled every part of the room. Upon inquiry as to its source, it was found that one had passed through the office, who, being constantly occupied in a store-room filled with sweet spices and odorous drugs, became literally saturated with fragrance. The consequence was that wherever he went he diffused a delicious sweetness, evoking such inquiries as—"Where has the man come from?" "What is the secret of this sweetness?"

How blessed would it be if every Christian were so to abide in Christ as to become saturated with his gentle, loving, holy, unselfish spirit! Surely, if such were the case, our fellows would more often be compelled to make such inquiries as these: "What is the secret of this sweetness of temper, this forgiving, charitable spirit; this even flow of peace—this remarkable unselfishness? Surely, this is not human nature, it must be divine life."

Alas! That it should ever be that a child of God should live on from year to year and those around him in his daily occupation never suspect him to be a Christian! Yet there are even such. One known to the writer has been engaged in the same establishment as another Christian for eight years, the latter opened his eyes in surprise when informed that the former was a believer.

The Savior is to see of the travail of his soul, and be satisfied. Surely, O Christ, thou canst not be satisfied with this state of things! Lead thy people, therefore, to shake themselves from the dust, and put on their beautiful garments.—Divine Life.

CROSS-WEARING.

I am crucified with Christ.
With him nailed upon a tree,
Yet the cross, then, do I bear
But the cross it beareth me.
Solemn cross on which I died—
One with him, the Crucified.

Shall I take that blood-stained cross—
Cross of agony and shame?
Cross of him who fought my fight?
Cross of him who overcame?
Shall I deck myself with thee—
Awful cross of Calvary?

Shall I drag thee through the crowd
'Mid the laughter that is there?
Wear thee through the giddy waltz,
Braid upon my neck or hair?
Awful cross of Calvary—
Shall I deck myself with thee?

Shall I make that lucky cross a
Minister of woman's pride?
Bearing eyes to me that should
Fix up on the Crucified?
Awful cross of Calvary—
Shall I deck myself with thee?

Shall I call this glittering gem
Made for show and vanity—
Shall I call this gaud a cross—
Cross of him who died for me?
Shall I deck myself with thee,
Awful cross of Calvary?

GENESIS THE THIRD: HISTORY NOT FABLE.—Lecture IV.—Part I.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF THE HEBREWS ON GOOD AND EVIL, COMPARED WITH ASIATIC DUALISM.

In the first lecture of this series, I drew attention to the place which the narrative of Adam in Paradise occupies in the Bible—at the beginning, in the middle, and at the end. The Christianity of Christ and his apostles is built upon it. In the second lecture, we considered the general objections made to the historical reality of this narrative; and, in the third lecture, the alleged results of the transgression, and the sentences passed on the man, the woman, and the serpent-tempter.

We are now to consider "the hidden wisdom" or philosophy of the history, the import of the promise that "the seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head"—words whose meaning cannot fully appear until we have made apparent the place which the doctrine of good and evil, developed in the Hebrew Scriptures, occupied amidst the dualistic religions and philosophies of the ancient world; a brief review, which will, perhaps, result in confirming men's faith in the general reality of this narrative.

As far back as written or pictorial history carries us in Egypt, in Persia, in India, and in China, the evil power has been represented as a personal being in the form of a serpent or dragon, with flashing eyes, and often with flaming breath. In a paper read by the late Mr. W. R. Cooper, secretary of the Society of Biblical Archæology, the whole lore of Asia and Egypt on serpent-worship was condensed into one wonderful monograph by that lamented scholar.

It thence appears clearly that in ages preceding the times of Moses by at least a thousand years the evil power which has ruined the work of the supreme goodness was represented all over the world by the name of the serpent.

In the very earliest epoch of the Egyptian monarchy, there is evidence that the legend of Osiris was firmly established, of which the essence was that this son of the supreme god was put to death by the poisonous serpent, from the effects of whose murderous attack he is delivered by resurrection, and final enthronement in the celestial realms. The same idea is found in ancient India, in the redemptive story of Krishna, who is depicted as setting his foot on the serpent's head. Moses, therefore, the recorder, in the narrative of the fall of man, a history which had much earlier diffused itself over the post-diluvian world, in more or less corrupted traditions. In a word, the universal traditions of mankind confirm, even amidst their fanciful variations, the record which stands at the beginning of Genesis, as all subsequent revelation confirms the original reality whence those traditions sprang.

But there is this difference between the legends of the whole civilized world in ancient times and the doctrine of the Hebrew religion, that, without exception, the heathen worshippers deified evil as well as good, and regarded it as engaged in an eternal and often successful conflict with a God of goodness; while, from one end to the other of the Mosaic and Christian revelations, evil is represented as an incident, vanishing and temporary, in the everlasting dominion of supreme righteousness and love, a conviction which imparted a wholly new aspect both to religious worship and to religious character.

This difference has received too little attention from the superficial critics of the Mosaic writings.

Now this faith of Israel, which made head through so many days against all the intelligence of Egypt and Persia, India and Babylon, that is, against the thinking of the whole civilized world of antiquity, this faith so distinct, so potent, so sublimely triumphant and persistent in the seers and prophets of Judaism, can surely never have been founded on a mere philosophical myth a symbolic fable, a hieroglyphic, an antediluvian fancy. It bears all the marks of being founded on fact, on real history, a history so real and true from the beginning, that it shattered at a blow the might of dualism, or the worship of two principles, among the Hebrews, and enabled the adorers of Jehovah to maintain, with confident voice against the whole pagan world, that evil was recent, personal in its origin, limited in its power, and destined to be trodden under foot shortly by the "Seed of the Woman" who should bruise the serpent's head.

The place and value of the Hebrew revelation in the systems of Asiatic thought will appear the more clearly if we picture to ourselves the earlier movements of the human mind in contemplating the mystery of life, where natural speculation was unaided by light from heaven. Let us endeavor to throw ourselves backward in fancy to that early time when the knowledge of the true God had been lost amidst growing heathenism. How would thoughtful men attempt under such conditions to solve the problem of the world? Clearly there would emerge in succession two leading explanations of this scene of mingled good and evil, moral and physical, in which chaotic darkness seems struggling with the light and order which could create a kosmos. Of these, the first and the more ancient was the dualistic, based on faith in spiritual powers; the second and more recent was the sceptical, or Buddhistic, based on scientific observation of things visible, and the positive rejection of divine causes in accounting for the state of the world.

The earliest step downwards from the patriarchal religion (which acknowledged one God, and traced up the origin of evil to the rebellion of created free agency) was into dualism, or the exaltation of evil to the rank of a divine power coeval with the good. To us, long accustomed to the spectacle of partially-conquered evil, and the faith of its speedy and complete overthrow, it is difficult to imagine the state of thought which found a solution of the great problem in the faith of a bad divinity dividing with a good one the lordship of the universe. Yet there was much to excuse and account for such a theory. Evil had, indeed, a mighty dominion in the early world. A vast expanse of countries torn and flooded by ungovernable rivers, an earth often afflicted with famines, pestilences walking in darkness, earthquakes suddenly overturning the central seats of order and government, a sun too hot, a sky too turbulent and humid, diseases of direful aspect and endless variety, an animal world partly wild and partly venomous, a human population with passions which, in spite of the inward light of reason, kept the nations in perpetual war and perpetual woe, government which through its oppressions seemed only just preferable to the sanguinary anarchy which it controlled—all these phenomena looked to the early men like the work of an evil power never strong enough to defy and defeat the designs of the beneficent deity which nature also proclaimed. If in our time a mind so great as Mr. John Stuart Mill could, in his latest works, indicate some tendency to this solution of the mystery, is it to be wondered at if men, whose philosophy was primitive and tentative, found an easy if terrible resource in such a doctrine? If, further, they started from a primitive tradition of personal evil agency in the supernatural sphere, it was inevitable that the idea of an evil demon should be aggrandized into the idea of an evil deity. Of this early dualism several things must be noted.

Its essential identity of principle must not be lost sight of under varying forms of expression. Its reign extended over all Central Asia and India and China in the ages preceding the Buddhistic "reform." The idea which underlies the dogma of the Hindoo triad is essentially dualistic. There is Brahma, the good being; and there is Siva, the destroyer. Vishnoo is the good power acting redemptively by incarnation to deliver the earth from evil. This faith is radically the same with the Zoroastrian theology of early Persia and mid-Asia, which taught that Ormuzd and Ahriman, light and darkness, divided nature between them.

The relative prominence given in different ages and countries respectively to the good or the evil powers was determined by the physical, intellectual, and moral conditions of the nations who embraced the general doctrine. The inevitable tendency of dualism among ignorant nations in a state of suffering is towards religious pessimism—the special service of the malignant deity, in order to propitiate him by atrocious rites, or to ward off his injuries. The beneficent power will no doubt endure neglect, but hatred is inexorable. Hence the Moloch worship of Syria, the devil-worship of Asia, of which some awful relics survive even to this day among the far descended aboriginies of Ceylon. Hence, too, the remarkable fact that although the Medo-Persian dualism, as organized by Zerdusecht in a remote antiquity, gave the supremacy to Ormuzd, the Eternal Light, in the course of ages of conflict the popular mind, acted upon by terror and misery, by superstition and magian priestcraft, had by the time of Cyrus arrived at so complete a prostration under the shadow of the power of darkness, whose secrets the magians professed to know, that much of the old story had been abandoned to sterility from a conviction that it was useless to fight with destiny, an enemy who was omnipotent and eternal. With the reviving fortunes of the people under the bright and energetic rule of the Medo-Persian kings, and very probably through the diffusion of Hebrew ideas in the East, a more luminous faith returned to the nation. A profound theological revolution signalized the reign of Darius Hystaspes, the final result of the happy victories of Cyrus. Darius records it in the famous triumphal inscription on the rocks of Behistun. He asserts that he has overthrown the Magians, for ages leagued with Ahriman, and declares that Ahuramazda or Ormuzd is king. It was as great a revolution as if Satan had been worshipped in terror for ages in England, and then suddenly a political revolution had revived the worship of God. In the more ancient sculptures of Nineveh and Persepolis abundant memorials occur of the varying types of dualism. In every better period of these monarchies the king is represented as under the protection of the beneficent deity, depicted as a winged human form surrounded by the wheel of nature, while the evil power symbolized by a dragon is portrayed only in a form of subjection or comparative defeat.*

With these brief historical indications in view, it is easier to estimate aright the value of the original Hebrew monotheism and of its successive dispersions, as factors in ancient Asiatic thought. At a time when India was dimly striving to uphold faith in a beneficent deity against a malignant energy which was itself divine; at a time when Zerdusecht, in central Asia, was more vigorously maintaining the same faith against a popular superstition which was ever darkening into the direful worship of Ahriman, Moses and the sons of Israel were maintaining at once against Egyptian polytheism and against all the might of Eastern dualism, the existence and supreme sovereignty of one living and true God, the Almighty, the just, the merciful; in whose government evil was a possible, perhaps, inevitable, incident, arising from the defect of the creature's free-will, or the slothfulness of the creatures intelligence, but which had no root in the nature of things. During all these ages Israel was proclaiming the final and speedy victory of Eternal Light through its redeeming righteousness and love. We shall never read the Hebrew Revelation rightly until we remember this "thick darkness" in which its glorious beams shone. From first to last, through 1,500 years it speaks with undaunted voice of the one God, of the reptile inferiority of the evil power; of the certainty of its final subjection under the heel of the great King whom Omnipotence would send for its suppression in the latter days. This is the burden at once of the book of Genesis and of the Psalms of David. This is the key-note of prophecy. This is the force of Isaiah's declaration to Cyrus, the yet unborn conqueror of Babylon; that evil as a power is not divine, is not eternal, and existing only as permitted for higher ends of good in the sovereignty of one, who, "seeing under the whole heaven," and pervading all space by his omniscience, affirms that he "knows not any God beside himself" throughout the infinite realms.—Edward White.

ORIENTAL SKETCHES.—Second Series. Number VI.

THE LAND OF THE PHILISTINES.

"In many a heap the ground
Heaves, as if Nile in a frantic mood
Had come his utmost. Here and there appears,
As left to show his handy work not ours,
An idle column, a half-buried arch.
A wall of some great temple."

The road from Gaza to Jerusalem "is desert," as we learn from the incidental remark of Luke (Acts viii. 26), and as I can testify from personal observation. It runs across a dreary, parched plain, which, on the right and left, extends to the horizon, and in front is shut in by the blue mountains of Judah. On emerging from the olive groves of Gaza, the desert was before us—bare, white, and monotonous, without a solitary tree, or the "shadow of a great rock," or a single patch of verdure. As we rode on we had overhead the bright sky and blazing sun; and beneath, the flinty soil, reflecting burning rays that scorched the weeds and stunted camel-thorn, and made them crackle like charred sticks under our horses' feet. As the day advanced, the sirocco came upon us, blowing across the great "Wilderness of Wandering." At first it was but a faint breath, hot and parching, as if coming from a furnace. It increased slowly and steadily. Then a thick haze, of a dull yellow or brass color, spread along the southern horizon, and advanced, rising and expanding, until it covered the whole face of the sky, leaving the sun, a red globe of fire, in the midst. We now knew and felt that it was the fierce simoom. In a few moments fine impalpable sand began to drift in our faces, entering every pore. Nothing could exclude it. It blew into our eyes, mouths, and nostrils, and penetrated our very clothes, causing the skin to contract, the lips to crack, and the eyes to burn. Respiration became difficult. We sometimes gasped for breath; and then the hot wind and hotter sand rushed into our mouths like a stream of liquid fire. We tried to urge on our horses; but though chafing against curb and rein only an hour before, they were now almost insensible to whip and spur. We looked and longed for shelter from that pitiless storm, and for water to slake our burning thirst; but there was none. The plain extended on every side, smooth as a lake, to the circle of yellow haze that bounded it. No friendly house was there; no rock or bank; no murmuring stream nor solitary well. It seemed to us as if the prophetic curse pronounced by the Almighty on a sinful and apostate nation was now being fulfilled. We could see, at least, in the whole face of nature, in earth and sky and storm, how terrible and how graphic that curse was:—"Thy heaven that is over thy head shall be brass, and the earth that is under thee shall be iron. The Lord shall make the rain of thy land powder and dust: from heaven shall it come down upon thee." Deut. xxviii. 23, 24.

LACHISH AND EGLON.

The storm was at its height when we saw, rising up before us, a low white mound. As we approached we could distinguish heaps of ruins and rubbish; and on reaching it, and pressing our panting steeds up its shelving sides in search of some rude shelter, we scrambled over large hewn stones, and fragments of marble columns, with here and there a piece of carved cornice or sculptured pediment protruding from the dust. Our guide had dashed on in front, and we eagerly followed, heedless of stones, and pits, and prostrate houses—in silence, but hoping for some kind of relief. A cry of joy burst from the whole party us, on passing the crest of the tell, we saw a low broken wall, and not far from it a number of stone troughs round the mouth of an old well. The well was dry, but we crouched down under the shelter of the wall, and our poor horses came close to our feet, lowering their heads and shutting their eyes to escape the drifting sand. In about an hour the simoom had spent its fury, and we prepared to resume our route. "What place is this?" I said to Selim, who lay beside me, coiled up in the folds of his capote. "Um Lakis," he replied. Um Lakis! This then is all that marks the site and bears the name of Lachish, which Joshua besieged and captured. Josh. x. 31–33. Starting to my feet I ran to the top of the mound. Round the spot where I stood lay the heaped-up ruins and the dust of a once great and royal city, now deserted and utterly desolate. From the ruins I looked away out over the plain where the Israelites were marshalled, having approached from the north; then I turned to the south, to see the route by which the troops of Horam, king of Gezer, came up to help Lachish." The brief conflict, and the decisive victory of Joshua, must have been distinctly seen by the inhabitants. And that plain which stretches away northward to the horizon, was the scene of another event—one of the most mysterious and terrible recorded in history. The vast army of Sennacherib had "come up" against "the fenced cities of Judah." They encamped first against Lachish, and then marched on Libnah, a neighboring city. 2 Kings xviii. 13, et seq. The monarch, in the pride of his power, when at the head of his victorious soldiers, dared to defy the God of Israel. "Who are they," he asked, "among all the gods of the countries, that have delivered their country out of mine hand, that the Lord should deliver Jerusalem out of mine hand?" The Lord himself replied to the impious question:—"And it came to pass that night, that the angel of the Lord went out, and smote in the camp of the Assyrians an hundred four-score and five thousand," xix. 35.

"Like the leaves of the forest when summer is green,
That host with their banners at sunset were seen:
Like the leaves of the forest when Autumn hath blown,
That host on the morrow lay wither'd and strown.

For the Angel of death spread his wings on the blast,
And breathed on the face of the foe as he passed;
And the eyes of the sleepers waxed deadly and chill,
And their hearts but once heaved, and for ever were still."

May not the angel of death have spread his wings on the blast of some such storm as that which we had just encountered? Had it been only a little more violent, and of a little longer duration, no army, exposed to its fury on such a plain, could have survived it.

"From Lachish Joshua passed on to Eglon," and so did we. We were now in the track of the great conqueror, treading the very soil which he trod more than thirty centuries ago, and visiting the sites of those royal cities which he wrested from the Canaanite kings. As we read the brief narrative of his marches and his victories, we were struck with the minute accuracy of his topography. The distance from Lachish to Eglon is just about two miles; and it was thus easy for the Israelites, after the capture of the former, to march on the latter, and "take it the same day." Josh. x. 34, 35.

Eglon, like Lachish, is utterly desolate. It is a shapeless mass of ruins and rubbish, strown over a rounded hillock, with two or three light marble shafts standing up among them, like tombstones in an old cemetery.

Still we rode on eastward over the undulating desolate plain. Our course lay along the southern border of Philistia, where the plain has been overrun for many a century by the wandering Ishmaelites of Et-Tih, and where extensive cultivation and settled habitation are alike impossible. What it is now it appears to have always been—debatable land. From the line of our route southward to the valley of Gerar, Abraham and Isaac pastured their flocks; and their shepherds disputed with the Philistines about the wells they dug. The pastures, then as now, were free and abundant; but springs of water were too rare and precious to be retained or surrendered without a struggle. In our ride of more than thirty miles that day we did not meet a human being; and from the moment we left the fields of Gaza till we passed in among the rocky spurs of the hills of Judah, we did not see a single sign of human life. We saw many towns and villages in ruins—white mounds of rubbish—on the grey plain. The words of the prophet were constantly in our minds and on our tongues. "O Canaan, the land of the Philistines, I will even destroy thee, that there shall be no inhabitant." Zeph. ii. 5. Some miles further north the desolation is not so complete. I had an opportunity during another tour, of visiting two or three little villages still remaining there, and of seeing noble fields of grain round them.

The sun was setting behind us as we crossed the ridge that bounds the pleasant vale of Beit Jibrin. We had now left the Shephelah, "the low country," with its white downs and wide reaches of bare, desolate plain, and rich corn fields, and we had entered the "hill country," with its rocky ridges and conical tells, and shrubberies of dwarf ilex, and green winding glens. The contrast was great, and the change pleasant. Halting beneath the massive ruins of Beit Jibrin our tents were soon pitched, and we felt the sweets of rest and sleep after a day of unusual fatigue and suffering.

THE BORDER LAND OF JUDAH AND PHILISTIA.

When the stranger travels through the hill country, which separates the Judean range from the Philistine plain, his attention is arrested by many objects which seems strange and almost inexplicable. The rich plains are in a great measure deserted; yet the wildest recesses of these hills are studded with villages. The people seem to have selected for their abode the most rugged and inaccessible localities they could possibly find. One would fancy they had something of the spirit of the old hermits in them. Here are villages built amid labyrinths of rocks; there they are clinging like swallows' nests to the sides of precipices; while away yonder, they are perched like feudal castles on the tops of hills. Often, too, when riding through yawning ravines, between beetling cliffs, where one would think no human being would voluntarily dwell, or could find means of life, we are startled by groups of children, most of them naked, springing out from holes and caves, and shouting their wonder or delight at the strange costume of the travellers. Looking up we see, far overhead, vines hanging in festoons from the brows of jagged rocks, and miniature corn-fields on shelving hill-tops, round which the eagles sweep in graceful circles. We observe, too, that every ancient town and village was a fortress; and that every modern hamlet is capable of defense. Another remarkable characteristic of this region is the multitude of its caves. They are found wherever there is a trace of human habitation—hewn in the soft calcareous rock, and so constructed as to form secure magazines for grain, and safe places of abode for the inhabitants in time of danger. The solution of these anomalies is, that this has always been border land. Every foot of it was keenly contested by the Israelites and Philistines. At a later period the Idumeans invaded the south and west of Palestine. From the fall of the Jewish power to the present day, an unceasing warfare has been waged between the roving freebooters of the plain and the settled dwellers on the mountains.

The Bethogabra of the Jews, the Eleutheropolis of the Greeks, the Beigiberin of the Crusaders, and the Beit Jibrin of the Arabs, was for more than fifteen centuries the chief fortress of the border land,—the key of the mountains, and the defense of the great roads from Jerusalem and Hebron to Gaza. The massive ruins of its castle, among which the first dawn of the morning found us wandering, show its ancient importance. But we were still more deeply interested in the caverns excavated in the rocky banks of the vale south of the ruins. Having procured lights and a guide we closely examined the three principal groups. They are unique in plan and character,—altogether different from the temple-tombs of Egypt, and the beautiful rock chambers of Petra, and the intricate sepulchres of Jerusalem. Here are long ranges of bell-shaped chambers, some of them seventy feet in diameter, and sixty high, connected by arched doorways, and winding subterranean passages, and long flights of steps ascending and descending. Many are entirely dark; others are lighted by a circular aperture at the top; the roofs of others have partially fallen in, leaving jagged openings through which the sunlight streams, and long brambles hang down. Side chambers, like galleries, are occasionally seen opening high up in the wall. Near and among them, also are tombs, ranging from twenty to sixty feet in length, with tiers of recesses for bodies on each side. It is a strange, romantic spot this vale of Beit Jibrin. One might spend days roaming through its mysterious caves, which look like subterranean towns. The remains on the surface, too, are well worth the attention of the antiquarian and the architect. Cyclopean foundations, indicating the Jewish or Phœnician age, solid walls, and deep wells of the Roman period, the light and picturesque Gothic of Crusading times, are all displayed in groups through this valley. And away at its southern extremity is a bare conical hill, honey-combed with caverns. That is the site of Mareshah, where Asa defeated the army of the Ethiopians. 2 Chron. xiv.

Sending tents and baggage direct to Beit Nettif, on the side of the Valley of Elah, we set out with our guide to explore the border land between Beit Jibrin and Bethshemesh. On we sped at a dashing pace, invigorated by the mountain air—up rocky banks, over rounded ridges with bare crowns of naked limestone, through tangled brakes of prickly ilex and wild plum, and across green vales, down which wound dry torrent beds, covered with white glistening pebbles, and fringed with the acacia and oleander. Kudna, Dhikria, and Deir Dubban were visited in succession, and their caverns inspected, similar in all respects to those above described, except that some of them are now converted into cisterns, on which the people depend for a supply of water.—J. L. Porter.

The Restitution.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXII. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, AUGUST 1, 1883. NO. 20.

THE RESTITUTION.

TERMS--TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR, Payable in advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.

Address all Letters and Communications to THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS: THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortalized saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

BRITISH PHASE OF THE EASTERN QUESTION.—No. 44.

The scepter of Judah—Was it carried to the islands of the West in the person of Zedekiah's daughter? Passages from Anglo-Israel — If the scepter passed to the ten tribes when the kingdom was rent what authority had Zedekiah? Claims of the West to David's scepter—what? Subject fully investigated. Scepter of Judah. Did the scepter go to the Isles of the West.

In "Anglo-Israel" are the following declarations.

"The ten-tribed nation, therefore, is the kingdom, and Judah lost all claim to the honors and rewards of the kingdom now transferred to other hands. So Rehoboam understood it, and he was ill disposed to allow of such a transfer; for he resolved to make war on the children of Israel. 1 Kings xii. 24. 'Thus saith the Lord, Ye shall not go up, nor fight against your brethren the children of Israel: return every man to his house; for this thing is from me. They hearkened therefore to the word of the Lord, and returned to depart according to the word of the Lord.' I need hardly say that this remarkable transfer of the kingdom, throne and dignity to the ten tribes, secured to them all those special promises and blessings that God had previously made to Abraham and to his seed. It is to the kingdom of Israel, as then constituted, and their descendants that we must look for the fulfilment of those many promises quoted, and others yet to be noted. To the ten tribes to whom the kingdom was transferred, most certainly, the blessings are promised, and not to the Jews.

That throne of David, Psa. lxxxix. 31–37, and the kingdom of Israel must be in existence somewhere; and, moreover, must have had a continuous existence throughout all these centuries." Pages 13 and 14. "I will cause to cease the kingdom of the house of Israel." Hos. i. 4, 7. "For the children of Israel shall abide many days without a prince, and without a sacrifice, and without an image, and without an ephod, and (without) teraphim: Afterward shall the children of Israel return, and seek the Lord their God, and David their king: and shall fear the Lord and his goodness in the latter days." Hos. iii. 4, 5.

"Who is it that has read history that does not know that Judah, or the Jews, never had the sceptre of dominion for one day, since the days of Zedekiah, no, not for an hour." Page 15.

"Judah was the recognized leader in all their journeys, marches, and wars, and was known as the royal tribe, and the lion was the heraldry of Judah. This device was given to them by God, and by them retained until the event alluded to in Matt. xxi. 43, when the Jews killed the son and heir of the vineyard, and Jesus said unto them, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof." Anglo-Israel—page 74. "The Jews had born the royal emblems until now: but rejecting the son and the heir, they lost the honor and the glory, and even the semblance of a national existence passed away from them." Page 74.

These passages we have found it impossible to harmonize. Judah lost the sceptre in Rehoboam, and holds it in some form till Jesus, the heir to David's throne, was born. How could the sceptre of Judah be in England and in Palestine at the same time? If the kingdom was transferred to the ten tribes under Jeroboam, what had Rehoboam? Certainly not the kingdom, if Jeroboam had it. If, therefore, Rehoboam had not the kingdom of David, what had his successor? Nothing more than they inherited, since, therefore, they inherited nothing of David's throne or kingdom, they had nothing of the kingdom. Zedekiah, therefore, had nothing of David's kingdom, his daughter, inheriting all her father's rights, had nothing. What, then, did she carry to Ireland of David's throne and kingdom? Ans: All that her father inherited of that kingdom—nothing. What, then, went to the Scotch king? All that Tephi had—nothing. How much of David's kingdom has Queen Victoria received? All that Fergus received of Tephi — all that Zedekiah had, which was all that Rehoboam had left—which was nothing of David's kingdom. Therefore Queen Victoria has nothing of David's kingdom. We are quite willing that the British empire should inherit the multitudinous seed of Ephraim, but not the one seed of Judah. Let her feed in the immense pastures of Ephraim: but it is quite too much that she should devour all the pastures of Judah.

The way out of this dilemma is the following. 1. The kingdom of Israel was a united kingdom under David and Solomon, consisting of the twelve tribes. 2. Under Jeroboam the rent kingdom commenced. 3. The rent kingdom was composed of two kingdoms, the ten-tribed kingdom under Jeroboam, and the two-tribed kingdom under Rehoboam. Hence the kingdom of David was a rent kingdom. 4. Ten parts of David's kingdom went off with Jeroboam, the son of Nebat of the tribe of Ephraim, and not of Judah. Two tribes, the city, temple with its priesthood, remained with Rehoboam, and that too by divine appointment. 5. These two independent parts of David's twelve-tribed kingdom continued till B. C. 720, when the ten-tribed kingdom went into captivity. From that captivity they never returned. Their service was never restored. Hos. iii. 4, 5. 6. About 133 years later the two-tribed kingdom was taken into captivity in Babylon where they continued 70 years; after which under Zorubbabel, (the lineal descendant of Nathan, the son of David, and the legal successor and heir of Jechonial a royal estate), Ezra, and Nehemiah, there was a partial return. There were then governors and judges, priests and temple worship till A. D. 69, when they (two tribes) were scattered among all nations, and have thus continued to the present century. There has been a constant overturning since the crown was taken from the head of Zedekiah. "The sceptre (tribe-staff) did not depart from the tribe of Judah, nor the judge's staff from its position between his feet till Messiah come (incarnation), and unto him shall be the gathering of the people. They did gather unto him until the rulers put him to death. That the kingdom of David was to be continually overturned, and not to be as it was under David and Solomon is clearly taught in Ezek. 21, 26. "This (shall) not be the same." "Had the Jews received him, that kingdom of David would then have been established; but, he came to his own, and his own received him not." He was cast out of his vineyard and slain.

During 18 centuries the Gentiles have been gathering to his standard. When their fulness is come in then thy veil will be removed, first from Judah, to enable them to discern that Jesus of Nazareth is their Messiah; and from Israel who have been lost so many centuries under another name. Then will Judah and Israel (12 tribes) become one nation under David's Son, as formerly under David.

I (God) will give it him (the diadem, to Messiah). The many days of Hos. iii. 3–5, extend from B. C. 720 to "the latter days." Such would be the plain, Scriptural interpretation of the prophecies concerning Israel and Judah. The whole twelve tribes, so far as the kingdom of David is concerned, have been denationalized ever since the rending of the kingdom. During this long period God has held the diadem, and has allowed the four Gentile horns to chastise his people. The image is Gentile. The stone is the kingdom of David's Son.

The metallic image must, therefore, cover the "many days" of Hos. iii. 4. The diadem of the world left the line of the one seed under Rehoboam, and from that time onward Judah took a subordinate rank under the Gentile monarchies. The "one seed" kingdom is future; but the multitudinous seed—"A multitude of nations," is present. That the one seed, Jesus of Nazareth, will rule over the two tribes and the ten tribes in a twelve-tribed kingdom, is certainly Scriptural; that he has so reigned is not true, nor has any of David's sons had such high and exclusive honor.

Keeping out of view the future reign of subjugation, they apply to the past and to the present all those passages that belong to that age. The organization of the "stone" kingdom is an event still future. Judah and Israel are the chief elements of that kingdom. Their union with the Gentiles of this age will be one of the first events after Christ's return. If, then, the world is full of hostile nations when Jesus, the Son of David, returns, the principal work, after the organization of his kingdom, is the subjugation of his enemies. His bride will then be with him, and will assist him in the work.

Isaiah lxv. and lxvi. belong to that period, and not to the past or to the present. It is quite unreasonable to suppose that the most glowing descriptions of blessedness should apply to a period covered by Gentile domination; one full of wickedness, and one in which the Great King is not personally present.

What, then, do you do with the Irish testimony relative to a. The advent of Jeremiah and Baruch, and Zedekiah's daughter in Ireland. b. The marriage of Tephi to an Irish chief. c. Two tables. d. The line to Queen Victoria. e. Jacob's stone. f. Royal standard. g. The harp; and many other historic facts?

Are they facts of authentic history? Could we be persuaded that they have authentic history as their basis we should believe their testimony. But when we learn that there are in the world enough fragments of the veritable cross of Christ to construct the largest vessel afloat in the British navy; that there are enough seamless garments to clothe a regiment; that Jerusalem itself is full of fiction relative to persons, places and things; that every land has its legendary histories and fictions, we need not be surprised that an island colonized by Hebrews, and associated with the history of that people for 30 centuries, should have many wonderful traditions. Let us take the "coronation stone" as an instance. The history of that stone, ever since it was placed under the seat of the coronation chair in Westminster Abbey, is known; but who can trace its history, without a broken link, to the night of Jacob's vision—ladder sleep? Who can keep his eye on that stone from the night of Jacob's wilderness sleep, to Jerusalem, then to Spain, to Ireland and Scotland till it was deposited under the chief seat of the British empire? How simple the original narrative:—"And he (Jacob) lighted upon a certain place, and tarried there all night, because the sun was set; and he took of the stones (not one only) of that place, and put (them) for his pillows, and lay down in that place to sleep." He then describes his dreams, his ladder, and his company. Vs. 18, "And Jacob rose up early in the morning and took the stone that he had put (for) his pillows, and set it up (for) a pillar; and poured oil upon the top of it. And this stone, which I have set (for) a pillar, shall be God's house." Gen. xxviii. 11, 18, 22.

So far we have its inspired history. B. C. 1760. Where, then, is the history of its removal to Jerusalem? "Some of the rabbins pretend that this very stone was placed under the ark of the covenant in the second temple; and the Mahometans flatter themselves that it forms the foundation of the temple of Mecca."—Calmet. It has grown very much since Jacob put it among the heap of stones for his pillow. But stones do grow. "Dr. Petrie points to a stone now in Ireland as being the one, which is nonsense, because the stone so shown is fourteen tons in weight."—Hine. That stone belongs to the worship of Baal.

The idea that Jeremiah and Baruch took it from an eastern vessel disabled on the coast of Spain, is not probable. Too many links missing. Did Jacob carry the pillar with him on his journey? or was it left like other Eastern pillars? Was it ever in Jerusalem? If so, who removed it and when? Its being in Jerusalem rests upon the testimony of rabbinical tradition.

Where is the true and authentic history of Jeremiah's life in Ireland? The application of Ezek. xvii. 22, made by Dr. Adam Clarke, is without sufficient data, since there is not sufficient evidence that Zedekiah's daughter was ever in Ireland. The idea that Israel must have the line of king David ruling over them, is by no means necessary.

Dead flies cause the ointment of the apothecary to send forth a stinking savor: so doth a little folly to him that is in reputation for wisdom and honor.—Eccl. x. 1.

Our text is the saying of the wise king of Israel; it is an enigma—a dark saying, in which some known thing is concealed under obscure language—an obscure question, a riddle.—Webster.

First the ointment. We take for example the lady's toilet. Do you see that cup of ointment? How clean, how sweet the odor, how careful to keep it covered; let it be left open, how quickly do the flies gather into it. What then? It is ruined, becomes a stinking mess. What extreme folly to leave that cup open, and what waste of the costly ointment.

How beautifully does the example of Mary, in anointing the head of our dear Redeemer, illustrate the true Christian! Do you see that humble, devoted servant of Jesus? How careful to first get the heart clean by being baptized in water for the remission of sins, so that an application of the blood of Christ can cleanse us from all sin, and make us clean and pure as Christ is pure.

Our text illustrates the two principles running through the entire word of God—the good and the bad—the ointment representing the good, dead flies (or the flies of death) the bad.

We begin with the creation of our world, the ointment representing it as it came from the hand of the Architect of the universe, when the Elohim pronounced it very good, so good that the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy.

Let us consider man in his Eden home, and his surroundings before the flies of death were in the ointment. He was made in the image, from a photograph likeness of his Creator, on probation for immortality and eternal life, to test his fealty to his Creator, and form a character in harmony with the Divine mind. His surroundings as good as God could make them, and God was the full embodiment of light, truth and perfection. Eden, Paradise, a Garden of Delight; this was man's—Adam's home. Represented or illustrated by the apothecary's ointment, a sweet smelling savor unto God, the Almighty, the Strong One. His surroundings of the highest order and of the best quality, placed in that beautiful garden to till and cultivate it; set with fruit-bearing trees, to till the ground—a delightful employment. He was given a helpmeet, Eve, the mother of all living; commanded to multiply and replenish the earth. Yet he was mortal; perfect in his organism, but not in character. He needed discipline, he needed to test his fidelity to his Maker; hence the law and its penalty. Question: What should we poor mortal men in the flesh do without a law and its penalty death, in the nineteenth century? How soon should we become heathen of the darkest type! This was man's true condition in the beginning, a happy state indeed, fairly represented by the ointment that ran down upon Aaron's beard, even to the skirts of his garment. The moralist asks, could not God have prevented the fall of man? Our answer is, God is infinite but not arbitrary, and governs by law, yea perfect and exact law. Man is a free agent, not a machine.

We reluctantly turn over the picture to consider the flies of death in the ointment. This for the time being causes the silent tear to fall, but the redemption began, and to be accomplished by God's dear Son in his reign of glory on the earth, soon to begin, wipes away that tear effectually.

To consider the negative is a task we do not covet; the reign of sin, evil and death for 6000 years makes me shudder, and I shrink from the task with holy horror; but shall we receive good at the hand of God and not receive evil? Whereas by one man's sin death entered into the world, so death has passed upon all in that all have sinned. Rom. v. 12. Death is the most unnatural thing that ever happened to our world; it is an enemy, it is the king of terrors, an old tyrant, made to be destroyed, for it is a plainly revealed truth that it was, and still is, God's purpose to have a clean universe. We say with all our being, God speed the day.

In illustrating further our subject, we will begin with Solomon, the author of our text. There was a powerful quantity of dead flies in the ointment when Solomon, against God's command went down into Egypt and took 300 strange women for wives. That was Mormonism by the wholesale. We don't wonder that God rent away the kingdom from his successor. This was one of the greatest pieces of folly that a great and wise man was ever guilty of, and it shows that great men are not always wise; it also shows that God is imperative in his commands; he never says "a thus saith the Lord" without meaning just what he says, and woe to that man who would blunt the keen edge of the word of the Lord and put darkness for light and light for darkness.

That was not a little piece of folly in king Saul, when God sent him to utterly exterminate the Amalekites instead of obeying God's command, he spared Agag, and brought back the best of the flocks, and when confronted by God's prophet he said, I have sinned and played the fool. How many are today following Saul's example, and will bring upon themselves swift destruction!

That was a great piece of folly in David, the king and sweet singer of Israel, when he put Uriah in the fore front of the battle that he might be slain, in order to obtain Bathsheba his wife whom he coveted. This was not only a little folly, but a great sin, and called down the just judgments of God to be speedily executed upon the king of Israel when confronted by God's prophet, and charged with his crime he does not attempt to hide his crime, but shows his noble manhood, and says, I have sinned, and when offered his choice of four sore judgments he says, let me fall into the hands of God, for God is merciful. Here again he shows his confidence in Israel's God, and his honest noble manhood. Infidels will always bring forward this circumstance and dwell loud and long upon David's mistake, but never a word to say of his deeds of noble daring, of his God-fearing and Godly life. Where is the infidel that will do half as well? David the king has a keen sense of right and wrong. In one of his psalms he says: "My sin is ever before me." Although pardoned of his God he does not forget it. How many in our day are guilty of crime as dark and as damnable, who are screened by faults in the law, or by bribery, who wipe their mouths in innocency, and appear again as whited sepulchres before the public!

The two parallel lines run through the Bible, representing the good and evil, beginning with Cain and Abel, and ending at the close of the millennial age, the 1000 years' reign of Christ, when Satan musters his hosts for the last dread onset, and comes up on the breadth of the earth, encompasses the camp of the saints, and the beloved city, and fire comes down from God out of heaven and devours them. This is the last attempt of Satan for the rulership of the world; the conflict has been long and sanguinary—a battle of 7000 years. Glory be to God, our Jesus has triumphed gloriously; the hosts of Satan and of death and hell are cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, which is the second death. Alleluia, for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth. Glory be to God in the highest, and let all the people say—Amen.

We have anticipated the consummation, but are not through with our subject. We will go back and individualize. The two parallel lines we have drawn hold good in church relations in neighborhoods and in family relations. We begin with the church of God. The true church of God as set in order by the holy apostles of our Divine Lord was composed of men and women called out and separated from the Jews and Gentiles; they are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, an holy nation, a peculiar people; that ye should show forth the praises of him who has called you out of darkness into his marvelous light. How are we made such? Answer: By faith, repentance and obedience. The first act of obedience is a baptism in water, for the remission of our sins. From this point we go forward in the path of obedience adding to our faith all the Christian graces.

After thus having put on Christ to whom do we belong; and by what law are we governed? There is but one answer: the law of Christ. The whole is comprehended in the golden rule—as ye would that all men should do to you, do ye even so to them, for on this hangs all the law and the prophets. Just as we depart from this rule we become transgressors of God's holy law; hence sinners, for sin is the transgression of the law. Do we realize the importance of strict obedience to this positive teaching of the Master? Do not be deceived in so grave a matter. He has never given us a law we cannot keep, nor spoken words he did not mean. He will require a strict performance of every jot and tittle of his law and commands.

Are not the flies in the ointment or the tares among the wheat? Does not the Master say let both grow together till the harvest? Yes, but that does not prove we are mere machines, and have no power of choice. No, we are free agents. As we make our bed so we must lie on it—the money broker who has filled his coffers with usury, unlawful interest, would most gladly be considered a machine. His conscience like an armed man gives him no rest night or day. Oh that poor old pilgrim brother; we had long been connected in church fellowship, but I made his necessity my opportunity. I took a large grab. Do you see him? He is old, is bowed down to the earth. I wish I had not done it.

Again the law of Christ is positive, and takes precedence. Save for the cause of fornication shall a man put away his wife and be married to another. How shamefully has this plain law of the Great Teacher and Law Giver been ignored, and his authority trampled underfoot by members of the body of Christ and ministers of the word! Are such anything but legalized adulterers? What a foul blot on the fair escutcheon of the church of God; and yet these men have place in the church who fellowship and defend them. Are not the flies of death in the ointment.

How just, how pure, how plain and good are the precepts and the practices of Christ! What a blessed example left us to follow; and yet what crooked work we make in traveling the strait and narrow path that leads to eternal life! What blind infatuation has come over the minds of men; yea, men of talent, men of ability, men who have stood in the front rank in defense of Bible truth. How has the gold changed and the most fine gold become dim. How has Christ been wounded in the house of his friends. We say with David. If it had been an enemy then could we have borne it, but it was thou, a man mine equal, mine own familiar friend. We took sweet counsel together, we walked to the house of God in company; he has lifted up his heel against me.

It were far better for such never to have known the way of life, than after they have known it, to turn their back upon the holy commandment, and bring upon themselves swift destruction. Is not the church remiss in her duty in holding fellowship with such? Are we not greatly at fault in holding our peace and allowing such to go unreproved and unrebuked? Are we not remiss in our duty and culpable in the sight of God? I ask, Have we, brethren, done our whole duty? Have we a clear conscience as tender as the apple of the eye? The day of reckoning is upon us. I have seen low, ignorant partisanship take the place of plain Bible teaching, to the sorrow of my poor bleeding heart. These things would never have been practiced in the church of God had we not been off our guard, and allowed the flies of death to get into the ointment.

Hark! a cry! Behold the Bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him. Joyful news to those that are ready. They go in and the door is shut. How small the minority compared with the unready. The time has been long, we are old and worn, weary with watching; we cry O Savior, quickly come, and save the scattered remnant of the flock of slaughter.

We most heartily commend the course of Brother Ramsey, of Chicago, and ask who will come over to our city, the Capital of our highly favored Nation, and help us? Not a more beautiful city to be found in this or any other land. We greatly desire to see the standard of Bible truth planted here. Again we ask, Who will come? If it was with us as in days gone by, we should not call for help, only upon the God of the Bible. We are old and enfeebled and must soon lay off the harness, yet we greatly desire to see the truth firmly established here. Any one who may come shall have our prayers and our counsel, and what we can do to help forward the truth and work of God.

Respectfully and affectionately your Brother in the One Faith and Hope of the Gospel.

More About the Little Box.

Editor Restitution:

Not long ago I wrote a piece concerning a little box that my wife and I manufactured for the purpose of saving our mite for the support of THE RESTITUTION and the truth as it may be needed. We commenced putting our little mite away in the box the 16th of April and we have got five dollars to send for the support of the paper since that date, which I enclose in this letter and thank God for the blessings he has bestowed upon us. Brethren and sisters you see what a small mite will do, if we keep it up, pennies soon make dollars. How much better we feel to save our mite and turn it towards the support of the truth, than to spend it for the filthy weed called tobacco.

It matters not how little you spend for the weed, the same amount saved for the support of the truth will redound more to the glory of God than chewing or smoking tobacco. Let us remember that we are members of the body of Christ, and that the saints are to judge the world. If we are to judge the world we should, according to the truth of the gospel of Christ, surely try and set a good and manly example for the world to take pattern by. Surely chewing and smoking is not setting a good example. As Brother Eschaner made mention in one of his articles that he wrote for the paper concerning tobacco, he says it is either right or it is wrong.

Let us remember, brethren and sisters in Christ, that the flesh lusteth against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh, and these are contrary the one to the other; so that ye cannot do the things that ye would. Gal. v. 14. Be not deceived brethren, for whatsoever a man soweth that shall he reap. For he that soweth to the flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption. But he that soweth to the spirit shall of the spirit reap life everlasting. Eph. vi. 5. Uncleanness, or covetousness, let it not be once named among you, as becometh saints. Neither filthiness nor jesting, which are not convenient: but rather giving of thanks, for this ye know, that no whoremonger nor unclean nor covetous man who is an idolater, hath any inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and of God. Let no man deceive you with vain words, for because of these things cometh the wrath of God upon the children of disobedience." Eph. v. 3–6. A good example is invariably preferable and also acceptable to our heavenly Father in preference to a bad one; words fitly spoken are like apples of gold in pictures of silver.

Red Fish Lake, above Sawtooth City, on the summit of the Sawtooth range of mountains, in the Wood river region, Idaho, has dropped through the bottom. The lake had an area of several miles and was many fathoms in depths. It was on the summit of one of the peaks of the range, some 11,000 feet elevation above the sea, and surrounded by heavy timber, which rendered it a delightful place of resort in summer for camping, fishing and boating parties. The lake has been there since the white man has known the country, says the Hailey Times, but lately—the day of the occurrence is not known—the bottom fell out. The country formation is granite and limestone, and an immense fissure has opened, whether caused by separation or settling of the earth's surface or from volcanic action is not known. At present the bed of the lake is dry, and presents the appearance of a deep gorge or valley on the summit of the mountains. This lake has always contained millions of red fish, and been a favorite resort for bear, deer, and other game. Where the fish went to is as much a mystery as where the water went. — *Virginia (Nev.) # THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR

Plymouth, Indiana, Aug. 1, 1883.

A LETTER from Jerusalem for our next.

REMEMBER that our next Quarterly Conference is appointed at Argos, to include the second Sunday in September.

THE present number is mostly filled with original articles from our correspondents. Owing to important selections bearing upon wonderful discoveries—going to prove the truthfulness of the Bible, as well as upon the Oriental question—some of these articles have been considerably delayed. The one from Br. M. I. Lewis was received nearly or quite two months ago. We thank him for his uncomplaining patience. We are trying to do the best for the paper we can.

WHAT is termed our "Free-will Offering" is not a donation. Its object is to send THE RESTITUTION to friends and others. Those that furnish this aid do it with the hope that some, by becoming acquainted with the objects of the paper, may become permanent subscribers. Others are glad to make it a present to some special friend or relative as a token of esteem. Some send to those dwelling in foreign lands. We hope, dear brethren and sisters, that God will accept of and approve our little sacrifices, in this direction, for others. If we have his smile and approbation the cavious censures of poor mortal man will not weigh much with us.

THE following is an official notice from the General Passenger Agent's Office, Cleveland, Ohio. We give from another advertisement, in handbill form, the rates from some of the places nearest Plymouth for tickets good to the Falls and return. Valparaiso, $7.50; Wanatah, $7.45; Argos, $7.25; Montone, $7.20; Clay Pool, $7.15; Sydney, $7.10; South Whitley, $7.10. Parties desiring a longer time may have an addition of seven days in addition to the time limit given on the ticket.

AN EXCURSION EVERYBODY WILL APPRECIATE.

The Nickel Plate have advertised a grand excursion from local stations on the line of the N. Y., C. & St. L. R'y to Niagara Falls and return, on Monday, August 13. Frequent excursions have been run in past years by railroad companies which only accommodated parties living within a comparatively short distance from Niagara Falls. It is seldom those of our fellow citizens who live west of the center of Ohio are afforded an opportunity to visit this wonderful cataract at such very low rates; and many of those who are fortunate enough to have witnessed the numerous points of interest which nature has provided at this famous place, will be delighted to again have an opportunity to renew the pleasure everyone enjoys who has witnessed them. Amongst the various artificial attractions now to be witnessed at Niagara Falls is the Electric Light, which, after night, is so arranged that the most beautiful effects are produced upon the mighty body of water, as it plunges from the dizzy eminence into the seething foam a hundred feet below. To enable the excursionists to enjoy this grand treat, the managers of the Nickel Plate have arranged this excursion to arrive at the Falls in the forenoon, and will remain there until after ten o'clock the same evening, when the train will return as far as Buffalo, and the excursionists enabled to enjoy a night's rest before returning. The excursionists will leave Buffalo the following day at half-past ten o'clock in the morning, Buffalo city time. The rates from all stations west of Cleveland are so very low that all who can arrange to leave their business, will be enabled to go.

THE DISPENSATION OF THE FULLNESS OF TIMES.

The apostle embraces all duration—past, present and to come in the context. He sketches the eternal all-comprehending purpose of God which he purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord. Eph. i. 1-10; iii. 11-21. Please note its salient points.

I. It groups the Christian calling to "all spiritual blessings in heavenly (realities) in Christ and the riches of the glory of his inheritance in the saints! And the exceeding greatness of his mighty power wrought in Christ when he raised him from the dead and set him far above all principality and power and name in this world and that which is to come," vs 19-21. Here is mercy enthroned and immortalized.

II. This precious sentence—"The dispensation of the fullness of times"—belongs not to the times of the Gentiles—the four beast's horns that scattered Israel, Judah and Jerusalem." Zech. i. 18-22, Dan. vii. 17 and viii. 11-19. But to his times, who is the "seed" you sing the kind of seed the Master and his apostles sowed, or tares, which? Read carefully Gal. i. 6-12. Now back to the parable. This seed, (the word of the kingdom) often falls by the wayside, and is trodden down and devoured by the fowls of the air. Or, then cometh the devil—in one or more of his servants, who are pretended friends and associates—and taketh away the word out of their hearts, lest they should believe and be saved.

And some fell upon a rock, and as soon as it was sprung up, it withered away, because it lacked moisture. Hundreds and thousands of men and women have heard and received the word with joy, but having no depth of soil, (enlightened judgment and honest conviction of heart) which for a while believe, and in time of temptation when affliction or persecution ariseth for the word's sake, immediately they are offended.

Oh how frail is mortal man
Whose life and work is but a span.

And some fell among thorns, and the thorns sprang up with it, and choked it. "And that which fell among thorns, are they which, when they have heard, go forth and are choked with cares and riches, and pleasures of this life, and bring no fruit to perfection. This last is evidently one of the most successful and dangerous traps the enemy of all good ever set for mankind. Thousands and millions of poor, honest souls are running headlong into this satanic snare. See that man who has obeyed the gospel completely choked down with the business cares of this life so much, so that he can not think or talk about anything else but business, business. He is loaded down with gold and silver, heaping up riches against the day of judgment. And yet he has not enough and to spare. See him engaged in the frivolous pleasures of this life. His mind is full, his time is wholly occupied with the cares of this life,—eat, drink, and be merry like the fool in the parable. Poor deluded soul, your life will soon be required of thee, then whose shall those things be which thou hast provided? And that is not all, here are some of the sisters whose time and mind are completely taken up with this world's vexatious cares, cook and eat, wash and scrub, iron and patch, fix and primp, until their poor enslaved lives are worn out. They work and worry with this big world, fly around and fret because they can't do more until the darkness of friendly night compels them to stop and take a little rest. Poor deluded slaves of earth, who must soon wake up to their everlasting discomfiture, and find that this big world has forever cheated them out of a glorious crown of life. Sad fate indeed.

THE FIRST RAILROAD IN THE HOLY LAND.

The first railroad in Palestine is being laid out, and the preliminary survey has been completed as far as the Jordan. It is to run between Acre and Damascus, and it is called the Hamidie Line, because it is named after his present Majesty, the Sultan Abdul Amid, and probably one reason why the firman has been granted so easily lies in the fact that it passes through a great extent of property which he has recently acquired to the east of the Plain of Esdraelon. The concession is held by ten or twelve gentlemen, some of whom are Moslems and some Christians, but all are Ottoman subjects resident in Syria. Among the most influential are the Messrs. Sursock, bankers, who own a greater part of the Plain of Esdraelon, and who have, therefore, a large interest in the success of the line.

Starting from Acre, it will follow the curve of the bay for ten miles, in a southerly direction, at a distance of about two miles from the beach. Crossing the Kishon by a sixty-foot bridge it will turn east at the junction of a short branch two miles long at Haifa. Hugging the foot of the Carmel range, so as to avoid the Kishon marshes, it will pass through the gorge that separates that mountain from the lower range of Galilee hills, and debouch into the Plain of Esdraelon. This plain it will travel in its entire length. The station for Nazareth will be distant about twelve miles from that town; there may, however, be a short branch to the foot of the hills. So far there has only been a rise from the sea level in twenty miles of 210 feet, so that the grade is imperceptible. It now crosses the watershed and commences to descend across the plains of Jezreel to the valley of the Jordan. Here the Wady Jalud offers an easy incline as far as Beisan (or ancient Bethshean, and every mile of the country it has traversed so far is private property and fairly cultivated.

At Beisan it enters upon a region which has partly come to maintain and partly to its insecurity, been abandoned to the Arabs, but it is the track of all others which the passage of a railway is likely to transfigure, for the abundance of the water, which is now allowed to stagnate in marshes, and which causes its unhealthiness, is destined to attract attention to its great fertility and natural advantages, which would, with proper drainage, render it the most profitable region in Palestine. Owing to the elevation of the springs which send their copious streams across the site of Beisan, the rich plain which descends to the Jordan, 600 feet below, can be abundantly irrigated. There is a little bit of engineering required to carry it down to the valley of the Jordan, here 800 feet below the sea, which it then followed north as far as the Djisr el Medjamieh. Near this ancient Roman bridge of three arches, which is used to this day by the caravans of camels which bring the produce of the Hauran to the coast, the new railway bridge will cross the Jordan, probably the only one in the world which will have for its neighbor an actual bridge in use which was built by Romans, thus, in this now semi-barbarous country, bringing into close contact an ancient and a modern civilization.

After crossing the Jordan the line will still follow the banks of that river to its junction with the Yarmuk, which it will also cross, and then traverse a plain of rich alluvium, about five miles long by four wide, to the banks of the ridge which overlooks the eastern margin of the sea of Tiberias. This is the extent to which the survey has been completed. It is not decided whether to rise from the valley by the shoulder of the ridge which overlooks the Yarmuk, or to follow the east shore of the Lake of Tiberias to the Wady Samakh, which offers great advantages for a grade by which to ascend nearly 3000 feet in about fifteen miles. This is the toughest bit of engineering on the line, and is in close proximity to the steep place down which the swine possessed of devils are said to have rushed into the sea.

Once on the plateau, it will traverse the magnificent pasture lands of Jaulan and the grain growing country of the Hauran, with probably a short branch to Mezrib, which is the principal grain emporium, and one of the most important halting places on the great pilgrimage road from Damascus to Mecca. It is calculated that the transport of grain alone from this region to the coast will suffice to pay a large dividend upon the capital required for the construction of the road, which will be about 130 miles in length. The promoters have also secured the right to put steam tugs upon the Lake of Tiberias, and under the influence of this new means of transportation the desolate shores will undergo transformation.—Boston Daily Advertiser.

THE APPROACHING END OF THE AGE.

Four lectures were recently given in Elizabeth, New Jersey, on the above subject by Mr. William Ellis, of Birmingham, England. The lecturer showed by many quotations from the Bible that time is a very important factor in the divine scheme for the redemption of mankind. As Paul said to the Athenians, "God had determined the times before marked out, and the bounds of their habitations, that they might seek and find him, if haply they might feel after him." That he had appointed a day in which he will judge or rule the world in righteousness by the Lord Jesus Christ.

The lecturer showed that the word day often covers a longer period than 12 or 24 hours—such as the day of salvation, the day of judgment, and the day of our life. The week, also, and year, have been used to measure longer periods than that of seven days or 365 days. He showed that the religious services of Israel were based upon the week as a unit, and that they had first a week of weeks as in the interval between the passover and pentecost; a week of months, as in the interval from the first month to the seventh month, which completed their worship for the season. In the land they had a week of years that it might rest after six years of producing. They had also a week of years of years, or seven times seven years, between one jubilee of redemption and another.

The lecturer showed that it was because God's people, Israel, did not observe these feasts or sabbaths which he made them for their good that he cast them out of his sight until seven times should pass over them, and that during those times they would be scattered among all the nations of the earth, that their kingdom would be overthrown, their temple a desolation and the city trodden down. From the redemption of Israel from the bondage of Egypt by Moses until 721 B. C., when they lost their independence, a period of over seven hundred years, it was the will of God to bear with them until he removed them out of his sight, as it is said by all his servants the prophets. So was Israel carried away out of their own land to Assyria unto this day." 2 Kings xvii. 18, 23.

In this carrying away of Israel there are four marked terms: 1. The invasion of Samaria by Pul, king of Assyria, in 771 B. C. 2. Tiglath Pileser, 740 B. C. 3. Shalmaneser, 730 and 721. 4. Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, 600 or 598 B. C. From first to last there is a period of over 170 years. Taking, therefore, the earliest date as the beginning of their subjection to Gentile dominion, and the last period as the last, or time when this dominion shall come to an end, we are furnished with a similar guide to that which was in the hands of Daniel, when he understood by books the number of years that Judah was to be in captivity in Babylon.

Mr. Ellis inferred that as a period of about 170 years intervened between the beginning and ending of Israel's being carried out of God's sight for their sins, so in like manner would a period of a similar length intervene between the first indication of their redemption and the time of their final settlement again in their own land in the favor of God. The first desolators of the people and land of Israel were the Assyrian and Babylonian powers, and afterwards their successors, the Medes, Persians, Greeks and Romans. The end of the Western Roman Empire in 476 A. D. closed the period of pagan dominion over Israel, and made way for two other dominions about to take place. These two are the Holy Roman Empire on the one hand, and the Mohammedan on the other. The one has trodden down Jerusalem and desolated the land until wrath has come upon it from which it cannot escape.

Seven times from 771 reaches to 1750, the first stroke in the reverses of the Papacy, which was followed by those of 1793, 1804, 1830, 1848, and 1870, when it disappeared as a civil power. The Mohammedan power has also had its rises, zenith and decline. The years 1820, 1844, 1854-5, 1878, and 1882, are steps in its downward progress, drawing it towards the vanishing point. The rise, progress and decline of these two powers form the present great signs in the heavens, visible to the simplest one who gives heed to the sure word of prophecy, that the period of Israel's down-treading is coming to a close, that the long night of error, superstition and degradation of man is showing the streaks of the dawn of the day of blessedness, shadowed forth by God through all his prophets, who have been since the world began. The day of 1000 years in which all who have believed, who have walked and worked with God, shall enter with him into his rest, and occupy for the ages not defined, the kingdom which he prepared for them from the foundation of the world.

THE MILDMAY PARK CONFERENCE.

The twenty-seventh annual convention was opened last week at the Conference Hall, Mildmay Park, the meetings, as usual, attracting a large number of visitors not only from various parts of England, but abroad. On the Sunday evening preceding the conference, C. A. Fox preached to a large congregation, his subject being "Coming to Christ," on the words, "We who have believed do enter into rest." The sermon was rich in many pleasing illustrations.

The meeting on the Jewish question on Wednesday afternoon, under the presidency of the Earl of Cavan, was a very interesting one. Lord Cavan said: "The subject is all-important, and a very solemn one. I can hardly think the manner in which it has been put in the programme to be the correct way, for it is no Jewish question; that has been settled long ago in the mind of God. In the Bible we have the whole history of the people given from beginning to end, and that shows that God has chosen them to be a peculiar people. It is not said, 'Thou shalt be a peculiar people, but thou art.' It behooves us to ask seriously—What is the duty incumbent on us to Israel? I trust we shall be true to that awakening interest and yearning desire towards his people which God is putting within the hearts of many in these days. I believe that we are on the eve of a remarkable dispensation, and drawing to the close of the present dispensation. I am thankful that this subject has been brought before the Mildmay conference."

Dr. Andrew Bonar said: "No man can read the Scriptures without continually coming into contact with the subject of God's interest in his ancient people. We ministers may sometimes fail in praying for Israel as we ought; but I know that in Scotland some of the very simplest of Christian people in remote corners are one with Christians in their family worship, and at their little prayer meetings never fail to remember God's ancient people. The Jews have furnished for ages a problem to the philosophical historian as a nation scattered for 1800 years, and yet a nation. It is a most mysterious problem which, with their light, they have been unable to settle. Our poets, like Byron and Moore, have cast a glance at Israel, and some would remember the beautiful hymn of the latter—

'But who shall see that glorious day,
When throned on Zion's brow,
The Lord shall rend the veil away
That blinds the nation now.'

It is about this people that we are to speak this afternoon;" and Dr. Bonar then proceeded to give an exposition of Isaiah xviii.

THE RESTORATION OF THE JEWS.

H. Friedlaender, who spoke upon "Jewish Restoration a Christian Duty," said the restoration would begin when the people began not only their residence in Palestine, but when they returned to the God of their fathers. The duty laid upon the Christian church was plain: where there are those among God's ancient people who want to return to the land of their fathers, the Gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ should be given them. Whatever may be said of the rights and wrongs of Jewish persecution, one thing is certain, that the ostensible reason which had brought down chastisement upon them was their mad pursuit of mercantile concerns; but now they had gone back to Judea with a disgust of all these things, and it seemed as though the hand of God were visibly in this. In Palestine God has opened a new field in which it was possible to preach the Gospel to hundreds of Jews day by day. He himself had seen scores of Jews so broken by God himself that they craved for the comfort given them in the Gospel. If this work went on as it had begun in Palestine it would certainly result in hundreds of Jews being set free to receive the Gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ, and to form a Christian church in Palestine again.

Norman M'Neile, the son of the late Dr. H. M'Neile, the Protestant champion, was one of the speakers of the morning, and though blind from a child, with perfect ease referred to many passages of Scripture, chapter and verse, which were needful to the unfolding of his argument. He urged that union with Christ led the believer to look forward to Christ's second advent.

THE RETURN OF CHRIST.

The Ven. Archdeacon Philpotts said he might say that on this subject he had spoken to multitudes long before any of those around him were born. The conviction with him was a growing one that the return of their blessed Lord was not far distant. It might be that old as he was he should escape the dishonors of the grave, and be called to meet his blessed Master in the air. He asked all present if the roof of this hall were to be suddenly cleft asunder, and looking up they should see their Lord coming in the clouds of heaven with his holy angels attending him, what would be the effect of this vision of glory on their hearts? As an aged man would they allow him to say that they ought to be able to give an answer to that question? It was right that they should consider whether they wanted to be among the number of those who would welcome his coming with joy, or whether their part would be the multitudes who would cry to the mountains and rocks to cover them to hide them from the presence of their Judge.

ADDRESS BY GRATTAN GUINNESS.

On Thursday afternoon H. Grattan Guinness presided over a missionary meeting in the large hall. He reminded the meeting that two of the greatest countries would be represented by friends to-day—Africa and China, which, to a great extent were still in heathen darkness. He remembered with thankfulness that as the result of the appeal made at the last conference several had been led to offer themselves for missionary work in different parts of the world. An officer in the army at the last conference had his heart so moved that though too old to go out as a missionary himself, he had the joy of seeing his son become one. Three ladies were now laboring in Palestine who then had their hearts stirred to go out, and several letters had been received testifying to the same desire to take part in missionary effort. There was no doubt that the present were remarkable missionary days—indeed, he believed that the world had never seen such days. God was now marvellously removing mountains of difficulty from the pathway of the Church, and immense regions which from time immemorial had been closed against the gospel were now being opened. The mission cry age dates from about the period of the French Revolution, for it was at the time when God's judgments were poured forth that the Church awoke to the duty of sending the gospel abroad

When Morrison went out to China in 1807 at first he dared not open his lips, and he had to pursue his work in a fish-cellar. After having made his dictionary he had to break off in his work, and subsequently dying, his work was left to others. It was not until 1860 that the country was fairly opened for missionary work.—London Christian Herald.

News Items.

The terrible calamity—an earthquake—which befel the Italian island of Ischia is estimated by latest accounts to have destroyed 2000—3000 lives.

The cholera is spreading and the worst is apprehended. It has appeared in Alexandria, and also reached the Balearic Isles in the Mediterranean. Analysis has shown that the river Nile is infected with putrid matter to the cataracts. The carcasses of 400 diseased cattle have been recently removed from this stream and buried. All ships from India and Egypt are quarantined at Fiume. Some suspicious deaths have occurred among Egyptian refugees in Syria. The deaths at Cairo on Sunday were 350, and 443 at other points. Heavy death returns are predicted when secrecy is no longer possible.

The remains of Capt. Webb, who attempted to swim through the seething whirlpool of Niagara river July 24, were found on the river's bank several miles below last Saturday evening.

The informer in the Phoenix Park murder cases, was shot dead while landing from the Melrose in South Africa.

By a railroad accident near Rome, N. Y., on Friday, July 28, 21 persons were killed and 30 seriously wounded, and it is rumored that a frightful disaster has happened in Colorado in which 140 persons have been either killed or seriously injured.

A Window Picture.

Enclosed within my window frame
A fairer picture lies
Than artist's hand could ever paint
With all his magic dyes.

Broad fields with delicate all abloom;
Low hills in greenness dressed;
While in the background, blue and dim,
The mountains raise their crest.

A changing picture, now, the sun
Lights all with mellow tint:
Then clouds, and over field and wood
The darkening shadows glint.

Yet ever, midst the changing light
The distant mountains tower,
Dimly outlined against the sky,
In grandeur clothed and power.

And thus my window picture lies,
Changing, but ever fair;
For summer sun or summer cloud
But adds new beauty there.

"Did God Make Rum?"

"What for," asked a poor little boy of his Sabbath-school teacher, "Did God make rum? Didn't he know it makes poor little boys' fathers drunk, and swearers, and cursers and idle, and their families ragged, and nothing hardly to eat? It's awful!"

"God never made rum," answered his teacher. "No! makes the beautiful fields of wheat and grain for bread to feed us with, but never turns them to rum."

"He that does it is wicked—is awfully wicked," answered the boy, his eyes filling with tears. "What will he say when God shows him all the hurt he's done?"

A solemn question, and a terrible sight will that be.

"I Know a Thing or Two."

"My dear boy," said a father to his only son, "you are in bad company. The lads with whom you associate indulge in bad habits. They drink, smoke, swear, play cards and visit theatres. They are not safe company for you. I beg you to quit their society."

"You needn't be afraid of me, father," replied the boy, laughing. "I guess I know a thing or two. I know how far to go and when to stop."

The lad left his father's house twirling his cane in his fingers and laughing at the "old man's notions."

A few years later and that lad, grown to manhood, stood at the bar of a court, before a jury which had just brought in a verdict of guilty against him for some crime in which he had been concerned. Before he was sentenced he addressed the court, and said among other things: "My downward course began in disobedience to my parents. I thought I knew as much of the world as my father did, and I spurned his advice; but as soon as I turned my back on my home, temptation came upon me like a drove of hyenas, and hurried me to ruin."

Mark that confession, ye boys who are beginning to be wiser than your parents! Mark it, and learn that disobedience is the first step on the road to ruin. Don't take it!

To the Young:

My dear young friends you that are without Christ, Jesus is calling you, his voice comes sweeter than the harps of angels from the mansions of rest; he says to each of you, "Lovest thou me? follow me," and not only to the young but to the old and middle-aged; he is saying the same to you as he did to Peter, "Lovest thou me?" If we love Jesus we will obey him. He has asked each one of you that question. Now decide, reach in the depths of your heart and see if you love Christ. If you love him you will be willing to follow him. He does not say wait for others, but follow me thyself; he does not say tomorrow or some time in the future, but just now. Faith in Christ alone delivers us from bondage; faith in Christ alone prepares us to enter his kingdom. Let not the cares of this world, the deceitfulness of riches, the seduction of pleasure keep you from Christ. What are riches to a dying man or woman? Riches in this world's goods will not purchase your salvation; you can not buy eternal life with money, and what will it profit a man if he should gain the whole world and lose his own soul? No, thanks be to God, this salvation is without money and without price. It is free to all that will come to Jesus in his appointed way.

Why do you stand and wait? Every time you refuse to come when Christ calls you, the next time he calls you will not hear his voice so plain as you did the first time. The signs of the times tell us that Christ will not long delay his coming, and will he find us ready when he comes. You may be young and think you have a long life before you, and that when you get old you will serve the Lord; but was not Christ comparatively young when he suffered and died that we might live? Did he not bear the scoffs and sneers of the wicked world for us? Do you not think we ought to sacrifice something for so dear a friend? I do. Do not delay but come.

A sister in Christ,
LYDIA REED.

REPLY TO BROTHER CASTLE.

The criticism of Brother Castle on my recent article on the "Invasion of Palestine" arises from a misapprehension of the reading of the text. If I gather the thought of the critic correctly he supposes the angel to pass down the stream some distance from the eastern gate of the temple and then begin to measure across the stream, wading in the water and measuring till it becomes too deep; when he returns to the bank.

The true idea is more clearly brought out by the reading of the Greek of the Septuagint. For which I would respectfully refer the curious to Prof. Gardner as the best authority with whom I am acquainted. I will at present content myself with calling attention to the reading of the text and its clear meaning when once we start right. Chapter xlvii. of Ezekiel opens with these words, "Afterward he brought me again unto the door of the house, and behold waters issued at from under the threshold of the house eastward; for the forefront of the house stood towards the east, and the waters came down from under the right side of the house at the south side of the altar."

Now let the reader place himself in this "door of the house," or eastern gate of the temple and observe the situation. Behind him lies the temple proper, with, first, a porch twenty cubits long by eleven broad, separated by folding gates from the Holy Place twenty cubits by forty which is separated also by gates from the most Holy Place twenty cubits square. The latter is entirely empty, but the Holy Place contains a simple table. Into this "door of the house" the prophet has already seen the glory of the God of Israel enter and out of it has heard the voice saying, "Son of man the place of my throne and the place of the soles of my feet where I will dwell in the midst of the children of Israel forever." Every careful student of prophecy will recognize this royal personage at once as none other than the glorified Son and heir of David thus publicly taking his seat on David's throne; which as the only High Priest of the new dispensation he places in the temple and where he reigns "a priest forever after the order of Melchisedec." I cannot more particularly describe the house now but may hereafter.

The position of the prophet as he stood in the "door of the house," was eight steps above the "inner court" which lay directly before him, 100 cubits square. Near the center of this "inner court" stood the great altar of burnt offering, twelve cubits square to which ascent is made by stairs on its eastern side expressly forbidden by the Mosaic law. The "inner court" has for its northern, eastern and southern sides high and noble buildings supported and adorned by elegant and lofty columns and divided into rooms for various purposes pertaining to the law which shall go forth of Zion and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem." Directly in front of him and exactly in the centre of the eastern side of the square "inner court" is a noble gateway looking out upon the outer court. At his right and left hands to the north and south are two gates exact counterparts to the eastern gate. Also looking out upon the "outer court" which has 100 cubits wide around the three sides of the "inner court" and temple; the whole being 500 cubits square. This is enclosed by lofty buildings 50 cubits in breadth supported by noble columns 50 cubits high, running around the entire three sides of the temple and enclosing all its buildings and courts.

Opposite the three gates which open into the "inner court" are three more gates each to each, and in every respect like them, opening from the "outer court" out upon the surrounding mountain top, all of which is to be "holy round about." To the west no gates or openings are placed—only a high wall to complete the square of 500 cubits and shut the Holy Places from the outer world. The "outer court" is raised seven steps above the surrounding country, the "inner court" eight steps higher and the floor of the temple eight steps higher still. Thus the prophet stands twenty-three steps above the level of the mountain top; and, looking eastward through both open gates can see the earthquake valley which has severed in twain the once lofty Mount of Olives" The foaming waters of the "river of life" as in innumerable cascades and waterfalls it leaps and laughs and claps its hands down four to five thousand feet in the fifteen miles which separates the Holy Places from the now purified waters of the Dead Sea.

The mountain of the house is itself to be elevated by the earthquake far above the surrounding mountains as it now lies considerably below them; and doubtless from this lofty height the peaceful waters of the eastern sea itself can be seen bearing upon its bosom the noble vessels of every clime and nation as they pass to and fro in the great highway formed by a canal from Haifa through Jordan and the Dead Sea to the Red Sea at Akaba where Solomon had his port, Ezion Gaber. Looking down at his feet and to his right hand the prophet sees a stream of water issuing from under the threshold of the temple itself across the "inner court" and passing to the south of the great altar disappear behind the walls or buildings which divide the inner from the outer court. It is at this point that the prophet says that the angel took him by the way of the north gate around to the outside eastern gate and he discovered that the waters had kept on in a direct course straight east and passing through the outer court and under the outside line of walls and buildings broke forth into the open country at the right hand or south side of the outer and eastern gate. Starting from this point the angel with the measuring line in his hand went forth eastward along the north bank of the river and measured a thousand cubits. He did not walk in the water for the purpose of ascertaining the length of the river as Brother Castle supposes I hold, but reaching a point 1000 cubits from the eastern gate the prophet says "he brought me through the waters." It is right here we get assistance from the Greek of the LXX.

The reading there is, "he brought me across the waters," and the word signifies, crossing a stream by fording it instead of crossing it by boat or bridge. At that point it was so shallow that it was only up to the ankles, but returning to the north bank and measuring another thousand cubits and crossing as before he finds the waters were up to the knees; another and they come up to the loins; a fourth and he could not get across. Our text says they were deep enough to swim in, but the Greek says he could not cross "because the water foamed like a spring torrent." But combining both statements, the stream had become both too deep and rapid to be forded and he returned to the north bank and gave his attention to the trees of life bearing twelve manner of fruits which the obedient nations are to enjoy and which will cure all diseases in that happy age.

If we count the cubit at the shortest or 18 inches long, 4000 cubits would be 6000 feet, or 720 feet more than an English mile. Now as the house stood on the level of the top of the mountain in the city of Jerusalem when restored, rebuilt and enlarged, and the stream did not break into a torrent until it had reached over a mile from its starting point, it is fair to suppose that the level place on the mountain top was above two miles in diameter. But this entire portion is by express command regarded as "most holy," Ezek. xlviii. 12, and if so will not be likely to be built up or used for ordinary residence or business purposes; but far more likely to be devoted to a magnificent park for the enjoyment and health of the inhabitants of the city and the annual visitors from all parts of the world to the great feast of tabernacles at Jerusalem. I am the more satisfied that this is so for that very reason, that ample room near or surrounding the temple will be a necessity to accommodate the vast multitudes of worshippers who will be present every year on that occasion. It must not be forgotten that the river we are describing divides after it issues from the temple and half flows west into the Mediterranean. But I must pause. The picture is too ravishing and the glory too great. May Jehovah soon "speak comfortably to Jerusalem."

J. F. WILCOX.

"WILL THERE BE PROBATION IN THE AGE TO COME."—No. 2.

Since writing my former article under the above caption, I have heard some objections made to the views there taken, as being unscriptural and untenable.

It is not to be wondered at so much, considering what has so long been palmed off as gospel upon the world, especially upon the aged. This doctrine is called by them a mystery—hard to be understood,—a great innovation on "the time honored," exposition of the self styled modern clergy, of the post-millennial type. If the present missionary enterprise or work, is to convert the world as it is claimed by most of our good friends, then we say, the kingdom age, and the work of "the kings and priests" is entirely superseded, yea, and the judgment also; for this age is the period or time of the Judgment—the time of retribution which will overtake the nations which will then contest Christ's reign. Nations include individuals, as the greater includes the less. Every individual will be arrayed for or against Christ's kingdom—or for or against the kingdoms of this world, when the final struggle for the supremacy shall come. The reader is referred, for proof of this, to the second, also to the one hundred and forty-ninth Psalm. Ezekiel also testifies to the same thing from the thirty-sixth to the thirty ninth chapters inclusive; also Daniel 11th chap. 44th vs., also vii. 27. In this latter he locates the kingdom under (not in or above) the whole heavens; modern theology locates it in the skies—in the human heart—a spiritual—intangible, as opposed to a real and tangible kingdom. Daniel's prophecy must be meaningless and goes for nothing, if there is no analogy between the kingdom of this world, or Gentile kingdoms, and the restored kingdom of Israel, (for such it will be) if no analogy exists between them, as to what constitutes a kingdom. Modern evangelists seem to wholly ignore the kingdom arrangement, the only thing the Bible recognizes for man's salvation. Every thing is predicated on the belief of the gospel, the province of which is, to unfold God's plan of salvation to the race through the kingdom arrangement, and through that only; if there is any other arrangement, it is not revealed in the written Word. Christ in his last commission to the apostles whom he had chosen said, Go ye therefore into all the world (habitable), and preach the gospel to every creature, he that believeth (this gospel) and is baptized, shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be damned (condemned). Mark xvi. 15, 16. It follows as a consequence, that the gospel cannot be rejected or ignored even, with impunity.

The great question, which is now under discussion, and which I think is pertinent, is, whether this will or can be accomplished prior to Christ's second advent, or the setting up of the kingdom? The whole question at issue then, turns on the solution of this question. In order to answer this question, it may be necessary to ask others, and first, for what purpose are kings and priests commissioned to do? Are not the former for the purpose of subduing the refractory? and the latter, are they not mediators between the offenders and the offended, for the purpose of reconciliation? Secondly, are the titles kings and priests, empty titles? having no appropriate work, as their titles indicate? Remember these classes lived and reigned, or will reign, with Christ a thousand years. Where? Answer: on the earth, (not in heaven). See Rev. v. 9-10. Again, for what purpose are the trees of life again to be instituted, the fruit for meat, and leaf for medicine, if they are already sound and healthy? See Ezek. xlvii. 12-13.

Christ said, They who are whole, need no physician, but they who are sick. If all this does not indicate probation or trial for the development of character, it would be exceedingly difficult to tell what it does mean; it would seem to be redundant on the hypothesis, that the saints, or those who had changed their allegiance from the fourth kingdom to the fifth, who had already become "like the angels who can die no more."

Those who will constitute the rulers, and be associated with Christ in his cabinet, will of course be duly qualified for the work assigned them, viz., to bind the kings of the earth with chains and the nobles with fetters of iron. See Psa. cxlix.

But kingdoms must have another element in them, viz. subjects; the analogy could not be complete without it. I showed in my former article, that the subjects must of necessity be mortals; marriage is recognized, births and deaths occur, which of course necessitates them to be mortals; hence they will be on probation or trial for immortality.

The institution of the Sabbath cycles, as Paul says, are shadows of things to come; (or types of man). The 1st is the seventh day Sabbath; the 2d was the seventh year Sabbath; and the 3d the 7 times 7, which is 49 years, then followed the jubilee or year of release.

To follow the analogy then, the great culmination or antitype must find its grand center or climax in the age to come, or its antitypical Sabbath. I think this is not a forced construction, but the legitimate deduction from the premises which Paul furnished. In all these typical cycles, the Sabbaths of each, were the ending, and not the beginning of their respective weeks: each formed an oasis, and lifted those who observed them to a higher plane. The apostle has well said, "There remaineth therefore a rest (or Sabbath, mar.) to the people of God." How fitting and appropriate, and withal, cheering to the way worn pilgrim, to reflect, that soon, (yes, I trust very soon,) he will find this oasis, from the six thousand years of toil in the enemies' land, when sin and death have held carnival so long.

Solomon, the wise man, has said, to every thing there is a season, and a time for every purpose under heaven. Eccl. iii. 1. This age to come will be "the times of the restitution, of which all of the holy prophets since the world (age) began, have borne witness." This age is also the set time for the reign of Christ with the immortal saints. "He must reign until he hath put all enemies under his feet, the last enemy that shall be destroyed is death, showing conclusively that death continues during this period, and there could be no such thing as death where sin does not exist; the time of this reign is limited by the adverb "until"; i. e., when all enemies are subdued. At the end of the thousand year period, "Christ will deliver up the kingdom to the Father, that God may be all in all." We can see then, that it will take the whole sabbatic part of this great week to "cleanse the sanctuary—make a full end of sin." The great theocracy will then be restored. This will be the grand culmination or consummation of what the kingdom of God's dear Son is to accomplish. The coming of Christ and the setting up of the kingdom are simultaneous events, or at least, the latter cannot precede the former; for proof see Paul's letter to Timothy iv. 1-2 verses. I charge thee before God and the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall judge the quick and the dead at his appearing and kingdom."

Preach the word, be instant in season, and out of season, etc. Why Paul? because the time will come when men will not endure "sound doctrine"—will be turned from the truth to fables. We would respectfully ask our post-millennium friends, if this state of things is not a true picture, a complete panorama, of what is now transpiring? and is it not a complete refutation of the "conversion of the world" previous to Christ's advent? also Christ's teaching, relative to the wickedness which will be ripe at this time? "like as it was in the days of Noah and of Lot?" This period will be the culmination of wickedness instead of "the conversion of the world." Up to date, nothing has been restored of which all the holy prophets have spoken since the world began has yet taken place. This age is the only time and place assigned by Jehovah for this accomplishment.

The parables which Christ used to illustrate the different phases of the kingdom, must, to possess any significance, find their counterpart in the future age, which will be of course the kingdom age—the restitution age—the glorious time when the curse shall cease—death, the great enemy of mankind will then be destroyed, and him who hath the power of death—the devil. The earth will then be restored to its Eden state—sin and sorrow will then cease. Nation will then no longer lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war anymore. Reader! I ask you, (irrespective of any religious sect or creed) if your faith does not take cognizance of these glorious promises? If so, then you have found good anchorage ground.

For a long time I have not written, but I assure you, however, that my interest is the true and faithful gospel, the theme you ever advocate. I am a weak sister, have but few gifts to speak of in a public way. When God called me into his vineyard I felt my weakness, but he had a work for me to do I asked him earnestly, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" It was early impressed on my mind that a Christian must be a missionary. I was born with this spirit. I wanted a work I could do. I needed not to go to foreign lands, for on every hand I saw heathen rising here and there; such a large field, so I have done, and am still doing, all I can. I find much of destitution, much of suffering. This is my field, I chose it because best adapted to it. Oh, I love it, and my heart is often made glad, as opportunity opens my way to stand by and soothe the pillow of encourage by presence, and work as the case requires. I feel I must be there, and if the sufferer is destitute or needy, or associated with any church, I feel to report their case, get food and medicine, see that comfort is extended them. Then see the opportunities a nurse and physician have to point to the Lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world? It is so necessary that a physician be a Christian indeed. It adds brightness to the jewels Christ makes up "when he cometh."

I am fond of finding out who are suffering, either in sickness or poverty. Religious creed is nowhere with me where there is suffering. I will rise any time at night, and go forth to assist. Pay is secondary with me. I cannot, dare not, nor will not, see them need what I can do. I will go at my own risk; no one is so poor off but can do something if only to offer a word of cheer or a cup of water, and a little sacrifice of ease or self.

I sorrow to find even professing Christians, when a case is mentioned (even in the case of a sick sister, when only a call was asked) groan out, "I am sorry, but I have no time: my home duties must be done." I sorrow for their poor starved souls. God bless them, and give them loving bread, and help them to an hours' time to digest it by sitting at the sick bedside, for I know some have many hours for a visit during this period, and there could be no such thing as death where sin does not exist; the time of this reign is limited by the adverb "until"; i. e., when all enemies are subdued. I wish to offer a few thoughts by way of friendly investigating an article written in THE RESTITUTION of May 23, under the caption of "The Rich Man and Lazarus—Was it a Parable?" Now knowing myself to be that ministerial brother alluded to in said article, I hope you will give room for a few thoughts, willingly submitting them to rigid criticism for truth's sake. I shall not undertake to add importance to my article by telling the public what construction some ministerial brother puts upon the subject. But to bring gospel light in contact with the proposed "key and line" by which we are invited to try the subject. The proposer of the line will please allow us first to try its strength, if strong enough to bear gospel light we shall accept it, if not we must try some other line.

Our friend admits this to be a parable and we shall notice the application. Now in this line we are told that the poor beggar represented the Gentile nations. Shall we understand that while he was destitute and in distress that this is pointing back to the old dispensation, and after his death and in Abraham's bosom he was now brought under the new and enjoying the gospel blessings? But a page is not all of a great book; so let us turn another leaf. Now the rich man while in his purple and fine linen faring sumptuously etc., must also be back under the old dispensation—he representing the Jewish nation, or, if you please to have it, the Priesthood. But he also died, and if the changing of position represents entering a new dispensation, the other must also. Now come, let us reason together. Now the rich man lifts his eyes in hell and in torment. Let us not dismiss the parable too soon, but tell us what the rich man now represents. I believe the line tells us that for eighteen centuries the Jews (rich man) has suffered cruel torment, being blinded, etc.

Not feeling willing to have a good story but half told we draw once more upon this line passing onward with the application of this noted Scripture, and we draw the line to Luke xvi. 26. Let the reader go to his Bible and carefully read this narrative the 26th verse included; now read RESTITUTION May 23, try the key and line by the parable in full, and what have you got? In this noted verse you have two improbabilities, to-wit, the crossing of the gulf by either party. Now does the key unlock the idea that the Jews (rich man) cannot be accepted though his eyes are opened and he calls for mercy? Abraham answering—"an impossibility for you to cross over into favor and fellowship with God even as this line." And he would continue, "Neither can the Gentiles (Lazarus) after once in my bosom pass over where you are into unbelief and sin." And indeed, further on, which side of the gulf are the unbelieving Gentiles today who may yet be gathered with Abraham?

Having now fairly connected this line with Luke xvi. 26, we shall now propose it to the opposers for acceptance or rejection. In this noted parable, according to this new line, Abraham tells the Jews that there is a great gulf (line or wall) between them and the power of God unto salvation. But the Jews in answer would say, no now lift our eyes in torment, now send a Gentile that he may administer to us that we may enjoy liberty and happiness with him. The answer of Abraham, "Under the old law you had your good things and this poor man was shut out, having no part in the enjoyments under the law; but now he enjoys the blessings of the perfect law but you cannot." Question, "Why can I not." Answer, "Because of your nationality." So says this key and line. Now let us try the key and unlock Acts xiv. 1. Here Paul and Barnabas meet with the rich man (Jews); what think ye to point them to Moses? Nay verily, but to preach the gospel as the power of God unto salvation to all that would believe. And here a great multitude of Jews and Greeks believed. And again on the day of Pentecost about three thousand not only believed but were added to the church, and I don't hesitate a moment to say that there were all Jews, and will further say that if at one time three thousand can get into Abraham's bosom, and at another time a great multitude, a nation could if willing as was the rich man, see Acts x. 34, 35. No gulf between the Jews and the gospel (Abraham). And we feel to lay this new key and line down as of inestimable in the extreme because Paul, Barnabas and Peter would not have indorsed it in their day, for they had heard the Master's instructions, to first go to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, perhaps the five brethren (ten tribes).

Obituary.

DIED—At Penetanguishene, Ont., Jas. Squire, aged 64 years.

Bro. Squire was born in Devonshire, England, brought up in the faith of the Church of England, came to Canada in 1845, in 1848 heard the tidings of the soon coming of Jesus, etc., and was immersed by the writer into the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins.

Bro. Squire was saturated with the truth of the glorious future, and the future restoration of Israel. He was deeply interested in the immigration of the Jews to Palestine. His desire to see the writer and have me preach his funeral sermon, induced me to withdraw my appointment and hasten to him. Found him alive and in sound mind, but suffering greatly. The next day he became delirious and remained so till death.

A discourse was delivered by the writer, predicated upon 1 Cor. xv. 26, to a large congregation. In his death a wife, son and three daughters have sustained an irreparable loss. In the evening the writer spoke in the Town Hall, on the purpose of God in the creation of the earth.

DIED—At Hesperia, Mich., Sister Mary Bush, aged 72 years.

Sister Bush, with her husband and family were among the earliest settlers of Hesperia, and she has, since 1843, been an ardent admirer and faithful worker in the gospel truths, believing firmly in Christ's second advent and earthly reign, the restitution of all things, and other beautiful and kindred truths.

In her first years after embracing the gospel she met with the most rigid opposition from those to whom the truth was like sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal, but never did the traitor or turn back. Onward, for the right was her motto, and long and faithfully has she worked in the vineyard, gathering, in her Christian walk, many stars for her crown of rejoicing in that glad day to which she looked forward with joyful anticipation.

For many months her life has been slowly but surely ebbing away, and friends have carefully and tenderly cared for her, soothing her pains with tender caress and loving words, down to her silent room.

On Wednesday, July 11, it was evident to all around her that she had not long to wait e'er her rest should come. She lingered until Saturday, July 14, when she fell asleep. Sunday following it was my sorrowful duty to speak the last words over her silent clay, using words for my text (chosen by her nearly four months before her death) from Psa. lii. 9, "It is good that a man should both hope and quietly wait for the salvation of the Lord." The Baptist Church, in which the services were held, could not accommodate near all who came to pay the last offices of love and respect to the departed. She leaves an aged husband and several children.

LINES COMPOSED ON MY FIFTIETH BIRTHDAY.

ANNE A. PERRY.

Another year has winged its rapid flight,
And I have seen just fifty years to-night;
Father, I take my pen, thy mercies to record
In sparing me so long, most gracious Lord.

While I recount the mercies of these years
I'm moved to deep contrition and to tears;
And now renew my covenant with my Lord,
And pray for strength to humbly keep thy word.

O, 'tis a mystery beyond compare!
That thou should'st with my many follies bear,
And hast not cut me off, a cumberer of the ground,
While judgements vast and dire are sweeping others down.

Accept my grateful thanks, O Lord, to-night,
For all thy mercies since I saw the light;
Thy watchful care I trace thro' all my days,
Keep me, I ask thy prayer, in wisdom's ways.

So journeying where the whole creation groans,
Its every side I hear the sighs and moans;
Thankful to raise to heal thy chast'nings sore,
And keep on rising ever more and more.

Each day confirms O Lord, thy word is true,
While men their downward course to death pursue,
Blinded by sin, and overcome by lust,
They will not fear thee, Lord, nor in thee trust.

My heart is sad while witnessing earth's life:
A pang of sorrow oft my bosom thrills;
Beholding sad ruin I'm powerless to relieve,
I turn away in sadness, and often o'er it grieve.

As swiftly turns around the wheels of time,
Many fill up their cup with shame and crime;
O, there are new indeed most fearful days!
Men will not choose, nor walk in wisdom's ways.

Fierce tyrants thirsting still for fame and power,
Are plotting to hasten on the judgment hour.
When will the vengeance come? I often cry,
Hasten, O Lord, and bring salvation nigh.

Earth trembles oft beneath the fearful shocks,
While man the great Creator's goodness mocks;
He pleads with them, by tempest, flood, and flame,
Still they refuse to reverence his name.

Keep me, O Heavenly Father, by thy mighty power,
Through all this perilous, this trying hour;
Suffer me not to fall, whatever me befide,
But still my journey seek my footsteps ever guide.

When Christ, our Life, shall come, may I awake,
In his own likeness, for thy mercies sake.
Redeemed from evil be forever blest,
And in his kingdom find Eternal Rest.

"I WILL SEND YOU ELIJAH."

Revelation distinctly teaches that there will be two prophets who, during the great tribulation, will stand up as powerful opponents to the antichrist; and since Scripture predicts that Elijah the prophet will perform a divine mission to the Jews prior to the "Day of the Lord," it is consistent to assume that Elijah will be one of the two witnesses of Rev. xi. The evidence that Elijah the Tishbite, the anciently translated prophet, will appear on earth prior to Christ's second advent is worthy of devout consideration; for to ignore this prophetic fact seems disrespectful to the veracity of him who has deigned to predict and predestinate it for the comfort of his people.

Malachi first declares the prophecy concerning Elijah: "Behold, I will send you Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord; and he shall turn the heart of the fathers to (with) the children, and the heart of the children to their fathers, lest I come and smite the earth with a curse."

Observe these declared facts: First, It is Elijah the prophet who is to come—not a substitute. God says he will send that anciently translated seer. Second, Elijah is to appear at a specified time—just before the day of the Lord. Third, Elijah comes as a reformer. He will turn or convert the heart of the fathers with the children. He discloses old and young to unknowledge Jesus as the Christ and brings about a restoration of true worship at Jerusalem. Fourth, One object of Elijah's mission is that by restoring the Jewish nation to the acceptable worship of Jehovah, he may thereby avert an otherwise impending curse (chorem—utter extinction) on the earth. Fifth, Elijah's mission will be crowned with success. "He shall turn the heart, etc." Israel will be reformed and the cherem will not be inflicted.

JOHN THE BAPTIST'S DENIAL.

A prophet appeared in the wilderness of Judea heralding the first advent of Christ, of whom it was predicted: "He shall go before him in the spirit and power of Elijah." When asked whom he is he claims only to be fulfilling the prophecy of Isa. xl. 3, saying, "I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness, Make straight the way of the Lord." The Baptist never quoted Mal. iv. 5, 6, and never claimed to be the Elijah of whom that prophecies.

The evangelist says, "This is the record of John, when the Jews sent priests and Levites from Jerusalem, to ask him, Who art thou? And he confessed and denied not; but confessed I am not the Christ. And they asked him, What then, art thou Elijah? And he saith, I am not. Art thou that prophet (i. e., the prophet to whom Malachi refers, momentarily placing its literality in abeyance) and he answered, no."

JOHN UTTERED NO FALSEHOOD.

Here is the direct contradiction from John's own lips to the prevalent opinion that he was the Elijah of whom Malachi prophecies: a prediction which must have been in the minds of the priests and Levites when they questioned him. He knew why they questioned him, and the legitimateness of the querries, and frankly made his reply. How could we dishonor that holy man by charging him with equivocation and mental reservation in his replies. He must have known it if he was fulfilling that prophecy; and since he so freely denies it to the Levites, we must, if we have any regard for his character, concede that he spake the truth, and was not that prophet Elijah.

The investigating committee of priests and Levites no doubt reported to the Sandhedrim the words of John that he was not that prophet nor Elijah; and because of their failure to recognize the two advents, they overlooked the first, and continued to expect the second, before which Elijah truly shall first come. The heads of the Jewish church were too blind to recognize John as the "Messenger" to precede Christ's first coming; and knowing only that advent before which Elijah should surely appear, and having the testimony of John that he was not Elijah, they thought they had sufficient reason for rejecting the claims of Jesus.

OUR LORD'S TESTIMONY.

Let us now consider the words of Jesus concerning his messenger John: This is he of whom it is written, "Behold I send my messenger before thy face, which shall prepare thy way before thee." Matt. xi. 10, (continuing the quotation of Mal. iii. 1, we read) "and the Lord whom ye seek shall suddenly come to his temple."

Thus we see that John is the messenger who was to precede the Messiah when he should suddenly come to his temple, as he did in those days; but this event is entirely distinct from the yet future notable "day of the Lord," prior to which Elijah the prophet will appear as a herald. Christ declares John to be the messenger, and Mark quotes this same text and also that of Isaiah xl. 3, and applies them to John in the introduction to his gospel; but not any inspired writer ever referred Mal. iv. 5, 6 to John—evidently because he was not that prophet Elijah.

CHRIST'S "IF" AND ITS LOGIC.

In speaking about John and the kingdom of heaven to the multitude he says: "If ye are willing to receive it (i. e., the kingdom) this (John) is Elijah which is to come." Math. xi. 14.

According to the prophecy the mission of Elijah was to be successful in disposing the people to acknowledge the Savior—they were to be converted and turned and prepared to willingly receive the kingdom of Christ. Read the fourth of Malachi. John the Baptist was now in prison and his mission accomplished. Had he done that which it is predicted Elijah should do? Had he converted Israel to a true acceptance of the kingdom and King? Christ puts the test of the matter right before the people whom he is addressing.

No, indeed. John had not accomplished the predicted mission of Elijah. Christ says in this very connection, "From the days of John the Baptist until now the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and men of violence take it by force." The nation had not been converted and made willing to receive the kingdom—therefore John would not have been Elijah, for he did not accomplish what that prophet will accomplish. That generation of Jews cried "Crucify him, crucify him."

The Diaglott renders the verse, "If you are disposed to receive it, he is that Elijah who is to come." They not having been disposed to receive the kingdom, necessitates the obstruction of the "if," and this "if" and the contrary negative fact that they had not been made willing to receive the king and kingdom of Christ, brings about the logical conclusion that John was not Elijah. This, then, agrees with John's truthful testimony. So far nothing convicts John of falsehood, or favors the popular error.

THE SCRIBES EXPECT ELIJAH FIRST.

But one more passage relates to the question—and will it be found to dispute what has already been established? Impossible! When coming down from the transfiguration mount, where they had seen Elijah and Moses, in a representation of the kingdom of God, the disciples, elated with the hope of its immediate establishment, ask our Savior, "Why then say the Scribes that Elijah must first come?"—that is, come before the kingdom is instituted. Matt. xvii. 10.

The Scribes correctly believed that Elijah must appear previous to the establishment of Messiah's kingdom, their mistake being that they failed to perceive two advents of Christ—the first in humiliation as a sin offering, the second in power to set up his reign—prior to the latter of which Elijah indeed must come. As they had learned from the truthful lips of the Baptist that he was not "that prophet" to which Malachi referred, having candidly denied being Elijah, the Scribes assigned as a just reason for rejecting Christ, that Elijah had not come; and to this argument, it seems, the disciples could not clearly reply, and therefore on this occasion, asked Christ about the matter,

"ELIJAH INDEED COMETH."

Replying, Jesus says, "Elijah indeed cometh, and shall restore all things." This declaration actually places Elijah's coming in the future, and is fully in harmony with Malachi and with John.

Our Savior here vindicates the truth of the words of the Scribes regarding a future appearance of Elijah based on the literal prophecy. He shows that the literal understanding of that prediction was the correct one. He endorses the expectation of the Scribes, saying, "Elijah indeed cometh." The force of the word "indeed" like the word "truly" in King James Version, has the lawful power of corroborating the Scribes' idea. It is equivalent to the phrase, "Elijah, they have truly said cometh." The A. V. reads "Elijah truly shall first come." As the literal prophet was the Elijah expected by the Scribes, and as Christ says that Elijah indeed cometh, and thus supports their expectation, it is conclusive that he must have here predicted the coming of the literal Elijah in harmony with Malachi. Thus far everything is harmonious, and proves that Elijah will come, and that John was not Elijah.

A PARODOX EXPLAINED.

The next verse brings us to a declaration which, if not in harmony with the position taken, must be a direct self contradiction, and also a denial of John's record, of the words of Malachi, and of the expectation of the Scribes. It is because of the paradoxical character of the words of Christ in this one passage, that so many stumble at the truth on this question, yet all obscurity may be dissipated by examining the passage with carefulness.

After making the statement justifying the Scribes on that point, by saying "Elijah truly shall first come and restore all things," our Lord continues, "But I say unto you that Elijah is come already, and they knew him not, but have done unto him whatsoever they listed; likewise shall also the Son of man suffer of them." Matthew adds, "Then the disciples understood that he spake unto them of John the Baptist."

In the same breath the Lord said, "Elijah shall come," and "Elijah is come." Apparently here is direct self-contradiction—but not really. Both of these statements are true; but it requires that we distinguish between the literal and the figurative use of the word "Elijah," as elaborated by the context, and as will harmonize with every other statement of Scripture. To obtain harmony in this passage it is necessary to recognize the fact that in one instance Christ uses the word Elijah literally while in the other case figuratively. If we were to make them both literal or even both figurative, we would alike be involved in contradiction; nor will it do to reject either statement.

A JUST DISCRIMINATION.

Which case is the literal. Undoubtedly the first—"Elijah indeed cometh." Because, 1. By this expression he verifies the Scribes expectation of a literal Elijah. 2. The words of Malachi demand a literal Elijah to fulfil them, and thus Christ would be in harmony with the prophet by the use of the literal. 3. Jesus in the first case could not have been speaking figuratively of John, since John's mission was already fulfilled, while he was predicting the still future coming of Elijah.

Christ's second statement that "Elijah has come already" cannot be taken literally, but must be understood figuratively as spoken of John the Baptist, because, 1. The literal Elijah had not come. 2. In the same sentence Christ had already said that the literal Elijah's coming was future. 3. John had confessed that he was not Elijah. 4. Jesus had declared that John was not literally Elijah, and had indicated before the multitude as a proper test of the question—by the preaching of John they had not been made willing to receive the kingdom, whereas by the predicted mission of Elijah they will be thoroughly converted; both young and old. 5. The disciples understood that he spake figuratively of John in the latter instance, and if he spake figuratively in the latter case he could not have been speaking figuratively in the former instance, for this would involve the coming of John the Baptist again—which of course is inadmissable for other reasons.

When the Savior was speaking of an Elijah yet to appear, and vindicated the belief of the Scribes who expect the coming of the literal Elijah, the disciples knew that he was talking about that person whom they had just recognized in the transfiguration scene, and whose personal appearance suggested the inquiry on their part; but when the Savior applied the term Elijah to a person who had recently come as a prophet and had been beheaded in prison, they immediately perceived that the style of his language had changed from the literal to the figurative, and that he was in the latter case referring to John.

It certainly was quite proper for the Savior to speak figuratively of John as Elijah, after he had declared that the ancient prophet by that name was yet literally to appear. The figurative intent was then quite apparent. But if the previous statement of the future coming of the literal Elijah had not been made, the latter statement then, permitting only a literal construction, would have directly denied the record of John, and involved some party in equivocation. How remarkably intrenched are the words of the Holy Writ, so that when thoroughly understood, no contradiction can exist.

Prior to the birth of John the Baptist the angel declared. "Many of the children of Israel shall he turn to the Lord their God; and he shall go before him in the spirit and power of Elijah." hence, in a figurative sense could John be called Elijah; when it is first conceded that he is not truly Elijah nor capable of fulfilling any predictions which involve the personal Elijah as in Mal. iv. 5, 6.

John was the forerunner of Christ at his first advent. Elijah bears the same relation to his second coming. John turns many into righteousness; Elijah converts the whole nation thoroughly. John precedes Christ's coming to his temple; Elijah precedes the second coming and ushering in of the day of the Lord.

MAL. IV. 5, 6 NEVER APPLIED TO JOHN.

We have referred to all the texts pertinent to this subject, and have failed to find a single passage where the Savior, John or anyone else claims that the Baptist fulfils the prophecy of the fourth of Malachi. Strange if he was that Elijah, that that special prophecy was never accepted by himself, nor applied to him by any one else; but the prophetic references to him are restricted to Isa. xl. 3; and Mal iii. 1. The Bible is positive on this point. It is not a matter of doubt or uncertainty to one who will accept evidence.

To recapitulate: Neither John nor his mission meet the demands of the fourth of Malachi. 1. John did not precede the day of the Lord, for that notable day is still future. 2. He did not convert the nation to the acceptance of Christ and his kingdom. 3. His failure on this point (were it incumbent on him) did not incur a cherem on the earth. 4. He never referred the Elijah prophecy to himself. 5. He unequivocally denied that he was that prophet. 6. Christ openly proved that John was not Elijah. 7. After John was imprisoned, Christ declared that "Elijah indeed comes, and will restore all things," thus proving that the prophecy of Malachi would be fulfilled after the termination of the Baptist's mission. 8. Jesus on one occasion figuratively referred to John as "Elijah" that he could not have been the person to fulfil the prophecy of Malachi—for the real Elijah must do that. 9. The prophecy demands, like all other prophecy that has been fulfilled, a literal accomplishment. 10. The Savior corroborated the literality of Malachi's prediction by approving the attitude of the Scribes who held it to be literal in its import.

ELIJAH AS A WITNESS.

With this array of Scripture evidence before us, we cannot but accept the harmonious position that the prophet Elijah will yet appear before the second coming of Christ, according to God's prediction.

To the Jews God sent a herald announcing the first advent of Christ, and Christ's second coming will not occur before the appointed herald, specially sent by God, shall proclaim the Messiah at hand. Elijah surely—as sure as the work of prophecy is sure—will be the herald preceding the soon-coming of our King.

As at first stated the Bible informs us of but two divinely sent prophets who will yet appear on the earth, and since it is certain that Elijah will come before our Lord appears there is the strongest kind of presumptive evidence that he will be one of the two witnesses. May the Lord hasten his coming, and speedily translate his church.

THE FOLLOWERS OF THE LAMB.

"Follow me!" was the first command spoken by the Master to the first chosen of his disciples, and that call across the Galilean sea has been echoed down through the ages, and heard and heeded by multitudes since the fishermen gladly forsook their nets and followed the Nazarene.

The words are simple, but full of import, for in them is contained the substance of Christian duty.

When the fishermen heard the voice of the Lord calling to them as they labored, they doubtless recognized him whom their great prophet John had pointed out as "The Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world," and hastily leaving their worldly goods they at once began to follow the Lamb. Doubtless they believed that they were being summoned to share in royal honors, for was not their Messiah to be a Mighty Prince; and so it was with feelings of great satisfaction that they attended him in his journeyings as he dispensed blessings in his train. It was honorable to be the attendants of the Great Physician as he healed the sick and cleansed the leper, spoke the words that thrilled the ears of the deaf with a new sensation, caused the dumb to shout the praises of God, and revealed the beauties of nature to the astonished gaze of the blind. With pride they trod the palm strewn pathway while the multitude shouted "Hosanna to the Son of David; Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord; Hosanna in the highest." This new life was much to be preferred over their former laborious and ignoble occupations.

But the path to be trodden by those who follow the Lamb is not always strewn with flowers, nor do they always hear the praises and acclamations of the throng. It was easy to follow in prosperity, and to share the honors; but in adversity, when the fickle mob changed the cry of "Hosanna!" to that of "Crucify him! Crucify him!" where then were the faithful attendants, and where was the boastful Peter who had so lately said, "Lord, I am willing to go with thee, both into prison and to death?" "They all forsook him and fled," and "Peter followed him afar off," and in the judgment hall, the finger of a maid pointed at him in scorn was sufficient to cause him to tremble with fear, and with curses to deny his Lord whom he had sworn to follow to prison and to death.

The first disciples, before their conversion, were but the prototypes of many earnest people to-day who are endeavoring to follow the Lord, trusting in their own strength. The prize of the high calling, the crown, the power, the glory, and the exceeding great and precious promises are continually before their eyes. They are inspired and dazzled with glory, and imagine that the way is all strewn with flowers and palm branches, and everybody is shouting Hosanna! "What shall we have therefore?" is the all important question, and it is only after severe trial and sifting as wheat by the adversary that they learn the frailty of their own natures, and can follow, saying, "Lo! I come to do thy will, O God."

Said the Savior, "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me." The first requirement of a follower is self denial. Self must step to the rear, and the Lord be given the first place, self is always selfish, and selfishness is the reverse of love, which "vaunteth not itself, and seeketh not her own." This hard lesson to learn for one so [illegible] and proud nature, and often [illegible] cross to teach us how [illegible] Jesus taught by example as well as precept, that humility must come before the exaltation, and the cross before the crown; and that it is he that overcometh who shall inherit all things. The blessings of God are free to his children, but it is not his purpose to deliver the heritage of this world to an undisciplined family who could neither appreciate their blessings nor carry out his eternal purposes intelligently. Therefore, "Whom the Lord loveth he disciplines" (Diag.). The Lord's commandments are not grievous; and his "yoke is easy, and his burden is light," when one has learned to deny self and say "Lord, not my will but thine be done." Then the disciples yields the peaceable fruits of righteousness: love, joy, peace, long suffering, gentleness; which are treasures of happiness an hundredfold richer than the nets and boats, houses and lands, or other earthly treasures that may have been discarded to follow the Great Shepherd.

Those who follow the Lamb in this age cannot attend his footsteps as did the early followers, but his beautiful example is as a bright and shining pathway for them to walk in; his deeds of love and kindness and his noble precepts, "who spoke as never man spake," mark out the road for his followers; and even though that path should lead through the valley of humiliation, or over the rocky heights of Golgotha, remember that, "If so be that we suffer with him, we may also be glorified together."

The great apostle to the Gentiles, who declared and proved himself to be a follower of Christ, at the end of his journey, said with the full assurance of faith, "I have finished my course, I have kept the faith: henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness." He had denied himself and borne his cross, and the crown for the overcomer was sure. He had tasted the heavenly gifts in his pilgrimage, and seen visions of the glorious hereafter which could not be described: and he yearned for that day pictured in the visions of John when those who are redeemed from among men, the first fruits unto God and the Lamb, are gathered together and there shall be one fold and one Shepherd, and of whom it will be said, "These are they that follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth." Whithersoever he goeth in the universe of God the bride of the Lamb shall attend him. Whithersoever he goeth in his mission of love and mercy, in blessing the families of the earth, she shall follow, and be his co-worker. whithersoever he goeth as King of kings and Lord of lords, his followers shall share his glory as they have shared his humiliations: for, "if we suffer, we shall also reign with him."

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

The Annual Assembly of the Church of God will, if the Lord will, convene at the House of the Brethren, in Winchester, Va., on Friday the 7th, before the second Sunday in September, and as it is to be a conference of committees, appointed by various churches in the East, in order to effect a more general union to work in the Lord's vineyard, all of the brethren in Christ, everywhere, who have not been conferred with, as well as all who have, are respectively invited, and all who cannot attend in person, are requested to represent themselves whether individually or collectively, by letter. H. V. Reed, J. W. Wilson, Samuel Wilson, and other able ministers of the Word, are expected to be in attendance. All coming by rail will be met at the Winchester depot, and conducted to the House of the Brethren where they will be cared for as long as it may suit them to stay.

INTENDED.

The Arkansas State Christian Conference will hold its next annual session with the Palarm church, 6 miles east of Conway Station, on the Little Rock and Ft. Smith Railway, to convene on Thursday night before the third Sunday in September, instead of August, as formerly announced. By order of the Executive Board,

N. B. ETHERIDGE, Sec.

To the Friends of "The Restitution."

The cost of publishing THE RESTITUTION for the year just closed exceeded the receipts over $300. To repay this deficiency and secure means to publish the paper another year, we must raise outside the regular subscription at least $500. To secure that amount, the Board of Directors have requested me to appeal to each subscriber to contribute at least one dollar extra. This is not asked as a donation, but brethren are requested to send names of persons to whom they wish the paper sent, with their contributions and the paper will be sent to such persons in payment for the amounts sent by each.

There are a large number of brethren and sisters in different localities who are unable to pay for the paper, and who would be very glad of the privilege of reading it. These are known to Brother Chaplin, the Editor. I would suggest that brethren who have no one to whom they specially desire to send the paper, send their contributions to THE RESTITUTION office with a request that the paper be sent to some worthy Christian who will appreciate it, but who is unable to pay for it. In this way brethren will be able to gladden the hearts of many poor but honest good Christians, and at the same time help to furnish the means to keep the paper going.

The fund will be known as "Free Will Offerings." Let each reader of THE RESTITUTION make a small sacrifice, and contribute at least one dollar, always remembering that the many persons to whom the paper will be thus sent will thank and bless you, and your Heavenly Father will reward you.

H. S. DWIGGINS, President.

The Restitution.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXII. Read x PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, AUGUST 8, 1883. NO. 30.

THE RESTITUTION.

TERMS—TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR, Payable in advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.

Address all Letters and Communications to THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the literal "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty relief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

BRITISH PHASE OF THE EASTERN QUESTION.—No. 30.

Read Ezek. xxxvii. 15-28.—The lot's of all we Gave written and shall write relate to be a part of the Eastern Question—Symbol, two sticks, with small [illegible] Stick of Judah never lost—Saved among all nations and everywhere—Leave by his own [illegible]—Stick of Ephraim with its clans lost—Two sticks examined but thrown aside as not suited to the divine specifications. British stick has been called the stick of Ephraim—Identified with another name.

In commencing this number we shall direct your eye to Ezek. xxxvii. 16-28. It reads as follows: "Moreover, thou son of man, take thee one stick and write upon it, for Judah and for the children of Israel his companions; then take another stick, and write upon it, for Joseph, the stick of Ephraim and (for) all the house of Israel his companions; vs. 17, and join them one to another into one stick; and they shall become one in thy hands, vs. 18. And when the children of thy people shall speak unto thee, saying, Will thou not show us what thou meanest by these? vs. 19. Say unto them, Thus saith the Lord God: Behold I will take the stick of Joseph which [is] in the hand of Ephraim, and the tribes of Israel his fellows, and will put them with him, (even) with the stick of Judah, and make them one stick, and they shall be one in mine hand. Vs. 20, And the sticks whereon thou writest shall be in thine hand before their eyes. Vs. 21, And say unto them, thus saith the Lord God: Behold, I will take the children of Israel from among the heathen, whither they be gone, and will gather them on every side, and bring them into their own land. Vs. 22, And I will make them one nation in the land upon the mountains of Israel; and one king shall be king to them all; and they shall be no more two nations, neither shall they be divided into two kingdoms any more at all. Vs. 23, Neither shall they defile themselves any more with their idols, nor with their detestable things, nor with any of their transgressions; but I will save them out of all their dwelling places, wherein they have sinned, and will cleanse them: so they shall be my people and I will be their God. Vs. 24, And David my servant (shall) be king over them; and they shall have one shepherd; they shall also walk in my judgments, and observe my statutes, and do them. Vs. 25, And they shall dwell in the land that I have given unto Jacob my servant, wherein your fathers have dwelt; and they shall dwell therein (even) they, and their children, and their children's children for ever; and my servant David (shall) be their prince for ever. Vs. 26, Moreover, I will make a covenant of peace with them; it shall be an everlasting covenant with them; and I will place them, and multiply them, and will set my sanctuary in the midst of them forevermore. Vs. 27, My tabernacle also shall be with them; yea, I will be their God, and they shall be my people. Vs. 28, And the heathen shall know that I the Lord do sanctify Israel, when my sanctuary shall be in the midst of them forevermore."

We shall examine 1. What Ezekiel is commanded to do; 2. What God promises to do; the symbols and the things symbolized. The first living stick with its little shoots symbolizes Judah, with the children of Israel his companions; the second stick, with its scions, symbolizes the house of Joseph or Ephraim, and all the house of Israel his companions. Ezekiel was ordered to make one stick of the two. The union of the sticks symbolizes the union of Judah and Ephraim with their companions of the other tribes. In that stick we have Judah and Israel joined into one nation, forming under David or his son Messiah, the twelve tribed kingdom. The overturnings have continued till 1883, and will continue till God gives it to him whose right it is. One nation on the mountains of Israel with one king. [illegible] union with its continuous and endless [illegible] Judah and Ephraim stand for the two tribes and the ten tribes. Their union forms the kingdom of David or of Messiah his son. That kingdom cannot, therefore, exist till the union of Ephraim and Judah shall be consummated; the stone kingdom, which, after its organization is to break in pieces the monarchies of the earth and stand forever.

The great future Ezekiel has outlined in the persons of Ephraim and Judah. The whereabout of Judah is well known as Judah was dispersed but not lost. Where, then, is Ephraim? If the British Empire, the question is satisfactorily answered, since no other nation can fill the conditions of the prophecies. Let us now see if that empire will answer all prophetic claims.

Mr. Edward Hine has enumerated some 77 specifications sustained by over 500 Scripture proofs. We shall name these specifications which will develop the leading features of the identification of British Israel; such only as will be clearly seen and generally acknowledged.

1. The historical chain in proof of identity has been fully presented; Israel went into the same grave out of which the Saxons came. They went down Israel and came up Saxon. We have observed the change and shown how the change was made. This chain has been traced link by link and all the phenomena explained.

2. Israel was to become an island people. (See Isa. xli. 1; xlii. 4; xlix. 1, 18; Jer. xxxi. 10). 3. In the N. W. Isa. xxiv. 15; lix. 19; Jer. iii. 18; xxiii. 8; Isa. xliii. 5. These will show that they return from the direction of the first colonies, the same country to which Israel or the Saxons emigrated.

4. Israel should, in her new home, be called by a new name. Ephraim or Israel is no where known by those names. See Isa. lxv. 15; Hos. i. 9; ii. 6; Isa. lxiii. 17; Rom. xi. 25. She was not to be known by the name "Ammi" my people, but Loammi, not my people.

5. Was to use another language. Isa. xxviii. 11. With about 800 Hebrew words in it, they use the English or Anglo-Saxon language. Had they continued the use of the Hebrew language they would not have been lost. What other people have in this manner changed their language?

6. The land or islands were to become too small. Gen. xv. 3-6; xiii. 16; xxxv. 11; xlviii. 16, 19. Great Britain during the last 300 years, has sent out 60 colonies—swarmed 60 times. This suits the prediction concerning Joseph's house, but will not apply to any other national household. The British island contains about 89,600 square miles; and yet by colonization and conquest Great Britain is expanded into an empire of 60 colonies, or nations, with 8,000,000 square miles and a population of 235,000,000. China alone having a more numerous population.

The question of identity might here rest, since no other nation on the globe can fill the predictions concerning Joseph and his sons Ephraim and Manasseh, as given by Jacob, Gen. xlviii. 16-19, except Great Britain. With Jacob's prophetic utterances before you, please trace Ephraim from the time of Jacob's blessing to the captivity, and Great Britain, for the last few centuries, with the fact in mind that the stick (nation) of Ephraim-Israel must be somewhere on the globe under some other name, and you will find it exceedingly difficult not to admit the identity of Anglo-Israel. That Ephraim with all the house of Israel his companions, has no national existence is to deny the truth of the most sacred predictions. This we say, Ephraim is some where, a company of nations having another name. But the British empire is composed of a company of nations, the only island nation of that character. Therefore the British empire is, at least very probably that empire. Before we name any other identifications we desire to call attention again to the symbolic stick of Joseph in the hand of Ephraim, with the tribes of Israel his fellows. There are two sticks, Ephraim must have a national being or the other tribes would not be spoken of as companions. And as Jacob's future history of Ephraim declares that he shall become a multitude of nations. Ephraim's native glory is fully established, and, as there is no other nationality except the Anglo Saxons, that fills the conditions of the prophecies concerning Ephraim, we say again that Great Britain is the stick of Joseph in the hand of Ephraim, with all the house of Israel his companions.

In further notice of the two sticks and their union (Ezek. xxxvii. 15-28). The symbols are fully interpreted, but the interpretation of a symbol is always literal. This symbol concerns literal nations, and has nothing to do with churches. Spiritual Israel (if there is such) has nothing to do with this prediction. Ephraim and Judah are now two distinct people. God intends their union, that they may, through endless ages, be one people.

DENVER, Ind., July 24, '83.

To the loved ones scattered abroad Greeting:

At the close of our regular monthly meeting in Brother Foore's neighborhood, the fourth Sunday in July, the writer had the pleasure of immersing two into the saving name of the Anointed One. The scene at the baptism of the pleasant waters of Millark brought back some pleasant associations. How often in company with Brothers Shaffer, Foore, Barchill, Corbaly and others has the writer heard the sweet strains of music wafted over the still water, and the earnest tones of supplication for God's blessing upon the acts there solemnly performed. That place is to me almost sacred. There after the truth of God had entered my darkened understanding I was buried in the watery tomb as was also my dear wife, rising to walk in newness of life. And others pass in review, some of whom have died in faith, and some, alas! have fallen by the way, turned aside, and lost "the crown" the bright kingdom just before them! In the rough journey of life how like a sweet oasis in the desert is a place and baptismal scene! It helps us to renew our sacred vows made to God years since. Loved ones we need every sweet influence that accompanies the truth to bind us closer to him who has loved us and gave his life a ransom for us. Others it is hoped will soon yield obedience. May the grace of God be with all who love our Lord. Amen.

ORIENTAL SKETCHES.—Second Series. Number 22.

GATH.

One object of my tour in Philistia was to discover, if possible, the long lost site of Gath. Since the days of Jerome it has been unknown; and even the wonderful geographical skill of Robinson was unable to trace it out. I need not here detail those incidental allusions and topographical notices of the sacred writers, and those accurate measurements and references of Eusebius and Jerome, which serve to indicate the district in which it must have stood. It is enough to say that I was satisfied they all pointed to some place on the route we were now pursuing. It was, therefore, with an interest approaching to excitement we surveyed the position and examined the remains of every village and ruin we passed. But from the moment we gained the crest of the first ridge north of Beit Jibrin, there was one prominent object away before us which attracted our chief attention—a bare, white, conical hill, standing on the very edge of the great plain, and yet rising high enough to command all the rocky spurs up to the very base of the mountains. As valley after valley was passed, it became more and more conspicuous. At length we reached it, and rode over rubbish heaps and terraced vineyards to its summit. The hill rises about one hundred feet above the ridge that joins it on the east, and some two hundred over the level plain that sweeps its western base. It is crowned with the foundations of an old castle, and round its sides are numerous remains of ancient buildings. The view from it is most extensive. The whole plain of Philistia was spread out before us, variegated with fields of yellow corn, and red fallow land, and long reaches of grey wastes. Away on the south-western horizon the white downs of Gaza and Ascalon mingle with the glittering waters of the Mediterranean. On the west we could see the little hill of Ashdod dark with olive groves: further to the right Ekron; and further still the white tower of Ramleh. Two mountains of Judah rise up on the east in dark frowning masses; every peak crowned with village or ruin, whose name carries us away thousands of years back.

The modern name of this hill, Tell es-Safieh, gives no clue to its ancient name. The Crusaders built a castle on it in the twelfth century, and called it Blanche garde; and the surrounding country became the scene of some of the daring adventures of Richard Cœur-de-lion. This hill if fortified—as it evidently was from the earliest ages—would be the key of the Philistine plain on the East. Watchmen from its summit could see every hostile band that would attempt to break forth from the mountain defiles. The warlike Philistines would never have overlooked a position so commanding, and naturally so strong; one so well fitted, also, for defending those vast corn-fields in which lay their wealth and their power. From the moment I set my foot upon Tell es-Safieh, I felt convinced that it is the site of the royal city of Gath.

What a life-like vividness did this discovery throw on some of the most romantic incidents of early Jewish history! The gigantic Anakim were annihilated by Joshua throughout the whole land; "Only in Gaza, and Gath, and in Ashdod," those impregnable fortresses they remained. Josh xi. 22. And from this place Goliath—one of the last of the giant race—marched out in his panoply of mail, the acknowledged champion of the Philistines, to threaten and defy the Israelites in the neighboring "valley of Elah," which we shall visit ere long. (1 Sam. xvii.) And then, a few years later, David came, a homeless refugee. When required he feigned himself mad, and easily escaped into those thickets that cover the hills around. I had often wondered why David should have fled to Gath; and why, having at length propitiated the Philistine lords, he should have made it his home. Now, on the spot, I saw the reason. Here he was perfectly secure from Saul. He was on the very border of his kingdom, besides within a few hours' march of his native Bethlehem; thus able to keep up an interrupted communication with his friends through those mountain passes, and ready at a moment's notice to take advantage of any turn of events that might seem to favor his ambitious designs.

Descending through the terraced vineyards that cover the whole slopes of Tell es-Safieh, we were struck with the appropriateness of the old name Gath, "wine-press," for such a site. Even yet. An hour's hard ride up a green vale, fragrant with thyme, and spangled with wild flowers, brought us into the lower part of the "Valley of Elah." Before us, on the crest of a rocky ridge, was Jarmuth. On our right rose the ruin-crowned tell of Zachariah, doubtless the site of ancient Azekah. Here then we were close to the place where Joshua captured and hanged the five kings, (Josh. x). After the defeat of Oiberon, and the rout of Beth-horon, the fugitives ran along the borders of the plain "to Azekah and Makkedah." Hotly pursued, they seem to have made for Jarmuth. They had got so far up the valley of Elah; but now, wearied and way-worn, they were unable to attempt the steep ascent; and seeing the foe close behind they hid themselves "in a cave at Makkedah;" one of those caves with which the whole region abounds. Their fate is well known. About a mile above this spot, on the right side of the valley, is a ruin called El-Kiddah, answering to the position, and bearing some resemblance to the name of Makkedah. Two hours more over rugged hills brought us to

BETH-SHEMESH.

Beth-shemesh. "The House of the Sun," does not contain a single house now; heaps of ruins strewn over a broad ridge, and half concealed by thistles and poppies, and bright marigolds, mark the site of the old city. In modern times its name has been somehow changed to Ain-esh-Shems. "The Fountain of the Sun," and yet, strange to say, there is no fountain here either. But the situation is a noble one. A broad rich vale runs down on each side of the swelling ridge meeting in front, and then opening a mile or two beyond into the great plain.

We had around us at Beth-shemesh the native country of Samson, and from its ruins we could see the scenes of some of the leading events of his strange life. Beyond the fertile valley on the north rises a steep hill, crowned with a Moslem welly, and a small village—that is Zorah, the home of Manoah, and Samson's birth-place (Judges xiii. 2). It overlooks the whole Philistine plain, and most of the border land. Samson must thus have been familiar with the power and the tyranny of the Philistines. Many a band of them, doubtless, did he see marching up the glen beneath his father's house, and returning again laden with spoils of his brethren. Many an act of rapine and cruel outrage, and barbarous murder, had left on impress deep and lasting on his mind, stirring him in after years to revenge. Some two miles west of Beth-shemesh, on the borders of the plain, is Timnath, where Samson got his first wife (xiv. 1). It was in "going down" from the heights of Zorah to Timnath—somewhere along the rugged banks of that intervening valley—that he killed the young lion. That valley itself, now called Sorar, is most probable the "Valley of Sorek," where the infamous Delilah dwelt (xvi. 4). It was among these hills, and the recesses of those rugged mountains eastward, that he caught the "three hundred jackals" (such appears to be the true meaning of the Hebrew word), and tying them tail to tail, with torches between them, let them go at harvest time among the standing corn of the Philistines. What havoc they must have made as they sped from field to field, from vineyard to olive grove! And with what wild delight must Samson have viewed from the heights of Zorah, the streams of fire sweeping onward and outward in every direction, and the conflagration spreading from stream to stream, until the whole plain was one sheet of flame! Poor Samson was betrayed at last:—

"Are for this great deliverer now, and read
His Riches in Gaza, at the mill with slaves,
Himself in bonds under Philistian yoke."

Fatal bondage in the Philistine lords! Savage cruelty theirs, but to be returned ten-fold on their own devoted heads! Thus does Milton describe the last act of Samson's life:—

"Oh, dearly bought revenge, yet glorious!
Living or dying thou hast fully fed
The work for which thou wast foretold
To Israel, and now liest victorious
Among thy slain self-killed;
Not willingly, but tangled in the fold
Of dire necessity, whose law in death conjoined
Thee with thy slaughtered foes in number more
Than all thy life had slain before."

Samson's mangled body was brought up from Gaza by his brethren, and buried on his native hill, "between Zorah and Eshtaol" (xvi. 31).

We lingered long among the ruins of Beth-shemesh, reading and pondering these and other incidents of sacred history, which the places round us naturally suggested. The sun went down into the waters of the Mediterranean in a halo of glory. The purple shadows of the wild glens gradually waxed deeper and darker; and the jagged outline of hills and mountains was drawn in bold relief upon the blue sky. The bright stars came out one by one. Still we lingered, reluctant to turn away forever from a spot so strangely interesting. A long, low, plaintive wail suddenly broke the deep silence of the mountains over us. Another, like an echo, answered it from the valley. Then another, and another, louder, and clearer; and nearer, until mountain, glen, and distant plain resounded with a ceaseless howl of jackals. They seem to be as numerous yet as they were in Samson's days.

At length Selim urged us to mount, reminding us that Beit Nettif was still far distant, and that the road over the mountains was both difficult and dangerous. For the danger we cared not; experience had long ago taught us that brigands never infest the mountain roads by night. But we had only ridden a very short distance when we found that the path, if path there ever had been from Beth-shemesh to Beit Nettif, was hopelessly lost. Our situation was anything but pleasant. There was no village within miles of us. We might of a bivouac; but our poor horses had eaten nothing since the morning, and there was neither food nor water for them here. On we pressed, therefore, over rock and bank, through thicket and torrent-bed, guided in our course by the stars, and trusting to the sagacity of our horses for the rest. For nearly three weary hours we rode on, gradually ascending, and then reached the top of a rugged ridge, and saw lights moving about before us. We fired a shot, and it was immediately answered. A shout from Selim was replied to by our muleteers and servants, who had come in search of us. My readers may well suppose that having been more than thirteen hours in the saddle we were ready for dinner and bed on reaching our tents.

THE VALLEY OF ELAH.

The morning sun had already bathed in ruddy light the mountain tops round Beit Netiff, and thrown their shadows far out across Philistia's plain, when mounting our horses we began the steep descent, through the terraced vineyards and olive groves, to "the Valley of Elah." A long reach of the valley lay at our feet. It is about a quarter of a mile wide, with rich alluvial bottom, and sides rising steeply but not precipitously, to the height of five hundred feet or more. Through the center winds a torrent-bed, now dry, but thickly covered with smooth white stones, and fringed with shrubs. On reaching the valley we turned to the right and rode about a mile down it through corn-fields. Then we saw on the left bank above us the grey ruins of Shocah, and we knew that we now stood on the battle-field of David and Goliath. "The Philistines gathered together their armies to battle, and were gathered together at Shocoh. . . And Saul and the men of Israel were gathered together, and pitched by the Valley of Elah, and set the battle in array against the Philistines." And the Philistines stood on a mountain on the one side, and Israel stood on a mountain on the other side; and there was a valley between them." 1 Sam. xvii. 1, et seq. We saw the positions of the two armies at a single glance. The Philistines were ranged along the side of the ridge at Shocoh, and the Israelites occupied the declivity opposite. Between them lay the valley,—then called Elah, from its "terebinth" trees; and now Sumpt, from its "acacias." Down that left bank came Goliath, his brazen armor glittering in the sunbeams; down the opposite bank came David with his sling and staff. Reaching the torrent-bed he selected "five smooth stones," and put them in his scrip. "Am I a dog," cried the haughty Philistine, looking at David's boyish face and simple equipments, "that thou comest to me with staves?" "I come to thee," replied the youth, "in the name of the Lord of Hosts, the God of Israel, whom thou hast defied." The stone was fixed; the sling was whirled round by a skilful hand; with a sharp twang the missile flew and pierced the brain of the impious giant. His own sword did the rest. According to the custom of the time, David took the head and the spoils of his foe, and carried them back to his comrades. The Philistines fled in confusion; and the Israelites raising a shout of triumph, hurried away in pursuit.

I too went down into that torrent-bed, as near as I could judge to the spot where David "chose the five smooth stones," and I brought away a "smooth stone," which I still retain as a memorial of the battle-field, and of the happiest days of my life. Then turning from the Valley of Elah, and from border land, I struck up the rugged path that leads over the mountains to Hebron; and thus ended my ride through the land of the Philistines. That ride, with another along a different route made at a later period, gave me a clearer understanding of some of the most interesting episodes in Scripture history, than I could ever have obtained otherwise. The early intercourse of the patriarchs with the Philistine lords, the campaign of Joshua, the romantic story of Samson, and the brilliant victory of David, became when read on the scenes of action, glowing life-pictures. Nowhere else in all my wanderings through Bible lands did the harmony between the land and the Book appear more striking, more perfect, than in the plain of Philistia.—J. L. Porter, L. M.

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, Aug. 8, 1883.

ARTICLES multiply on our hands. We will give them as fast as we can and keep up a variety. Another letter from Jerusalem next week.

NUMBERS 8 and 9 of the "Biblical Expositor and People's Commentary" have come to hand. This is a serial published in Toronto, and devoted to the History of Hebrew Literature.

OUR American grain-dealers would be glad to buy car-loads of such wheat as the sample sent us from Jerusalem by Bro. Winterstein, and which was grown in the Jordan valley this current year. God's promise to Israel restored is: "And the floors shall be full of wheat." Joel ii. 24.

QUITE a number of our friends and acquaintances are intending to take the excursion trip to Niagara Falls and the East next Monday over the Nickel Plate railroad. It gives those that come West from New York state a most favorable opportunity to revisit scenes of early days. As we have been furnished with a pass to Buffalo from Argos and return, we may make one of the number of excursionists, if circumstances should not compel us to delay to a later date.

SEVERAL numbers of "The Anti-Infidel Library," edited and published by H. L. Hastings, are among periodicals lately received. This is issued in the manner of a monthly to circulate, as other periodicals, in the mails. The Inspiration of the Bible, Egypt in History and Prophecy, and The Testimony of Christ to the Truth of the Old Testament, are some of the numbers received, and which do special credit to the authors.

L'AMI D'ISRAEL for April, 1883, is received. It is a quarterly published in the French language—"devoted to intelligence concerning Israel in our days and to news relative to evangelization in their midst"—or "Consacre aux renseignements sur l'Israel de nous jours et aux nouvells a l'evangelisation au milieu de lui"—as expressed in the language of the serial. Though our knowledge of the French is very limited we perceive that this is an interesting number, and we shall try to find the articles when we have time to work them out as a student's exercise. We think the sender is Dr. E. Petavel, who has our thanks.

THE following is from the Chicago Tribune of August 6. If authentic it ranks as one of the most important literary discoveries of these times. This will be especially the case when we take into account that the oldest Hebrew manuscript known is supposed to be one brought several years ago from Derbend in Daghestan consisting of an unpointed Pentateuch Roll, which is supposed to have been written a little before the year A. D. 580.

DISCOVERY OF A NEW BOOK OF DEUTERONOMY.

LONDON, Aug. 3.—[Special Cable.] A Mr. Shapira, of Jerusalem, bookseller and dealer in antiquities has just deposited in the British Museum fifteen slips of black sheepskin leather, on which are written in characters similar to those on the celebrated Moabite stone, portions of the Book of Deuteronomy, differing materially from the received version. The date of the slips is the ninth century before Christ, or sixteen centuries older than any authentic manuscript of any part of the Old Testament. Mr. Shapira bought them from an Arab, and he asks for them $5,000,000 from the British Museum. If genuine, the interest and importance of the discovery cannot be overrated; and, so far as variations in the sacred text are concerned, there is promise of one of the greatest controversies that scholars have ever entered upon. The decalogue furnishes a good example for comparison with the received version. I quote from the Shapira record:

I am God. Thy God which liberated thee from the land of Egypt, from the house of bondage. Ye shall have no other gods. Ye shall not make to yourselves any graven image, nor any likeness that is in heaven above, or that is in earth beneath, or that is in the waters under the earth. Ye shall not bow down to them nor serve them. I am God. Your God sanctify. In six days I have made the heaven and the earth and all that there is therein, and rested on the seventh day. Therefore rest thou also, thou and thy cattle, and all that thou hast. I am God, thy God. Honor thy father and thy mother. I am God, thy God. Thou shalt not kill the person of thy brother. I am God, thy God. Thou shalt not commit adultery with the wife of thy neighbor. I am God, thy God. Thou shalt not steal the property of thy brother. I am God, thy God. Thou shalt not swear by my name falsely, for I visit the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of those who take my name in vain. I am God, thy God. Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy brother. I am God, thy God. Thou shalt not covet his wife, or his man-servant, or his maid-servant, or anything that is his. I am God, thy God. Thou shalt not hate thy brother in thy heart. I am God, thy God. These ten words God spake.

DR. Guisburg, the eminent Semitic scholar to whom Gladstone has just given £50 toward the production of his work on the Massorah, has deciphered the above and is busy completing the translation.

GENESIS THE THIRD: HISTORY NOT FABLE—Lecture IV—Part 2.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF THE HEBREWS ON GOOD AND EVIL, COMPARED WITH ASIATIC DUALISM.

It is this idea of the Infinite as one living eternal personality which has bound the Jewish race together by the sublimest of spiritual ties from first to last. They were monotheists when Egypt, in the times of Amenophis and Ashmes, were bowing down before a Pantheon of gods and goddesses—symbolized by oxen, by beetles, and by hooded cobras—in a superstition redeemed from contempt by the single sublime legend of Osiris. They were then monotheists, believing and declaring the unity of God, as Lord of universal nature, the God of heavenly forces and of man's conscience—the Eternal God, in whose sight evil is but a transitory incident, the outcome of the creature's free will; one God, the everlasting antagonist of moral evil, destined speedily to be vanquished as the serpent beneath the heel of humanity. Yes, when all Asia held evil to be inscrutable and eternal and divine, the race of Abraham held that evil was "but for a moment," and that God's goodness and justice alone were eternal; and they stuck unto this testimony age after age, without varying, the witnesses alone and unconquerable in antiquity to the sole sovereignty and eternity of God. And it is they who have taught this lesson to the nations of the modern world. If we, the gloomy dwellers in these half-lighted lands of the North, are not still agonizing in the terrific folds of an evil Power who is a match for all goodness, and the destined tormentor of the universe forever, we owe it to Abraham and his sons, and to those precious books which have held their own race together through all their wanderings.

Under these references in thought, it becomes doubly interesting to note the phrases in which Christ and his apostles describe the relations of the good and evil powers. The New Testament affirms, as we have seen in the first lecture, in every form the historical truth of the Genesis narrative. In the Gospels, Christ's Messianic life begins with a temptation by a personal devil. In Christ's teaching, Satan is a real personality, he is a mighty king, and, in a lower sense, lord of this world. He claims all political sovereignty as his gift. He is "the prince" or ruler "of the world." But his origin is in measurable time, and his history is that of a murderous apostate who once dwelt in the light, but "standeth not in the truth." His destiny, too, is eternal damnation and destruction. So in St. Paul's writings, there is a "kingdom of darkness" and a "course of this world," from which Christians are delivered. There is even a "god of this world" and a "prince of the aerial powers;" there are evil "principedoms in the heavenlies," but here, again, evil is a recent evolution—the work of unreason, of will that prefers government by passion to government by Divine law. And its end is destruction. St. John adds, "The Kosmos passeth away and its passion, but he that doeth the will of God abideth forever."

It is but faintly we can imagine how the world of mankind breathed more freely when these glorious truths were first heard in Asia, crushed down under the dark ancestral belief in an eternal reign of evil, and beneath the stupefying fatalism to which it inevitably rode. When, then, Christ was made known as the messenger of the one eternal power of good, warring against an evil power which was not divine, and was not eternal. He was gladly listened to by Europeans and Asiatics, who had been confounded between the rival theories of dualism and atheism. His words to such were full of meaning and promise. "The water that I shall give him shall be within him a fountain of water springing up to everlasting life." Early of all supernatural devotion. We suspect and the Son of the Virgin Mother, to a speedy victory. THE Eastern Asia as it [illegible] Europe [illegible] the world [illegible] which all of these

But when Christianity was corrupted from its original simplicity, brightness and power; when it ceased to speak in the tone in which the angels of Bethlehem sang of "glad tidings" to all nations; when it turned aside from its once joyful "wisdom" to absorb in the east the gloomy philosophies of Asia; when it first dallied with the dualistic gnostics, the magians of the Apostolic age; next with the Persian Manichæism, so called after a philosophic Magian painter, who brought the old accursed lie from Persia into Bulgaria, and incorporated it with Christianity; and when, finally, in the purer form of the theology of Augustine, who was but half delivered from his preceding Manichæism, it represented God as if, in one essence, He combined eternal good and eternal evil, so that it was possible, under this reign, according to the pious bishop of Hippo, even for infants dying unbaptised to be consigned to eternal damnation; then Christianity ceased to possess the joyful power needful for the conquest of heathanism, specially of Asiatic heathenism in the East, and it fell a prey to Islam in the West." It gradually became, under the influences of priestly celibacy, a power of darkness and terror, until at length the modern intellectual world of Europe is largely revolting from its sway. The true remedy for the two intellectual spectacles, which have divided the world between them in all ages, is a return to the historical and joyful religion of the Bible, revealing a God under whose government freedom is a fact, involving the possibility of moral evil and its tremendous consequences, but under whose reign the exaltation of Evil into an eternal and victorious power is absolutely and forever impossible. "The Lord sitteth above the waterfloods. The Lord sitteth King forever." "And to the Son He saith, Sit Thou at My right hand until I make Thy foes Thy footstool." "The Seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head."

We are now in a position to appreciate more correctly the contention of those who would regard as a fable, having no foundation in fact, the history of the entrance of evil through the Serpent-tempter, placed at the beginning of the Hebrew Bible. Surely it could have been no mere fable, no mere allegory, which thus carried a whole theology, and philosophy, and civilization along with it. It showed God the Beneficent as supreme, omnipresent, and eternal; and evil as a reptile perishing power. It engaged the will of man in a personal conflict, both in nature and in human life, with a mighty but a conquerable foe. Resist the Devil and he will flee from you, was the battle-cry through all ages. It showed all honest men that nothing was noble except goodness, nothing immortal but righteousness, that even the strongest and subtlest wickedness was ever ready to descend to the meanest concealments and falsehoods to attain its ends; but that all those ends should fail, because the history of the earth and of mankind was destined to be that of a prolonged conflict of right against wrong, resulting in the enthronement of Justice in the person of the true Osiris, the Son of Mary, who is also the Son of God.

Lastly, turning to our own times, we are still in the thick of this awful and world-wide conflict; but oh, how glorious the retrospect of the war against evil, how marvellous the succession of victories already won, and how thrilling the hope that now shortly the atmosphere shall be cleansed from the pestilent influence of that dark "Power of the Air" which rains down falsehood and death upon the nations. We look back from this point, through all generations up to the earliest, upon a succession of battles in which truth-seekers have encountered the upholders of falsehood in every land; in which lovers of freedom have confronted tyrants and time-servers; in which political justice has struggled against political wrong; social right against oppressive privilege; scientific research against despotic superstition; honest faith and reforming criticism against sacerdotal equivocation and blood-red popish cruelty. We look back upon those conflicts, equally glorious, in which the same lovers of truth, following the example of their Master (who, hated by both parties alike, and, facing their cross-fire, waged war against both Pharisees and Sadducees), have resisted the conceited materialism, and exaggerated scepticism, which have in all ages brought discredit on the names of Liberty and Progress; telling men sometimes that they have no souls and the universe that it has no God, and the world that it has no future, except in the adoration of their own precious memories, and [illegible] that it has no true reward [illegible] ing up to everlasting life. [illegible] devotion. We [illegible] Eastern [illegible] Europe [illegible] which [illegible] before all nations on the Royal Exchange. It is written on the front of a more durable edifice, on the Temple of Truth in the Bible. The near future belongs to Christ. He reigns already by his Spirit in the hearts of a multitude that no man can number. He has told us that he is coming "quickly," to reign over the whole earth, as a new Power of the Air, in the heavenly places, when Satan shall be "shut up in the abyss" with his demons; for the last word of God shall be the confirmation of the first, "The Seed of the Woman shall bruise the Serpent's head."

"Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven!" Gather out of this Thy kingdom, then, O Lord of the world, "all them that cause stumbling and that do iniquity," the ringleaders of evil in word and deed, and the "destroyers of the earth." Then shall the kingdom, and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, be given to the people of the saints of the Most High; and "all nations shall be blessed in Him," who is "ALIVE FOR EVERMORE."—Edward White.

 It may therefore be rightly said that little ones, dying without baptism, will be in the mildest damnation of all. Yes, he greatly deceives and is deceived who preaches that they will not be in damnation."—Augustine, ad. 1st.

THE HORRORS OF 1883.

These peculiar people who believe that the signs of the times portend the destruction of the world, and that the Almighty, after he has passed judgments upon individuals, which they claim He has been doing since the commencement of the Christian era, will then visit His wrath upon them in masses, and after that end the world itself, have good reason to assert with emphasis that the second stage of destructiveness has been reached, and that the third draws near. It is not very respectful to charge upon Divine Providence the inevitable results flowing from the operation of the great forces of nature, nor the equally inevitable results that flow from human carelessness or ignorance, which in nine cases out of ten are responsible for what coroners' juries are apt to call visitations from above, but the application made of them by superficial readers of the Bible is not remarkable.

Whether the events of this fatal year of our Lord 1883 have any reference to the realization of prophecy or to the construing of Scripture declarations or not, no one will question that it has thus far been a terrible year in its destructive visitations upon people, their lives and their property. Whether it has culminated in the terrible disaster at Ischia, which in the twinkling of an eye, and without warning, devastated that "smiling island" and swept thousands out of existence, remains to be seen; but this is only one of many disasters which have marched their black procession across the globe. Last year was considered a fatal year, but the fatalities of seven months of 1883 already exceed those of the whole year of 1882. In our own land in January eighteen persons were drowned by the upsetting of a flatboat in North Carolina, ten were killed by a mine explosion in this state, and eighty-two lost their lives in the Newhall House fire. In February, floods at various places drowned fifty people, and seventy-seven lost their lives at Braidwood. In March eleven were burned at Brownsville, Minn. In April fourteen were killed by the fall of a hotel in Texas, and 200 lost their lives by tornadoes. In May 118 more were killed by tornadoes, and fourteen lives were sacrificed in the Brooklyn bridge panic. In June floods and tornadoes killed fifty-eight. This month the most fearful accidents have been that of last Friday near Carlyon, N. Y., by which seventeen were killed, and the pier disaster near Baltimore, which killed seventy-six.

The casualities in the Old World have been infinitely more terrible, as will be seen by the following appalling list: Sinking of the Cimbria, 434; floods in Germany and Hungary, 140; burning of the circus in Poland, 268; powder explosion in Holland, 40; panic in a wool factory at Bombay, 23; avalanche at Mount Ararat, 150; loss of a fishing fleet on the English coast, 378; boiler explosion at Dinler, France, 84; powder explosion at Passo Cornese, Italy, 40; mine explosion at Bessieres, France, 127; powder explosion at Scutari, 160; panic at Sunderland, Eng., 202; fire at Dorvin, Italy, 47; the launch disaster at Glasgow, 150; flood at London, Ont., 20: fire in Hungary 28; mine explosion in Sicily, 65; and the Ischia earthquake, about 3,000.

The total of these and other disasters not necessary to mention tells the story. Last year at no time were lives lost as reported by telegraph. In [illegible] months of the year [illegible] their vessel was scarcely 100 lives have been reported as lost. and if to these we add the fatalities by cholera in June and July in India (12,000), and in Egypt (9,242), the sum total of horror amounts to 27,242 lives sacrificed by casualty and epidemic, and there are yet five months of possible terror before us.—Chicago Tribune, July 31.

Youths' Column.

Name in the Sand.

Alone I walked on the ocean strand,
A pearly shell was in my hand:
I stooped and wrote upon the sand
My name, the year, the day.
As onward from the spot I passed,
One backward looked in blind unrest:
A wave came rolling high and fast,
And washed my place away.

And so, methought, 'twill quickly be
With every mark on earth from me!
A wave of dark oblivion's sea
Will sweep across the sea
Where I have trod the sandy shore
Of time, and borne, to be no more!
Of me, the day, the name I bore,
To leave no track nor trace.

And yet with him who counts the sands,
And holds the waters in his hands,
I know a lasting record stands
Inscribed against my name,
Of all this mortal part has wrought,
Of all this thinking soul has thought,
And from these fleeting moments caught,
For glory or for shame.

What the Master Taught.

Some little children were sitting one day on the steps of a door, singing some of their favorite hymns. They were suddenly surprised by a half-drunken man, who came up to them, and, uttering an oath, said, "Does your master teach you nothing but singing those foolish hymns?"

"Yes, sir," said a sharp little fellow six years of age, "He tells us it is wicked to swear."

The poor, worthless man seemed ashamed of his conduct and passed on without further remark.

Blessing of a Free Bible.

How deeply thankful to God should we all be that the Bible is a free book for all. There was a time in England when to read the Scriptures in English was held a great crime, and liable to the very severest punishment.

In the reign of Henry V., who was king from 1413 to 1422, a law was passed in these words: "That whosoever they were that should read the Scriptures in the mother tongue, they should forfeit lands, catel, life, and godes, from theyre hayres forever, and to be condemned for horetykes to God, enemies to the crowne, and traitors to the lande."

Prompt to Poison a Parish.

A Protestant little girl, being asked by a priest to attend his religious instruction, refused, saying it was against her father's wishes.

The priest said she should obey him, not her father.

"Oh, sir, we are taught in the Bible, 'Honor thy father and thy mother.'"

"You have no business to read the Bible," said the priest.

"But, sir, our Saviour said, in John v. 39, 'Search the Scriptures.'"

"That was only to the Jews, and not to children, and you don't understand it," said the priest.

"But, sir, St. Paul said to Timothy, 'From a child thou hast known the Holy Scriptures.'" 2 Tim. iii. 15.

"Oh," said the priest, "Timothy was then being trained to be a bishop, and was taught by the authorities of the church."

"Oh, no, sir," said the child, "he was taught by his mother and his grandmother."

On this the priest turned her away, saying she "knew enough of the Bible to poison a parish."

A Marvellous Rescue.

The illustration of the fact that God keeps in perfect peace those who trust in Him, suggests to our mind that several years ago a ship was burned near the mouth of the English Channel. Among the passengers were a father, mother, and their little child, a daughter not many months old. When the discovery was made that the ship was on fire, and the alarm was given, there was great confusion, and the family became separated. The father was rescued and taken to Liverpool, but the mother and her infant were pushed overboard and unnoticed by those who were doing all in their power to save the sufferers still on the ship. They drifted out of the Channel with the tide, the mother clinging to some floating portion of the wreck, with her little one clasped to her breast.

Late in the afternoon of that day a vessel, bound from Newport, Wales, to America, was moving slowly along in her course. There was only a light breeze, and the captain was impatiently walking the deck, when his attention was called to an object some distance off, which looked like a person in the water. The officers and crew watched it for a time, and, as no vessel was near from which any one could have fallen overboard, they thought it impossible that this could be a human [illegible] their vessel was scarcely moving, it was thought best to get out a boat and row to the object. The boat was accordingly lowered and manned. It was watched with considerable interest by those who remained on board, and they noticed that, as it drew near to the drifting speck, the rowers rested on their oars two or three minutes, and then moving forward, took in the object or thing, they knew not which, and returned to the ship.

When the boat's crew came on board they brought with them this mother and her child, alive and well; and the sailors said that, as they drew near, they heard a female voice sweetly singing. As with a common impulse, the men ceased rowing and listened, and the words of this beautiful hymn, sung by this trusting Christian, all unconscious that deliverance was so near, came over the waves to their ears:—

"Jesus, lover of my soul,
Let me to Thy bosom fly,
While the waters near me roll,
While the tempest still is high:
Hide me, O my Saviour, hide,
Till the storm of life is past,
Safe into the haven guide,
O! receive my soul at last.

"Other refuge have I none,
Hangs my helpless soul on Thee;
Leave, O! leave me not alone;
Still support and comfort me.
All my trust on Thee is stayed,
All my help from Thee I bring;
Cover my defenceless head
With the shadow of Thy wing."

In due time the vessel arrived in America. The mother wrote to her friends in England, and the father learned of their safety.

This abiding trust in God is no delusion. The Lord is nigh to them that call upon him. The eyes of the Lord are over the righteous, and his ears are open to their prayers, and his hand will guide us in all life's devious ways, and bring us safely to the heavenly home at last.

Since its appearance in Egypt, the cholera has carried off 110 soldiers of the British army of occupation.

There has been a popular uprising for a Republic in the province of Badajos, Spain, the garrison joining in the revolt. Government troops from Madrid were sent to suppress it.

A supposed Moabite manuscript of Deuteronomy, on leather leaves, copied 700 B. C., has been found. It has been submitted to Dr. Genesberg, and other experts. The balance of opinion is in favor of its genuineness. The owner asks the British Museum $5,000,000 for it.—[See fuller notice in another column.—ED.]

From Khartoum in the Soudan, in Egypt, the latest news is that the Mahdi is at El Obeid or Lobeid, at the head of 4000 or 5000 natives. The black Egyptian troops whom he took prisoners are with him, and receive regular pay, double that formerly paid them by the Egyptian government. These men are armed with Remington rifles. The Mahdi has considerable wealth, the most of which he has sent to Gheboi-Gadir, four days by caravan—eighty miles. This is in the mountains, and is his country residence, and is called—Corsi Mahomet Achmet—country seat of Mahomet Achmet. Lobeid is a long straggling town, at the foot of an open slope, down which in the rainy season the water comes in torrents, making the streets into watercourses. The mud-built houses are also inundated. There was a large traffic carried on between Obeid, and Darfour, and thence with Lower Egypt and Cairo,—gum arabic, ivory, ostrich feathers, tamarinds, and saltpetre. The Mahdi has always been extremely courteous to Christians, and tries to persuade them that he is the precursor of Jesus Christ. He tells them that he is bound personally to present them to Christ at his coming, who will, he says, obligingly come to Obeid for the purpose. On this occasion the Christians themselves and Jesus Christ himself will become Mussulmans.—London Christian Herald, July 25.

OF WHOM THE WORLD WAS NOT WORTHY.

What will it be when all these sons of fame,
The peerage of the ages, shall sit down
Together, in a day that yet shall come,
And, gathering each to other, shall recount,
The annals of their age, as they have known
And acted them, the twelvefold history,
What will that feast-board be, and what that hall.

Where they who have obtained the good report,
Shall meet together in one holy band,
And tell the tale of earth from life to glowing,
Revealing all the hidden springs of thought,
And speech and action to each other there?

The stars have looked each other in the face
For ages, yet have never met; the peaks
Of the far-severed and all-but-infinite hills
Have, with their mitres of eternal snow,
Stared on each other, yet remained apart.
The winds and waters and clouds embrace each other,
Earth's universal network of clear streams,
Is one sweet fellowship of many silvers,
But stars and peaks remain unlinked and lone.

So it is now; what it may be hereafter
We know not; what the all-fires fellowships
And store-links, compact and bright and great
One day may be, we cannot tell; nor yet
How soon, from the tall turret-clock of time,
Shall sound the signal which must gather all
The light-begotten children of the one
Great family of light, to the behest
Of the one festival which cannot end.

JERUSALEM, June 25.

Editor Restitution:

This is one of our days of disappointment. Post has come and brought us nothing—no, not so much as a paper. However, our life does not consist of what we have now, but it is that hope of something, we trust not very far in the future, that buoys us up. Sad indeed would be our lot if eternity was to be filled up with wars and fightings without, and within disappointments, heart-aches, fears of what the future is to bring us, etc.; but, thank God, we have a sure word of prophecy that tells us of something better. But it seems to be one of the peculiarities of our nature to have great light to-day, so that we can see the hand of a kind Heavenly Father in everything, and read the prophecies concerning this time, and see, in what is transpiring throughout the world, the fulfillment thereof. While we are delighted for the present with this kind of experience, the Lord sees that we can not stand such experience as this all the time. So it becomes necessary to drop us down a notch occasionally, giving us a sight at our true condition—our littleness by the side of God who created all things for his glory. And these coming-down times, from Pisgah's height, while perhaps for days we flounder about among the rocks at the foot of the mountain seeking, perhaps, if possible to get a notch lower, weary, perhaps, of life, batting our weary heads first against one thing and then another, is what knocks off the rough edges. Now this is hard to endure, but it is just the kind of experience every child of God must pass through to stand when trials come. And without it we may put it down for a fact that we are not sons. So, knowing that this is in harmony with his word, we will try to follow in the way of Paul—rejoice in persecutions, trials of all kinds, let it be loss of friends because of our faith, the giving up of kindred, country and home—no matter what, if we can only be on that ground where we can thank God continually and for all things, good or evil. This is the kind of life we should be seeking for in this awfully dark hour.

What we need to learn first of all is this: God deals with us in ways to us strange and past finding out. This being a well established fact, makes it necessary for us next to learn this, that God has created all things; and that means all—no more, no less. Then it follows that as he has created all things for a purpose, he may see fit to use some part of his work that is the most objectionable to us, for our teacher. Now a thought comes to me that deserves some attention. All, no doubt, who believe in an Almighty God, will agree with me when I say he created all things, and everything for his own purpose. Then the thought is this: The idea that we, mere creatures, and nothing more, should despise or have a dislike, or should in any way ill-treat any other part of his creation! O that all men might know themselves! This is one of the impossibilities so long as men cling to the idea that they are immortal without the new birth which cannot be found outside of Jesus Christ our Redeemer. This alone will show us that we are not God's, but instead are a very small part of God's creation. I have learned good lessons from the Mohammedans since I have been here, but had I said, "Oh, they are ignorant heathens!" and closed my eyes to what the Lord was teaching me through them, then I should have remained in the dark on those points; for I don't believe if I reject a truth because of the means God sees fit to use to teach me, that he will present it to me through something that is a little more pleasing to my exalted fancies. These vain imaginations that are ever striving to lift us up above the clouds must down, or we go by the board.

Last week, while in conversation with Mr. Gargour, a native merchant, who was raised up by Christians, and speaks very good English, a native passed along Christian street where we were standing, in front of my friend's shop. He had a large wooden tray loaded with some kind of eatables for street sale, and as I noticed he was not crying the same thing, I asked Mr. G. what he was saying. Said he: "All of his words are addressed to God, as follows: 'Lord, make it easy for me! that is, work upon the hearts of the people to buy! Thou (God) art rich! Be mercifull Give me from thy grace! Thou art found everywhere!'" The Koran teaches them to take everything patiently, no matter whether it be good or evil, for it is all from the Lord. In this I think they are far in advance of popular Christianity. They are admonished by the same book not to resist the powers brought against them, at the time of the end of their power over the Jew and Jerusalem. This strange book also tells them when their time as a nation is filled up—or, to make it a little plainer—when they go down as a people, that the Jews as a nation must come up. And it occurs to me that if the so-called church was not in greater darkness than these Mohammedans, it, or they, the members, might see that the filling up of the times of the Gentiles meant something, and that the words of our Lord (Luke xxi. 24) and Paul (Rom. xi. 25) were not put in the Book simply to be used as ciphers, but that they have a meaning. How any man claiming to be a student of God's word, and claiming to want truth, can pass these texts and many others by as nothing, is something hard for me to understand. I have about come to the conclusion that the profession and claims of such are vain. Now how easy it is for us to read and understand such texts as this by Paul, Gal. iv. 4: "But when the fulness of the time was come, God sent forth his Son," etc. This shows a certain fulness of time in the past. This we can see and understand, and can take it just as it reads, for the simple reason that in so doing we do not have to give up some of our preconceived ideas. There is no cross to take up in believing and understanding this text; but let the other texts referred to above so much as be mentioned in the presence of some of those devout ones who have said that the Jews will not be gathered into their own country again—who virtually claim that the curse will be removed from the land given to Abraham for a possession—and they will close their eyes, harden their hearts, and turn away from the truth, saying within themselves, "I see nothing in it, and do not believe God has anything in store for those miserable wretches. No, no," say they, "I will have none of it! Away with it! I am holier than those!" How little do such people know of the wonderful mercy, the long-suffering, of the mighty God who never has dealt with any nation, as a nation, save those whom he formerly knew!

The great trouble is this: The Roman Catholic idea that the Jews killed Christ, and consequently ought to be persecuted, finds too much room in the hearts of those who reject this part of God's word, now being fulfilled. Why not take our Lord's words for this matter, and see in them the reason for their doing so. He laid down his life. It was as impossible for him to be put to death before his work was finished, as it is impossible for these wonderfully wise men, who are kicking so hard against the pricks, to stay the hand of an Almighty God from continuing this greatest and grandest work of the world's history—showing that, regardless of what man may say, his mercy does endure forever.

Again, because it pleased God to raise up a few people in the time of Christ unto dishonor, and to perform a special work, should all people of the same nationality be censured? How far are all from the teaching of Christ, who have within them a heart full of hatred for this people! Yes, how different! for he could pray for them, but it takes a great deal of suffering, lots of whipping, before we can be brought to follow our Lord's example in this matter, and pray for those whom the "mother church" (Rev. xvii. 5) has taught should be persecuted. The great trouble with those who hold on to those ideas adverse to the Jews, is that in "coming out" of the mother church they did not come out clean, and had better go to the pool and wash, or return from whence they came.

Just now four carriages, or rather wagons, loaded with Jews, passed in to the city from Joppa. This is going on every day. I sit here by the window, and in the way how God speaks to me in tones of thunder, "My word is truth, I, the Lord, will do it."

Now I wish to say a few words to our brethren according to the flesh, if I can reach them through THE RESTITUTION. There has been started here an institution for the aged Jews. There are a great many poor old men who have no means, no relatives, no homes, but trust they have a God. They have come here from all parts of the world, some say by chance. But no matter, they are here and in this destitute condition. Dr. Saunders, a Jew who came last year—in answer to God's call—from Australia, had a little income, and started this institution or home for these poor souls, whom I know God loves, if hard-hearted men do hate them. Dr. Saunders has used his means in this way, and made it reach as many as it would; but he can do no more and must be assisted in this work that God has so fitted him for. I have made this appeal more to Hebrews than to any one else, for the simple reason that those of our brethren "according to the spirit" seem to have got hold of a strange kind of a spirit—one that causes them to hold on to their dollars, allowing none of them to be used for the relief of God's suffering poor. Who of such will be the first to drive that spirit away by answering to this call? All donations for this purpose will be acknowledged in the Hebrew paper at Jerusalem, and a copy of same sent to donor. Notice will also be given in THE RESTITUTION of receipt of same.

I have just returned from the "old city," and as I came outside the Joppa gate, saw to the left a lot of Bedouins, natives from beyond the Jordan, who are looked upon as hostile, or at least quite treacherous in their own land. They have just begun to bring in their crop of grain, mostly wheat and barley. This was a scene worth looking at, I assure you. Here were fifty to a hundred camels and donkeys; they had been unloaded, to give the grain-buyers a chance to look at and dicker for the grain. These fellows lay down by their sacks and let the buyers do the most of the talking. The merchant makes an offer, and all the answer he gets is "la!" meaning no. This is kept up until the price is raised to what Mr. Bedouin thinks is about right, then it is finished. I never have seen grain of such weight, and so solid in any country. I send you a sample of the wheat, just as it was handed to me out of the sack. This is from the valley of the Jordan, and raised by a class of people who know no more about farming than our North American Indians. This is what they get from the soil by scratching over the top of the ground with a wooden plow. What, think you, might be done with our American plows, grain drills, etc., with a good span of horses instead of a steer and donkeys for a team? I have heard of a man by the name of Cook, from America, who has traveled some little in this country—think he represents himself as a preacher of the gospel—who has said that even the "twittering birds," as they fly over Palestine, have to take their haversacks with them. I think this sample of wheat will show to your mind plainly that the Right Reverend D. D. Cook, LL. D., has "twittered" out a very large-sized "fish story." We see in this what men will do to oppose Bible truth which the carnal mind cannot receive. They take sides against it, and in order to make any kind of a fight, are simply driven to tell that which is false; for untruth can be supported by nothing else, while truth requires no support, but is a marble pillar itself, and has the Rock of Ages to stand on. I would advise Mr. Cook to move his hut of sticks and stubble from off that foundation of sand, tear down and start anew, on the rock that will stand the storms.

We hope to see some from the United States this season who believe God is all-mighty; that his power has not decreased in any way; who believe that the devil can't do anything that God does not let him—in a word, who believe there is no other God beside him.

I send enclosed a specimen of so-called "proverbs," (should be translated "parables"). You will not fail to notice the wonderful spiritual as well as what we commonly understand by the word "practical" teaching in this chapter; and I will further say that the whole book when correctly translated and understood is of the same wonderful character. As a book it is the key to the "more philosophy" of the Scriptures, and I think was so designed to be by the Infinite Mind.

Yours in the faith,

CHAS. GARDNER.

PROVERBS xxvi.[*] (Parables Properly Translated) Chapter xxiii.

1. Better is a morsel with joy in peace than a house full of many good things and unjust offerings in the midst of strife.

2. A thoughtful house-servant will obtain control over senseless despots, and will take a portion in a distribution among brethren.

3. Even as the value of silver and gold is tried in a furnace, so also are chosen hearts on the part of the Lord.

4. A bad man giveth ear unto the tongue of transgressors, but a just one doth not attend unto lying lips.

5. The one who mocketh at a beggar embitters the One who made him. And the one who rejoiceth over that which is lost will not have been accounted guiltless; but the one who showeth pity will have experienced mercy.

6. A garland of graces are children's children, and the boast of children is their fathers.

The whole cosmos of useful things is for the faithful one," but not an "obol" (less than 3 cents) for the faithless.

7. Trustworthy lips will not suit a senseless person, nor will lying lips a just one.

8. Chastening for those who utilize it is a hire of graces, and wherever such an one shall turn, he will have prospered.

9. He who hideth wrongs suffered seeketh friendship, but he who hateth to hide them separateth friends and members of households.

10. A threat breaketh the heart of a man of sense, but one who is wanting in good sense, though punished with a whip, doth not perceive.

11. Every bad man stirreth up contradiction, and the Lord will send unto him an angel without mercy.

12. Anxious care will fall upon a thoughtful man, but the heedless will reason badly.

13. He who returneth evil for good, will not have caused evil to depart from his house.

14. The authority that belongs to righteousness giveth power to words; but sedition and strife lead the way to want.

15. He who judgeth the unjust to be just and the just to be unjust is unclean and abominable in the estimation of God. (God's definition of "abomination.")

16. Why have useful things come into possession of a person wanting in sense? For a heartless person will not be able to lay hold of wisdom. He who exalteth his own house seeketh the blow of destruction. And he who goeth crookedly to learn will fall into evil. (Note carefully the philosophy here.)

17. Let one be thy friend for every occasion; but let brethren stand in use for thee in thy straits: for this purpose are they begotten. (Note the doctrine here reader.)

18. A man without sense (agape here synonymous with selfishness) applaudeth and rejoiceth over himself, and is as it were one who becometh surety for his own friends.

19. A lover of wrong-doing rejoiceth in contentions;

20. And the hard-hearted doth not meet along with the good. A man who dissembleth with his tongue will fall into evil;

21. And a heart without sense is a woe. that gets possession of him. A father doth not rejoice over a son that is undisciplined; but a son with good sense causeth his mother to rejoice.

22. A heart that rejoiceth is a cause of health; but the bones of a sorrowful man wax dry. (Medical science.)

23. The ways of him who taketh bribes in his bosom will not finally prosper, and an irreverent person inclineth out of the ways of righteousness. (Judges note this.)

24. The face of a wise man hath understanding; but the eyes of a thoughtless one are unto the ends of the earth.

25. A heedless son is a father's wrath and a woe to the one who bore him.

26. To injure a just man is not well and to take counsel against just rulers is not holy.

27. He who as an arbiter refraineth from advancing a harsh word and is long-suffering, is a prudent man.

28. Wisdom will have been accounted to an unintelligent person who enquireth after wisdom; and any one who keepeth silent will seem to be thoughtful.

[*] A prophetic reference to Christ no doubt.

LOCATION OF CHRIST'S GLORIOUS THRONE.

It seems there is nothing more clearly taught in the Bible than that Christ will personally appear on this earth, or rather on the new earth, to receive a kingdom, Luke xix. 12, Dan. vii. 13, 14, and shall rule and reign over the nations of the earth as King of kings and Lord of lords, and whose dominion shall be an everlasting dominion, which shall not be destroyed. That Christ has never received a kingdom, or has over exercised the authority of a king, is shown by his own words to his disciples, saying: "You that have followed me, in the regeneration, when the Son of man shall sit in the throne of his glory, you also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel." Matt. xix. 28. Now if it be true that Christ is now King, and is sitting upon the throne of his glory, as some seem to think and teach, then the apostles are also now sitting upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes. This cannot be, from the fact that the apostles have been dead for hundreds of years, and those people known among us as Jews are the two tribes taken captive by Titus the Roman general, Judah and Benjamin. The other ten tribes have been lost to the world for more than two thousand years. They were taken captive by the king of Assyria, and have never been heard of since. The Lord, speaking of them, says: "My people hath been lost sheep, their shepherds have caused them to go astray, they have turned them away on the mountains, they have gone from mountain to hill, they have forgotten their resting place." Jer. l. 6. From this we learn that they are not only lost to the world, but they are lost to themselves—they have forgotten the land of their inheritance. But the Lord knows where they are, for he says: "My eyes are upon all their ways, they are not hid from my face." Jer. xvi. 17. And he says he will gather them again and bring them into their own land, and they shall be one kingdom, and they shall not be divided into two kingdoms any more at all. And David shall be king over them, and they shall have one shepherd. Ezekiel xxxvii. 20–28. Now when the twelve tribes of the children of Israel are restored to their native land and kingdom, and the apostles are restored from the grave, and Christ shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory, (Matt. xxv. 31,) and the apostles will sit upon twelve thrones and judge the twelve tribes of Israel. O how joyous, how delightful, how happy the day when the government shall be administered in equity and justice, when the destructive and cruel sword shall be beaten into implements of husbandry, and nations learn war no more!

But a question might arise in the mind of the thoughtful—Where will the throne of Christ be located? Well, as Christ and the apostles have not told us, we must look to the prophets, for it appears that God gave them a work to do, which was, to light up the future by the word of the Lord, to the understanding of all, that all may know their future destiny, that all might understand the history of the future as plainly as they understand the history of the past. And they have faithfully done their work. Therefore we will consult the prophets.

"And it shall come to pass in the last days that the mountain of the Lord shall be established in the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills, and all nations shall flow unto it; and many people shall go and say, Come ye, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, to the house of the God of Jacob, and he will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths, for out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem. And he shall judge among the nations, and shall rebuke many people, and they shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning hooks; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more." Isa. ii. 2–4.

This Scripture should be understood in a literal sense. The last days spoken of refer to the last days of the gospel age, (1 Tim. iv. 1; 2 Tim. iii. 1–5; 2 Peter iii. 3), although I have often heard it quoted and applied to the going forth of the gospel on the day of Pentecost. But this cannot be, for all nations did not flow to Jerusalem, and the sword has never been beaten into plowshares; consequently it must refer to future time. And this mountain also must be a literal mountain, for Isaiah says, "And in this mountain shall the Lord of hosts make unto the people a feast of fat things, a feast of wine on the lees, of fat things full of marrow, of wines on the lees well refined. And he will destroy in this mountain the face of the covering cast over all people, and the vail that is spread over all nations. He will swallow up death in victory, and the Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces, and the rebuke of his people shall he taken away from all the earth, for the Lord hath spoken it." Isaiah xxv. 6–8.

"For in my holy mountain, in the mountain of the height of Israel, saith the Lord God, there shall all the house of Israel, all of them in the land serve me there will I accept them, and there will I require your offerings, and the fruit of your oblations, with all your holy things. I will accept you with your sweet savor, when I bring you out from the people, and gather you out from the countries wherein ye have been scattered, and I will be sanctified in you before the heathen." Ezek. xx. 40, 41.

The above Scripture needs no comment. It is expressive of great power and glory that shall be exhibited, and the richest of blessings shall go forth from that mountain in that age, upon the people, not only upon the Israelites, but to the whole world.

But the prophet Ezekiel is very explicit and lengthy in his description of this holy mountain, and the buildings upon it. He says that when he was a captive in the land of Chaldea, that the hand of the Lord was upon him, and in the visions of God he was conveyed into the land of Israel and set upon a very high mountain, by which there was as the frame of a city in the south, and there appeared to him a man having the appearance of brass, and said to him, Son of man, see with thine eyes, and hear with thine ears, and set thine heart upon all that I shall show thee, for to the intent that I might show them unto thee art thou brought hither: declare all that thou seest to the house of Israel. Ezek. xl. 2–4.

This is something that is well calculated to win our admiration and elicit our most serious consideration. It appears that this vision is of vast importance that Ezekiel should receive so strict a charge, to see, and hear, and set his heart upon all, and declare all to the people. This vision was not given for the benefit of the Jews only, but was intended for the righteous of all nations. "For there is neither Jew nor Greek (Gentile) there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female, for ye are all one in Christ, and if ye be Christ's then are ye Abraham's seed and heirs according to the promise." Gal. iii. 28, 29. Consequently we all have an interest in this wonderful vision. "For whatsoever things were written aforetime were written for our learning that we through patience and comfort of the Scriptures might have hope," Rom. xv. 4, "And be thoroughly furnished unto all good works." 2 Tim. iii. 17.

Immediately after the prophet had received this charge, the man commenced to show him the buildings, and also to measure the same. There are three whole chapters, the xl., xli., xlii., xliii., are taken up describing these buildings and all things pertaining to them. In chap. xli. he says, "Afterwards he brought me to the temple," and the things pertaining to it down to the 13th verse, and says, "So he measured the house an hundred cubits long, and the separate place and the building, with the wall thereof an hundred cubits long." vs. 14. Also the breadth of the face of the house and the separate place towards the east an hundred cubits." Now if we know the length of the cubit we should know the exact size of the temple. But as it is we know it must be very large and grand. In chap. xlix. he says, "Afterwards he brought me to the gate, even the gate that looketh towards the east. Vs. 2, "And behold the glory of the God of Israel came from the way of the east, and his voice was like the voice of many waters, and the earth shined with his glory." Vs. 4, "And he said unto me, Son of man, the place of my throne, and the place of the soles of my feet, where I will dwell in the midst of the children of Israel for ever, and my holy name shall the house of Israel no more defile." And continues his speech down to the 10th verse and says, "Thou son of man, show the house to the house of Israel, that they may be ashamed of their iniquities, and let them measure the pattern." Vs. 11, "And if they be ashamed of all that they have done, show them the form of the house, and the fashion thereof, and the goings out thereof, and the comings in thereof, and all the forms thereof, and the ordinances thereof, and all the forms thereof, and all the laws thereof, and write it in their sight, that they may keep the whole form thereof, and all the ordinances thereof and do them." Vs. 12, "This is the law of the house, Upon the top of the mountain the whole limit thereof round about shall be most holy."

The above Scripture shows us beyond doubt that Christ will personally appear on the earth as a King, and that his throne will be located on a high mountain north of the city of Jerusalem, for Ezekiel saw him coming from the east, and saw him enter into the Temple at the east gate, and heard the Lord speaking to him as from his throne where he would dwell with the children of Israel forever.

The Temple cannot be the temple that was built after the return of the Jews from the Babylonian captivity, because this temple is unlike any temple that has ever been built. This temple stood upon a high mountain north of the city, and it had three doors or gates, one on the east, of which no man was allowed to enter, because the Lord had entered in by it, Ezekiel xliv. 2; and there was a door on the north and one on the south, but none on the west, and when the people enter in to worship the Lord, those that enter in at the south gate pass out at the north gate, and those that enter in at the north gate pass out at the south gate. xlvi. 9. And again, there were waters issued out from under the threshold of the east gate, which, in about three miles became a river, and taking an easterly course emptied into the Dead Sea. And when this river empties into the sea the waters shall be healed. "And it shall come to pass that everything that liveth, which moveth, whithersoever the river shall come shall live; and there shall be a very great multitude of fish. And it shall come to pass that the fishers shall stand upon it from Engedi even unto Eneglaim; etc. And upon the banks of this river shall stand trees that shall yield their fruit every month, whose leaf shall not fade and the fruit thereof shall not be consumed. Ezek. xlvii. 1–12.

Again, the prophet in chap. xlviii. gives a description of the division of the promised land among the twelve tribes in equal portions: Dan's portion on the north, then Asher, then Naphtali, then Manasseh, then Ephraim, then Reuben, then Judah. Then there is a portion laid off, of twenty-five thousand reeds in breadth, and in length equal with the other portions, and the sanctuary shall be in the midst of it. Then the other portions are set off on the south.

This is something that never has been, consequently it is to become a reality in future time. O how grand, how glorious the theme.

Ye saints of the Most High, let us see with our eyes, and hear with our ears, and set our hearts upon all that is shown us in that most precious of all books, the Bible, that we may be anxiously and patiently looking for the return of our long, long absent Savior.

WAITING.

BY C. MORTIMER.

"Blessed are they that wait for him."

I am waiting for the coming
Of earth's long-expected Lord,
For the signs are now fulfilling,
That he gave us in his word;
I am watching, I am waiting,
For that promised glory day,
Yet I do not cease my working,
I need work as well as pray.

Pray I for the gems of waiting,
For the grace to work and wait,
That my heart may cease its throbbing,
Calm and strong for any fate;
That my eyes may cease sin sighting
When a shadow passes by,
For the moment half expecting
Them to hear the midnight cry.

Day and hour no mortal knoweth
Of the advent of the Lord,
This the Master plainly showeth,
In the teaching of his word:
Yet that day of days is coming,
And the gladsome hour is nigh,
For the signals are appearing
In the earth, and air, and sky.

I may die before the heralding
Of that bright millennial day,
Sweet and sweet will be the sleeping,
In the twilight shadows gray,
For the midnight trumpet roundeth,
Ringing through the graveyard's gloom,
And each Christian sleeper waketh
From the sunlight of the tomb.

I am waiting, I am praying,
For the promised glory-day,
As I read each peculiar saying
Christ in on his earthward way;
I can wait until the dawning,
Wind my heart for any fate:
Come at noon, or eve, or morning,
I will meet him at the gate.

"ONE FAIR CHANCE FOR ALL."

INTRODUCTORY.

Brethren and Sisters:

Please permit me, in two numbers, one final effort upon this subject; and if not forced to defend myself, it shall be final. I shall not be personal at all, and will treat the system even with due respect. If no personal answer be made to this (and I hope there will be none), I care not how much may be said against its positions. I know I am human, and I concede to my brethren and sisters the same.

And to gain a fair and impartial hearing I briefly state before the argument some of the main positions:

1. I believe in the resurrection of the just and the unjust, one to immortal life, and the other to everlasting destruction.

2. That the whole race will not die in Adam nor be raised in Christ.

3. That in the first resurrection none but the worthy will be raised.

4. That in the general resurrection good and evil will be raised.

5. That some have already received their final doom.

6. That infants will be saved without any future chance.

7. That some heathen will be saved and others lost.

These items will all be noticed, but perhaps not in their order named. I want it distinctly understood that all the wicked dead will be raised to a just punishment excepting those already having received it.

THE ARGUMENTS.

1. There is no such thing in fact as a fair chance, or equal chance. Nowhere in any department of life since the fall is this true, and in the very nature of things it is an impossibility. Take the first two born—Cain and Abel—and you will see its impossibility. The first received being when his parents were under the powerful influence of a lie believed, passionate guilt, and opposition to God. Abel received his being in calmer moods, under sober thoughts and regretted disobedience. A law of God and his universe is that "like begets like." Every good and great man or woman received being from good and great parents; or, if not, from parents at the time under great and good thought. There is no truer doctrine than this known. And if so, how can there be an equal chance for all?

Turn we for one moment to the physical organization. Consumption and other diseases are hereditary; so are mental and moral diseases. Has the hereditary drunkard, receiving his being from scottish parents, an equal chance with the sober? The brutish intellect and morals with the bright and good? The poor, sickly infant with the robust and healthy? The kleptomaniac with inborn honesty? The dirty, foul-mouthed, ragged, abandoned street Arab with the cleanly, well-raised, well-clothed, well-fed and well-bred? The neglected in education with those of the best opportunities? The Sunday rowdies and profane with those of Sunday schools and churches? These are not mere scientific and moral truths, but they have the ring and stamp of God upon them. Paul, in 2 Tim. i. 5, recognizes the hand of God in the doctrine. "When I call to remembrance the unfeigned faith that is in thee which dwelt first in thy grandmother Lois, and in thy mother Eunice; I am persuaded that in thee also." Paul recognizes the doctrine of hereditary good through three generations! And in the same way it may pass through hundreds; and so may the opposite—evil. So, nowhere in all the dominions of God can an equal or fair chance absolutely obtain. The history of the world, as well as the Bible, stamp the doctrine with sophistry.

The patriarchs and people of that age had not an equal chance with the law age, nor this with the gospel age, nor this with the age to come, as each succeeding had all the light of the preceding and its own. But, all being judged according to the light had, perhaps, in a modified sense, all may be said to have had a fair chance.

2. The fair chance does not represent God in the light of facts and Scripture. Because 1, it represents his creation of man before he was ready to meet his needs; or 2, that he was not wise enough to create him at the proper time; or 3, that he was not powerful enough to lend circumstances to his needs as he lived and died; or 4, being foiled in all else, he must needs lay him away in death for thousands of years, and then create him again in order to give him "one fair chance" after his plans are matured!

Certainly he was not all-wise, or he would have foreseen and prepared for this difficulty; nor all-powerful, or he would have met the emergency as it appeared. To lay away millions of the race in death unprovided for, and then raise them for a fair chance, certainly does not exalt his wisdom or his power; and, too, it represents the serpent as disarranging all his plans and so confusing him that thousands of years were necessary to mature a plan which an all-wise God should have seen and met from the beginning.

3. God was under no kind of obligation to give any kind of life to man. This was an act of pure philanthropy and not of necessity. After man had thwarted his original plans, or attempted it, he was under no obligation to give any a chance, fair or unfair, for eternal life. The first life was a great boon had there been no other. And had man lived as he should, even without any other life, he could have crowded into that life immeasurable happiness; and, had not man chosen to sin, the means of perpetuating life eternally were within his grasp.

4. But man deliberately elected to display God and fell. He was created good physically with latent intellectual and moral powers equal to his position. Being fully enlightened in regard to his nature and powers, and warned of his trial, he deliberately chose to disobey God and die. None were to blame other than himself. He elected to fly in the face of his great Creator and Benefactor, thereby losing first his innocence and then the life he had. Hitherto he had held sweet converse and communion with his God, though naked; but no sooner had he disobeyed than guilt seized him, and he feared his best Friend. Fleeing from his presence, he tried to patch up his guilt with fig-leaf theology, but God found him out in his sin. Calling him up and his guilty companion, with the serpent, he proceeded to pass sentence upon them. The serpent, not being intellectual nor moral, not being placed under positive law, was only condemned to crawl upon his belly all the days of his life. The woman was subjected to her husband, and the pains of a multiplicity of seed to meet their altered state, and finally death. The man, to a life-struggle for existence, to the curse of a cursed earth, and finally to death. That this death was not to occur in a day of twenty-four hours is evident from the law itself: "Cursed is the ground for thy sake: in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life." Gen. iii. 17.

5. The whole race, as taught by the fair-chancers, did not, will not, die in Adam, nor will the whole race be raised in Christ. This is their main ground, their Gibraltar; and if this pillar of their edifice is pulled out, their whole structure topples over. I shall, therefore, be at more pains here in attacking and demolishing their stronghold; carrying this, their whole structure falls to the ground. They quote 1 Cor. xv. 22, with great confidence; and by their show of logic intimidate the Scripturally uninformed. I shall meet them and rout them here, undoubtedly.

a. This whole epistle is written to Christians for themselves, and does not deal in universal axioms, as shown in first and second verses. They were all "sanctified in Christ Jesus."

b. Some among this congregation denied any resurrection. And the main arguments were addressed to these: "How say some among you that there is no resurrection of the dead."

c. No man can legitimately get out of a subject more than there is in it. This whole chapter is a masterly argument for the resurrection of the Christian dead, and the change of the Christian living, when Christ comes again. There is not one word in it said about the resurrection of the wicked dead, unless it be by inference from 24th verse. To find the resurrection of the wicked we have to consult other Scriptures. Hence we must not make Paul say in this chapter what he did not say, nor what was not in his mind.

d That he did not say what fair-chancers say that he did say, is evident; because it is not true that all the race die in Adam: for two of the race—Enoch and Elijah—have already escaped death, and millions more will escape it at Christ's second advent. Nor will the race be raised in Christ, as we shall see further along. So it will not do to squeeze out of this text what was never in it.

e. Paul's premiss is, 1 Cor. xv. 21, "For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead:" and the conclusion drawn, is, "for as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." 1 Cor. xv. 22. Now the conclusion must not embrace more than the premiss. That was that death came by man—Adam—and life by man—the Man Christ Jesus. The one was the loss of the Adamic life; the other, the gain of immortal life. This text—1 Cor. xv. 22 and the whole of the 15th chapter—if there were no other Scriptures upon resurrection and judgment, would not prove the fair chance at all, but bald-headed Universalism! For every one here raised is raised immortal, and not to any kind of a chance. In this resurrection, the dead "is sown in corruption; it is raised in incorruption;" in "dishonor; it is raised in glory;" "in weakness; it is raised in power;" "a natural body; it is raised a spiritual body." Give Universalists their interpretation of the text and whole chapter, (and it is as Scriptural and logical as the fair-chancers') and their doctrine cannot be overthrown.

In the proper place and time we will show that it will not do to build up a doctrine upon the word "all." But when fair-chancers are pressed to the wall here, they then reply that the same "all" is meant in the loss of life in Adam and in the gain of life in Christ. Admitted. What then? Not the fair chance, surely; for the race do not die in Adam, nor is the race raised in Christ. The meaning—the only true meaning—is, that all who die at all die in Adam or by Adam, and all that will be raised at all will be raised in Christ.

6. The next and only strong proof-text of the fair-chancers examined and turned against themselves: 1. Tim. ii. 1–6. The first verse exhorts Christians to pray for "all men," and is of no value to them; the second gives the design of such prayers—that God through those prayers might so govern and direct the rulers of the people that Christians should not be persecuted, but that they might "lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty;" the third asserts that such prayers are "good and acceptable in the sight of God;" and the fourth, the fair-chancers claim proves their doctrine—"Who will have all men to be saved and come unto the knowledge of the truth;" the fifth makes one God and one Mediator, and of course gives them no comfort; and the sixth declares Jesus gave himself to be a ransom for all, to be testified in due time." This, if the fourth proves their doctrine, comes in as explanatory of when the testimony is to be given for "a fair chance."

We therefore direct our efforts to the fourth verse, and show that it does not mean what they say it does; and if not, then their whole structure topples over. The doctrine sought to be fastened upon this text is, that God absolutely "wills" the salvation of the race. If this were so, then that "will" would be performed; and this would prove Universalism and not the fair chance. The fair-chancers, however, make this salvation only a resurrection of that part of the race to "a fair chance" who have not already had it. Their philanthropy gives to all, who have not had it, a fair chance by giving them a post-mortem gospel and post-mortem salvation, or a chance for it, in the eternal state! Further along I will show that there will not be a resurrection of the whole race, and that knocks the "fair chance" into pi.

The Book says that "God is the Savior of all, but especially of believers." This salvation is now, not after death. Nor does this include the race, for millions upon millions of the race are annually destroyed in the providence of God by storms, floods, cyclones, famines, and pestilences. The special salvation is pardon and "joy and peace in the Holy Ghost." So there never has been, is not now, and never will be, a salvation of the race in any sense of the word. But fair-chancers give a universal salvation without truth! The Bible says the truth saves.

There is nothing in this text that may be even tortured into a proof of the universal salvation of the race save the word "will." Now, use this in the sense of "desire," and all is plain, and no contradiction of other texts. The Greek word thelei is rendered "desires" by the Diaglott. God certainly does desire the salvation of all, but only according to his revealed will. It will not do to make his will and desire clash with his revealed word, else we are all at sea without compass or rudder! "A house divided against itself cannot stand." His word has damned and will damn millions of the race! Is this damnation against his will? If so, who forced him to it? And if it were his absolute will to save the race, he certainly has the power to perform it.

But in this text the fair-chancers build their theory upon the order and arrangement of certain words in the text—thus: "Who will have all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth." Their salvation is a resurrection to mortal life again of all those who have not had "one fair chance;" and when saved, they want to bring them and the truth into juxtaposition in order for a trial to "a fair chance!" If Adam and Eve fell, so may these, and then it only gives two mortal lives and two mortal deaths instead of "a fair chance." Is there anything fair in creating them twice to the one creation of all others in Bible lands?

But in regard to the arrangement of words in a sentence: No book in the world compels the meaning of the first word in a sentence to come first, much less the Bible. I now only give one sample to demonstrate the absurdity of such interpretation—Luke xx. 35, 36: "But they that shall be counted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection of the dead," etc., etc. Now, according to this order and arrangement of words, the worthy get to that world before being raised from the dead! Is that the meaning? Must they not be raised from the dead before they can get to that world? and in order to it? Certainly. But we are told that oinos should be rendered age instead of world. Very true. Perhaps this should always be its rendering. But I am not astute enough to see how this would help the fair-chancers. For none could come to that age without a resurrection from the dead, because that is a necessity to the ushering in of that age.

7. But being routed here as well as before they go for the restitution. Let them. We follow them here, and show that they misrepresent Bible restitution. What is the Bible promise of this Restitution? This; only what "the holy prophets" teach, not what fair-chancers, Universalists and Partialists teach. Those "whom the heaven must receive until the times of restitution of all things spoken by the mouth of all the holy prophets since the world began." No one thing taught by any man, by any church, is "the restitution;" to know what that is, we must consult what "the holy prophets" have said. If they have said in plain words what the fair-chancers say, all right; if not, all wrong.

But before examining them, let me in a few brief words reduce their theory to an absurdity. Their doctrine is, that all who have not had during life "one fair chance," will be raised sometime during the ages to that fair chance. Very well. Now there will be enough of these at Christ's second advent to densely populate our earth; and during his reign and at its end, to pile them upon one another several stories high! Again: there must all be raised mortal for that "one fair chance." They will be raised without friends, without a home or country, without water, provisions, clothing, or property of any kind, strangers in a strange land. Who would think of offering such as these a "fair chance" for eternal life? Poverty, hunger, nakedness, thirst, and the want of all other necessaries of life, to say nothing of its comforts, would roll their indescribable sufferings upon them, more than paralleling the fabled sufferings of the damned!

We now notice the words restore and restitution. Restore—"To replace; to return; as a person or thing to a former place."—Webster. Restitution: "The act of recovering to a former place."—Webster. These are the literal definitions of these words. Their meaning then would be, 1, To place Adam and Eve back in Eden in a mortal state as before the fall and curse; or 2, To place the race there in that state, provided the race had ever been there. Would either of these satisfy the fair-chancers? Nay, verily; but they would be a literal restitution. Are both, or either of them, the Bible restitution? No! So no man's doctrine of restitution will do. We discard all, and take the doctrine of "the holy prophets" only. They teach that all will not be raised; that some have already received their final doom; that all will not be saved, and that many will be damned, burned up, destroyed, etc., etc.

8. The fair-chancers' definition and doctrine of the word "all" unscriptural. It nowhere in the Bible means the race. In many places only a few of a class. And to build a huge system of false philanthropy upon such a word, is neither safe nor wise. I shall give but a very few examples of the many to be found in the Bible.

Mat. viii. 25: "After that he put his hands again upon his eyes, and made him look up; and he was restored, and saw all men clearly." Did he see the race, past, present, and future?

Mark xvi. 15: "And he said unto them, Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature." Did they travel over the face of all the earth? and did they preach to every creature?

Consult Mark xi. 32, Joshua vii. 25, and many other Scriptures which, for want of room, I cannot quote, and you will see the absurdity of making the word "all" include the whole race. I shall quote three other texts upon this point only, because they are the strongest to which the fair-chancers could refer.

Rom. xi. 26: "And so all Israel shall be saved." This ought to include every Jew, according to the fair-chancers. How is it, Paul? Are you among the fair-chancers and Universalists? No! Have I not told you better in Rom. ix. 6, 7? "For they are not all Israel which are of Israel: neither, because they are the seed of Abraham, are they all children; but in Isaac shall the seed be called." All Israel, then, in the sense of the promise, will be saved, but not every Jew; therefore every Jew is not of Israel. Ishmael was a son of Abraham, but not by promise; for he was also the son of Hagar. The promised heir must be the son of Sarah as well as of Abraham. Therefore Hagar's son Ishmael could not inherit with Sarah's son Isaac. These two women—Sarah and Hagar—and these two men—Isaac and Ishmael—Paul taught, illustrated the two covenants—one from Mount Sinai in Arabia, the other the Jerusalem from above. That is, as Paul again explains it, Rom. ix. 8, they which are the children of the flesh, they are not the children of God; but the children of promise are counted for the seed." What promise?

Gal. iii. 26-29: "For ye are the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus. For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ. There is neither Jew nor Greek, neither male nor female, there is neither bond nor free; for ye are all one in Christ Jesus. And if ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise." That promise, Gen. xii. 1-3: "Now the Lord said unto Abraham, Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, unto a land which I shall show thee; and I will make thee a great nation, and I will bless thee, and make thy name great; and thou shalt be a blessing: and I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee; and in thee shall all the families of the earth be blessed."

Rom. viii. 22: "For we know that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now. And not only they," ("the whole creation") "but we ourselves also." Here is the broadest, most comprehensive words known to the English language; and if Paul understood how to use language, this being a fair translation, these words did not include himself and fellow apostles; because, after having used that phrase, in order to include himself and apostles he added, "we ourselves also." Hence if Paul or any of the apostles had said "the whole creation," would be saved, or if Universalists should say it, or if the fair-chancers should say "the whole creation" should be raised to "one fair chance," neither one nor the other would be true, Paul being judge.

The power of a man's virtue should not be measured by his special efforts, but by his ordinary doing.—Pascal.

It takes four things to be a gentleman—you must be a gentleman in your principles, a gentleman in your tastes, a gentleman in your manner, and a gentleman in your person.

"Work, for the night is coming;
Work through the morning hours:
Work while the dew is sparkling;
Work 'mid springtime flowers:
Work when the day grows brighter, work in the glowing sun,
Work, for the night is coming, when man's work is done."

To breathe upon the heart of man, overladen by worldly business, the air of heavenly holy beauty, is to recommend the charms of truth and goodness, to win thereby the affections of men from vice and error, and fan those lofty aspirations which are kindred to devotion, is the noble moral of art.—*Hunter's C. God lives though all his power, unwasted, subsists
The unending scale of universal motion.
His smile of love on star and violet sleeps,
And whispers in the evening zephyr's devotion.
We all are in one school,
Each hath his daily lesson, line on line:
Not slender chastisement and sufferer rude
God doth for some design.
—E. H. more Gladstone.

We walk upon the verge of two worlds; at our feet lies the very grave that awaits us.

"He is faithful that hath promised, he will surely come quickly!
He'll keep his tryst with me, at what hour I shall know him;
But he bids me still to watch, and ready now to be
To greet at any moment, for his coming."

The faithful teaching of the truth as it is in Christ, the earnest preaching of the Word of God, the holding fast of the simple elements of the gospel in their divine and living power constitute the best possible means of stopping the course of error, and accelerating the progress of truth.

Look to the glorious resurrection morn,
That "morning without clouds," which soon will dawn,
When Christ will come to free his own from death
Making them glorious as his glorious self,
To dwell with him in everlasting joy.

"That morn will soon be here; see yet the sun
Has dawned again upon the slumbering world
The Lord may come to take his people home.
Oh, blessed hope! oh, truth divinely true!
Most joyful news for thee, O Church of God!"

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

The Annual Assembly of the Church of God will, if the Lord will, convene at the House of the Brethren, in Winchester, Va., on Friday the 7th, before the second Sunday in September, and as it is to be a conference of committees, appointed by various churches in the East, in order to effect a more general union to work in the Lord's vineyard, all of the brethren in Christ, everywhere, who have not been conferred with, as well as all who have, are respectively invited, and all who cannot attend in person, are requested to represent themselves whether individually or collectively, by letter. H. V. Reed, J. W. Wilson, Samuel Wilson, and other able ministers of the Word, are expected to be in attendance. All coming by rail will be met at the Winchester depot, and conducted to the House of the Brethren, where they will be cared for as long as it may suit them to stay.

POSTPONEMENT.

The Arkansas State Christian Conference will hold its next annual session with the Palarm church, 6 miles east of Conway Station, on the Little Rock and Ft. Smith Railway, to convene on Thursday night before the third Sunday in September, instead as August, as formerly announced. By order of the Executive Board,

N. B. STEBBINS, Sec.

The Lord willing, the Christian association of Iowa will hold a conference meeting at Glad Brook, Tama Co., Iowa, on the Toledo and North Western R. R., commencing Thursday, Sept. 13, 1883, and holding over Sunday or longer if the interest warrants. Churches are requested to send the usual number of delegates, and all preaching brethren throughout the state are requested to be present. By order of the Board.

JOHN FITZ, Sec.

To the Friends of "The Restitution."

The cost of publishing THE RESTITUTION for the year just closed exceeded the receipts over $300. To repay this deficiency and secure means to publish the paper another year, we must raise, outside the regular subscription, at least $300. To secure that amount, the Board of Directors have requested me to appeal to each subscriber to contribute at least one dollar extra. This is not asked as a donation, but brethren are requested to send names of persons to whom they wish the paper sent, with their contributions and the paper will be sent to such persons in payment for the amounts sent by each.

There are a large number of brethren and sisters in different localities who are unable to pay for the paper, and who would be very glad of the privilege of reading it. These are known to Brother Chaplin, the Editor. I would suggest that brethren who have no one to whom they specially desire to send the paper, send their contributions to THE RESTITUTION office with a request that the paper be sent to some worthy Christian who will appreciate it, but who is unable to pay for it. In this way brethren will be able to gladden the hearts of many poor but honest good Christians, and at the same time help to furnish the means to keep the paper going.

The fund will be known as "Free Will Offerings." Let each reader of THE RESTITUTION make a small sacrifice, and contribute at least one dollar, always remembering that the many persons to whom the paper will be thus sent will thank and bless you, and your reward, Father will record you.

R. S. [illegible], Pastor.

THE RESTITUTION.

TERMS—TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR, Payable in advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.

Address all Letters and Communications to The Restitution, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the full restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of Kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations: the restoration of Israel: the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked—to eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

BRITISH PHASE OF THE EASTERN QUESTION.—No. 36.

Points of identity further examined. 7. Aborigines die out—8. Canaanites shall leave Israel—9. Her army—10 Her navy—11. Above all other nations. 12. Must be without a king many years—13. In their worship—14. Money lenders—15. Authors and views.

7. Aborigines of Israel's colonies must die out.—This particularly true of Jacob's seed by Joseph, whose stick is in the hand of Ephraim. Jacob's seed was to be preserved. "Though I make a full end of all nations whither I have scattered thee, yet will I not make a full end of thee: but I will correct thee in measure and will not leave thee altogether unpunished." Jer. xxx. 10, 11; see also Jer xlvi. 27, 28. This will be clearly understood when we examine the blessings on Joseph, Gen. xlviii. 16-19. Ephraim was to be so increased as to become a multitude of nations. As they increase, the native population decreases till, in many countries they become extinct. As John the Baptist said of Christ, "He must increase but I must decrease," so do the natives decrease before this foreign population. The Indians are decreasing before the Saxons in America. Two large tribes have disappeared in Tasmania. "At the present death-rate, twenty years will exterminate the Maories of New Zealand. that in many of our smaller colonies they are already totally extinct."—Hine.

8. Canaanites about Israel.—The Lord commanded Israel to drive out the Canaanites. The reasons were obvious, lest they should be corrupted by their heathenish idolatry. But when they found comfortable homes they allowed the Canaanites to dwell among them. This was displeasing to the Almighty, who declared that they should be pricks in their eyes, thorns in their sides, and should vex them in the land wherein they should dwell. Num. xxxiii. 55. "They shall be snares and traps unto you, scourges in your sides." Jos. xxiii. 13. The people of South Ireland, according to the early Israelitish colonization enterprize already considered, are Phœnician or Canaanites. Since they once spoke the Phœnician language (Hebrew), had an alphabet of sixteen letters, and they also boast of their Canaanitish descent. They have decreased one million in the last twenty years.

9. Israelitish army.—Ephraim was, at an early period, powerful in war. The inspired history of Joseph (whose stick or nationality was in the hand of Ephraim) indicates the warrior: "But his bow abode in strength, and the arms of his hands were made strong by the hands of the mighty (God) of Jacob." Gen. xlix. 24. After their captivity (of the ten tribes) we have the following from inspired prophets: "Therefore shall the strong people glorify thee, the city of the terrible nations shall fear thee." Isa. xxv. 3. "They that war against thee shall be as nothing." Isa. xli. 12. "The nations shall see and be confounded at all their might; they shall lay (their) hand upon (their) mouth, their ears shall be deaf." Micah vii. As the Israelites were to the heathen, so have the British been to the heathen. Vast multitudes have almost uniformly fled before an inferior force.

10. Powerful in her navy.—Her island would require a strong navy. In defending her colonies a strong navy would be necessary. "They went down to the sea in ships, and did business in great waters." Psa. cvii. 23; see Kings ix. 27.

11. Her power superior to any other nation. — Her mission requires this. The stick (national power) of Joseph was to be in the hand of Ephraim, including Manasseh. This nationality was to defend Judah and Israel in the first stages of their return. It is written of Israel, "God hath chosen thee to be a special people unto himself above all people that are on the face of the earth." Deut. vii. 6; xiv. 2. "The Lord hath avouched thee this day to be his peculiar people as he hath promised thee, to make thee above all nations" Deut. xxvi. 18, 19. "The Lord thy God will set thee on high above all (Gentile) nations of the earth." Deut. xxviii. 1. These passages may look to the coming age when Jesus their Messiah shall be their visible head; still, it has a nearer aspect. While the remnant nation is gathering it requires a powerful, visible, national protector. Thus is Ephraim with his fellow tribes and Jewish companions, as taught in Eze. xxxvii. 16-28. The British empire is such a protector, aided by the United States.

12. Many days without a king.—"For the children of Israel shall abide many days without a king and without a prince." Hos. iii. 4. This prophecy was uttered B. C. 785. From that day to their settlement in their island home they were tribes rather than kingdoms; such is strictly true of the infancy of the British nation.

13. In their worship.—The various rites and ceremonies, their Sabbath and their various religious institutions indicate a Hebrew origin. They were not derived from the heathen.

14. Money lenders.—This will suit the British nation and no other. Deut. xv; xxviii. 12, 13. "For Lord thy God blesseth thee as he promised thee: and thou shalt lend unto many nations but thou shalt not borrow; and thou shalt reign over many nations, but they shall not reign over thee. The Lord shall open unto thee his good treasure, the heaven to give the rain unto thy land in its season, and to bless all the work of thine hand: and thou shalt lend unto many nations, and thou shalt not borrow. And the Lord shall make thee the head and not the tail; and thou shalt be above only, and thou shalt not be beneath; if that thou hearken unto the commandments of the Lord thy God which I command thee this day to observe and do.(them)." Facts will prove this identity of the British nation. Let us examine a few authors on this identity: "Foreign countries have, during the last thirty years added three thousand million pounds sterling to their debts, and the British people are the great lenderal!"—Westminster Review. "The creation of wealth in England during the century is a main fact in modern history. The wealth of England determines prices all over the globe."—Emerson. "The amount of interest paid on our enormous loans in England alone exceeds six millions sterling in a single month."—Carpenter.

"And while we have lent and are lending at two and three per cent., the amount of unemployed capital is so great that borrowers cannot be found. 'Shall not borrow!' Who can tell me the time when Britain asked a loan from any Gentile nation? Why, such an idea would be laughed at all over the nation."—Paul. Who does not see that the British empire has inherited the blessings of Ephraim. "Who shall bless thee with blessings of heaven above, blessings of the deep that lieth under, blessings of the breasts and of the womb." Gen. xlix. 25. Ephraim having the stick of Joseph. What vast treasures has she drawn from the sea. No nation has ever equaled the British commerce, increased more rapidly, or have been more abundantly blessed with the dews and showers of heaven. Such, it was required, that Ephraim should be in order that his seed (family) should become a multitude of nations. This identity can be amplified to any extent.

In noticing so many identifications, one thing should be observed: They should be considered as a whole. Where can any other nation be found with so many resemblances? Herein is the point of proof, that England resembles Ephraim in the three great classes of blessings: 1. Those from the heavens; 2. Those from the ocean; 3. For increase like fishes by shoals or colonies.

We have given but a tithe of the evidence which might be adduced to sustain the British claim to an Israelitish origin. These are stated that the reader may be awakened to an examination of the subject. To those who desire to investigate the subject more extensively we would direct their attention to the following authors among many others that have written: 1. Elias Boudinot, Ll. D., who wrote in favor of the North American Indians; 2. "Our Israelitish Origin," by J. Wilson; an able work and one that in many particulars seems to be the root of many other works; 3. Joseph Wolf, who finds the lost tribes in China; 4. Dr. Grant, who writes in favor of the Nestorian claims; 5. Sir William Jones, a very learned author who decides in favor of the Afghans; 6. Mrs. Dixon decides in favor of the Mexicans and Peruvians; 7. Rev. J. Samuels who places the ten tribes somewhere about the Caspian Sea; 8. Dr. Claudius Buchanan places them still in Central Asia. We have no doubt that Israelitish blood courses through the veins of nearly all Asiatic nations: but what one can be called the stick of Joseph in the hand of Ephraim? 9. W. H. Pool of Toronto; 10. Dr. Branow, Astronomer Royal of Ireland, 11. Edward Hine; 12. Rev. F. R. Glover; 13. Dr. W. Holt Yates; 14. Bishop Titcomb; 15. Prof. C. Piazzi Smyth, F. R. S., S. L. E., Astronomer Royal of Scotland; 16. Lieut. Col. Vallancey, Ll. D., Sir Walter Elliott, K. C. S. I.; 17. Major H. A. Tracey, R. A.; 18. Canon Brownrigg; 19. Dr. Latham; 20. Dr. Potter. This list might be much extended since this subject within the last half century has commanded some of the ablest minds in the British empire. God makes use of human agents to carry out his divine purposes of national government, so that events seem to transpire in a natural way and to be under the entire control of human might, both physically and intellectually, while Almighty power lies behind the curtain managing the whole machinery. Without a clear view of the workings of this invisible Actor, prophecy would be uncertain.

If human governments are not under the control of such a divine directory, how could the prophets forecast so accurately the number, character, and movements of the empires? God must have deliberated and fixed their elements before he made any revelation to his ancient seers. The monarchs of the four Gentile governments appear to revolve in the sphere of absoluteism. Still, they were under a higher control as was evinced in the humiliation of Nebuchadnezzar. The Metallic Image is a picture in the book of divine symbols. It was then a picture of what should be. it is now an equally correct picture of what has been. Prophecy is history in advance.

Human elements have to be shaped in the divine mold; such as resist all higher impressions are removed, other materials, more readily fused, are substituted. Thus moves the Corliss engine that controls the universe.

The stone, becoming a mountain, is also a picture in the book of symbols. Its elements are fixed and sure. The elements that will gather around the stone are in the process of preparation and are about being gathered.

He that studies authentic history is simply following the footprints of the Deity. Let him go to the Bible for the key of this historic volume. God has promised the earth's diadem to his beloved Son. He shapes peoples, kingdoms and empires to that ultimate end. We cannot look upon the map of human rule, without becoming at once interested in the constantly changing boundary lines of its mighty empires. Cast your eye over the chart of eastern empires, the political chessboard of the East. The moves are for the sceptre of universal empire. The chiefs of the game are called the king of the north and the king of the south. The land of Israel being the observatory, the king occupying Syria at the appointed time and at the appointed conflict would be the king of the north; and the power occupying Egypt at that time would be the king of the south. Such is evidently the proper interpretation of these terms.

The empires, whose boundaries are gradually approaching each other, are too well defined not to be known: the Russian empire at the head of the Mongolian race and the kings of the east; and the British empire, the powerful tribe of Ephraim, the head and protector of Israel and Judah, and God's Lieutenant under his Son, the Messiah, King of kings. The forces are now gathering and disciplining for this terrible campaign, and death struggle upon the mountains of Israel. It is with intense interest that we view the gathering elements of this coming storm: on the one side the robbers, on the other, the protectors of God's people; while the Ottoman empire, like a Chinese wall, trembles at the hostile tread of the advancing armies. In the land of Israel, within and around Jerusalem, are quietly returning the elements of that elect kingdom, which, under the Messiah, will fill the earth with his righteousness and glory. We propose to show, in its proper place, that Judah and Israel are now gathering to their own land.

J. P. WESTHEER.

JERUSALEM, July 2, '83.

Editor Restitution:

Once more we find ourselves on a few hours to enjoy the fresh sea breeze beneath the friendly boughs of our fig tree west of the city. This is to us one of the grandest spots about Jerusalem: two great flat rocks afford us both seats and table to spread our lunch on, and the tree stands between them, so you see when the sun changes around we change places. This tree is just loaded with fruit but not ripe. In this country it is customary to eat all the fruit one wants while on the premises without asking permission, but none must be carried away; in that case it would be theft.

From here we have one of the finest views to be obtained about Jerusalem. We look away to the southeast about a mile and have a splendid view of Mt. Zion, both inside and outside the wall; and looking straight over this wonderful point of interest, Moab stands out to view as it is seldom seen, but little of that blue smoke that usually hangs over it. Now I stand upon the rock and let my eyes drop down the side of Moab till they rest on the black looking waters of the Dead Sea. Now by turning a quarter round, I behold to the south and a little east, the hill of Evil Counsel where Judas bargained for the 30 pieces of silver; this is also called Aceldama. How strange that those evil men chose the same spot for their counsel of treachery that was afterward purchased with this blood money for a stranger's burying place. Now let us leave those poor creatures in this place for the present, for they dare not make a move till the night comes. And once more we turn and look right over the city to the Mount of Olives, and at the foot of this is the garden, at the same hour (no doubt) chosen by the assembly we just left. Here we find our Lord and Master, kneeling or prostrate upon the rocks, pleading with the Father for help, yea for strength to do the will of God, that he might have power over the flesh and endure the insults and abuse that he knew was soon to be heaped upon him.

So here he waits for them to come; if a thought of fleeing once entered his mind it was banished the same instant, for full well he knew that for this purpose had he come unto this hour; escape from what the Almighty God had appointed him to from the beginning was as impossible as for a canoe to be rowed up over the Niagara. He laid down his life, stood his ground, submitted to everything, and died praying for those poor souls who committed this awful deed.

But we will leave this sad scene, for night has come and the shadow of the city wall wraps our suffering Redeemer in darkness and all is still; for that same drowsiness that now has fallen upon a doubting, unbelieving people, had overcome those of his followers who had accompanied him to within a stone's throw of his present position. Now we will return to those parties where we left them about a mile and a quarter by the road I imagine they came, down the mountain by a winding path, past the Pool of Siloam, enter Jehoshaphat, and follow up the brook Kedron under cover of Mt. Moriah, and the temple towering high above them, but they push on and soon arrive at the place the prince of this world was leading them to. What followed is not necessary for me at this time to relate, for all have heard the sad story repeated time and again.

Returning to our picnic, we have had a water melon, a good substantial lunch, and are passing the time in various ways. Mrs. D. reading, Mrs. W. making some new stockings out of old ones for Horace, and he is climbing around the rocks; for fear of his falling I can scarcely write, so will put him astride my shoulder. Arabic fashion, and off for home. Now, dear reader, it is ten o'clock at night and again I take up my pen. How strange it does appear to me to look over the world knowing that there are thousands of people who believe that we are approaching the time the earth and the inhabitants thereof are dreaming for.

Where are those who see the end near? What are you doing to put forth the human part of the work? Are we found holding on to this world in this late hour? Can't it be given up? O! how it grieves me to see the terrible condition of those who have been claiming so much light, instead of light, however, gross darkness has fallen upon the people; hearts are hardened and filled with doubts and fears. What is the trouble? are the "giants" too large for the God who brought the children of Israel out of Egypt, and over the Red Sea? Has the Lord revealed some other place of deliverance? Has he told anybody that some other earthly power is to possess this land after this sick man who is rapidly growing worse is dead? Will you have smoother water after 1883 to sail over than now? Oh! who will come, having on the armor of God, ready to sacrifice everything, life if need be; why should we be afraid to follow the Lamb whithersoever he may lead; where is our faith in the resurrection?

These questions may out close, but is it not high time that those who have received some light on what we are approaching, were waked out of sleep. O that God would give us that spirit of prayer and supplication; this alone will give us true light. Shall we not all pray for this? Let this be the subject for prayer by all who are looking and longing for the kingdom of God. We hear of cholera in Egypt, it may reach Jerusalem [illegible] Seventeen years ago many [illegible] We are told that such a season as this was never known here before. So much cool weather, clouds heavy and lowering. But then these wonderful changes to those who are watching the signs of the times and ways of God who works through nature's laws, are encouraged for they see that all things do not continue as they were, etc.

IN UNION IS STRENGTH.

This is a true saying, and worthy of acceptation, and one that is universal in its application, both to kingdoms, states, parties, churches, and even families.

So that we can truly say, "united we stand, divided we fall;" while Jesus of Nazareth sanctions the principle by saying, "How can Satan cast out Satan? And if a kingdom be divided against itself, that kingdom cannot stand. And if a house be divided against itself, that house cannot stand." And the Lord by his prophet enquires concerning rebellious Israel, "Can two walk together except they be agreed?" In kingdoms or states there must be submission to the ruling power, that peace and prosperity may ensue: so of churches and parties, if divided by jars and discords they lose their strength, cripple along for a time, and finally fall.

Nor is it necessary to have a pope, either, to rule with rigor. But it is necessary to have some definite system to be governed by, and God fearing men to take the oversight, that success may attend, and the house not fall. This was God's order in past ages, and this was his order as established in the beginning of this age: and who can tell why it should not be so even to this day?

Just so of a house or family, there ought to be union both in principle and as to who shall stand at the helm and execute that principle. If not, then confusion, disorder and every evil work is the result, each member of the family going pell-mell with a high heat and singing, "I'll paddle my own canoe." Let us suppose a case, and we will not go out of the world to find it. Here is a house or family composed of husband and wife and children; and to illustrate, we will say that the man—who Paul says is the head—is religiously inclined, devotional, wishing to spend a part of his time in reading, meditation, prayer and praise, walking by faith, and living for the world to come. While on the other hand, the woman, whom God gave to be a helpmeet or mate for him, is very worldly-minded, her whole time and energies are spent and bent on "what shall we eat? or wherewithal shall we be clothed?"—forgetting that this is the way the heathen Gentiles live. No time or disposition to read the good Book, our Heavenly Father's will, that must judge us all on the last day. Except it be on Sunday, with nothing else to do, and no one present, she may perchance pore over a chapter or so, being half asleep and half awake. This is a sad but true life picture of a house divided against itself; where one of the principal members is making a strong death-pull for this present evil world to the exclusion of that better land. Now it is perfectly right that we work for our bread and clothing, and that we obtain an honest living in an honest way. And more, if we sit down and do nothing, we get nothing, which is about all we deserve. But our Savior and our best friend, has taught us distinctly not to lay up treasure on earth, but rather in heaven; and not to spend all our time and talent on this poor fleeting life, but rather seek first of all the kingdom of God and his righteousness, then the things pertaining to this life. We hazard nothing in saying that those who love God will not only love their brothers, but will naturally love God's word, will earnestly desire the sincere milk of the word that he may grow thereby, and will feast upon it in order to keep alive that life begun which we live by faith in the Son of God.

In conclusion, let me say, let us try to be consistent, and be wise concerning that which is good; choose that good part, even life eternal, live for it, work for it while it is day; then soon we will share with the good of all ages the good things [illegible] R. S. Water signifies a passing from bank to the other; but simply [illegible] the act of passing from one point to another, though it may be only part way.

I never have, as yet, seen a river that was "uniformly" the same depth (say ankle deep) all the way across. I believe most rivers deepen as you leave the banks. Now it, as Brother Wilcox has said, this river was uniformly "ankle deep" at a point 1,000 cubits distant from the "outer" east gate, what must the depth have been at the threshold of the house, the distance between these points being about 1,250 cubits? Hoping that we may eventually all be permitted to stand upon the banks of this beautiful river, drink of its sparkling waters, and eat of the fruits of the tree of life that will be found growing on the one bank and on the other, I will close my criticism.

Exegetical.

Professor Fredrich Delitzsch takes away the last of the words in the Old Hebrew vocabulary supposed to be of Egyptian origin. Genesis xli. 43 reads: "And he (Pharaoh) made him to ride in the second chariot which he had, and they cried before him, Abrek; and he made him ruler over all the land of Egypt." Respecting this abrek, אברך there are as many as ten different explanations given from the old Egyptian and Coptic languages, the most plausible of them being Benfey's a-barak, "to fall down." However, it is clear that such a word, called out before Joseph when riding in the royal chariot and adorned with the insignia of office, ought to be his title, as many ancient and modern commentators have surmised, among them Luther who rendered it pater regis. It now turns out that abarakku in the Assyrian name of the grand vizier, meaning "father of the king," as Luther had it, and analogous to the Turkish title atabek, "father-prince," the high official holding the office of eponym, and together with the turtan, the highest dignitary of the empire—higher in rank than the shakan mati or head of all the provincial governors. He is also called "The friend of the king." The reading of his ideogram as abarakku is confirmed by the tablet S. 61, where, among a number of Sumerian and Assyrian proverbs, we read "The liberality of the king insures the liberality of the magnate"; and "The liberality of the king insures the liberality of the abarakku"; an exact equivalent of the English proverb: "Like master like man." The feminine abarakkatu is applied, in like manner, to goddesses as the highest administrators of the sanctuary.—N. Y. Independent.

THE RESTITUTION.

R. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, Aug. 15, 1883.

CROWDED as we have been with original articles some have been considerably deferred in the past few weeks, and we have still to postpone the publication of some on hand. Be patient.

If God, as may possibly be the case, has judged, doomed, and capitally executed many incorrigible sinners, there is no gospel for them. The dead heathen are beyond our reach. Hence for ourself we follow the course so highly commended by Brother Malone, of preaching the glorious gospel of the kingdom in its provisions, promises, hopes and requirements to the living with whom we come in intercourse. We will say, however, that quite another view of the subject is entertained and advocated with his usual ability by the author of the work entitled "Atheism and Theism," which we advertise, as well as by several articles in different periodicals which come to hand. While we may see some things through a "glass darkly," its colors may be so deep in other places that we may not see at all. Yet the Judge of all the earth will do right.

WE clip the following kind notice from the Christian Helper, a monthly published at Scranton, Iowa, by H. G. McClintock, at 50cts. a year. We advocate the restoration of literal Israel to the land of their fathers" because the prophets foretell such a restoration in these precise words. See Ezek. xxxvii. 21–28. As the time for their restoration is now just about due, and as they are already returning to their own land, we do hope, that one long, —seeing will be believing. We call attention to the article, "The lonely people and their lonely book," in this number.

"THE RESTITUTION, S. A. Chaplin, Editor, Plymouth, Ind., a weekly, two dollars per year. While it advocates the restoration of literal Israel to the land of their fathers, it breathes a kind and Christian spirit. Of that there may be union and co-operation among all who wait for God's Son."

ISRAEL AND THE BIBLE.

When the infidel king demanded the proof that the Scriptures were of divine origin in a single word, the triumphant answer was given—ISRAEL. The preservation of this wonderful people [illegible] been the continuous miracle of ages. All the destructive agencies that have been so potent in utterly wiping out of existence the mightiest nations of antiquity, and their world-wide empires, have been brought to bear upon the small tribal race, and like their symbol bush in flames, Israel has never been consumed. And furthermore, this people is today the only nation of which we can say its grandest destiny is to be realized in the future. The prophet and not the historian, writes the annals. That divine foreordination that has predetermined the supremely glorious national exaltation to Israel, has linked their glories with ages yet to come. And we, too, are living in that crisis of history when the startling blast of the great trumpet is about to echo to the ends of the world, to summon the outcasts home from their long and dreary exile among the nations.

But let us bear in mind that the trump of Israel's jubilee will be the trump of judgment doom to all their wicked oppressors. And, when the name of the infidel has rotted, and a full end has been made of all ungodly dynasties and apostate religions, then Israel will blossom and bud, and fill the face of the world with fruit. And now while Israel continues a living proof of the inspiration of Holy Writ, the ruins of past ages are opening up their long concealed records in attestation of the truth of God's Word. Bless God, there are some records that time has never blotted out, and these are records whose antiquity cannot be questioned, and whose authenticity has never been corrupted. A revelation has been written in the stones, and the Savans are reading the rocky pages in the ears of the world. From the crypts of the sepulchre the royal mummy comes forth in his imperishable cerements to testify for God. To our own porcilings we subjoin the following from the New York Independent:

THE LONELY PEOPLE AND THEIR LONELY BOOK.

The Hebrews were a hermit nation. They lived lonely, without companion or fellow. They received from their neighbors, they gave to their neighbors no sympathy or kinship of heart. They had a separate idea of God, one personal, supreme, jealous God, and they had from Him one Book, jealously supreme and regally authoritative, one Book, only one. How peculiar and strange Book. Because they were a people of one God and one Book we look back and we see them—the world looks up and sees them towering high and isolated above the buried and sand-strown ruins of the kingdoms and empires that surround them.

Do we consider how unique is that Hebrew race and that Hebrew Book? We cannot explain it except by the story of the revelation which it contains how that insignificant little handful of men, holding the same old's few promises in one of our states, surrounded by people who gave themselves up to the grossest paganism, could have grasped and held the sublime conviction of one God. Only as that one people, no different in race from the people around them, not equal in native endowment to the most races of the world, was God so clearly manifested that He was approached as the one only supreme Creator God! What was there in that little strip of seashore, with no harbor, no commerce, that narrow line of land bounded by the sea on the west and by a little stream on the east running from a fresh pond in the north to a salt pond in the south, at once by the stimulus of no foreign intercourse—a race of enslaved slaves of peasant farmers, what was there in their environments that gave promise of the intuition which should see duty and see God as no other race has ever done except as it borrowed its inspiration from that inspiration which possessed that Jewish people? All there we have the answer! The inspiration which possessed them came by the revelation of God. It came to them in God's wise ordination, not to the quick-witted, world-encompassing Phenician traders from the ports of Tyre and Sidon; not to their stately masters, whose pyramids have seemed worthy to be a revelation from God; not to that proud and fierce people of Assyria to which Palestine was only one of a hundred conquered satrapies; not to that miracle of geniuses, many-harbored Greece; not to imperial and stately Rome—it came not to the world's great ones but to one of the smallest, one of the most insignificant, because God would have it so, and because thus should we see that it was not by human wit but by the very revelation of God.

Do we ever fairly consider the loneliness of that lonely people's Book? Think how it stands out alone. What fellow, what companions had it? What have we had that was coeval with those Hebrew Scriptures? What was there [illegible] Egypt had left a few things, only a few lines of one historian reserved by the Christian historian Eusebius, Babylon and Nineveh had cared nothing, not a line except scholar fragments of one historian preserved by deciphers of Rawlins. Persia? Persia only began to be as the Jewish history was ending. Greece? Rome? There was no Greece nor Rome when the splendid Jewish prophets were proclaiming the one Jehovah.

Here, then, appears this one Book full of wondrous history, on whose marvelous revelation our own fuller Christian faith is built, and we were asked "What evidence have you of its truth? What is there to confirm it?" We were told that its history was false, that it was a late product full of errors, that Xenophon and Arrian told different stories, which were truer than our Bible. What could we do? We could bring no confirmatory proof; for there was none. There was no evidence existing. It was all buried in the grave of the forgotten and irrecoverable past.

But behold a wonder. The earth opens its mouth. The own generation has seen uncovered the monuments of Egypt, Assyria and Palestine, which abundantly prove the truth of the Jewish history. No longer a lonely record, the Old Testament is supported by the exhumed records of the kings of Egypt and Babylon and Nineveh and Moab. We are now shown in the Boulaq Museum the very body of the Egyptian king who oppressed Israel. We know the names of the father and the grandfather of Ariosh, King of Elasar, who fought in the confederacy against King of Sodom. At a hundred points confirmatory evidence has been dug out of Assyrian ruins. In the day when the lonely Book was attacked by unbelief, there appeared out of the very ground hosts of defenders. God's providence supports his Book.

AMERIGUS VESPUCIUS' DESCENDENCE.

He gave his name to a world and left his descendents in poverty. Two feeble old women, the last descendants of Americus Vespucius, have petitioned the Italian Government for a pension of 60 pauls—about $—a month an allowance made by the Republic of Florence in 1500. The last male member of the family, named Americ, died seven years ago.

Communications.

ADRIAN, Mich.

Editor Restitution:

I must try to explain to you why I have not paid for my paper this season. I ordered it stopped until I could pay, but received a card from the office to pay whenever I could, and not have it stopped. Well I was in hopes to pay before now, but could not, and cannot for a few weeks longer, I am building, not that I expect to have much to enjoy a new house, for I only expect to occupy until Christ come. My husband is in debt, and for a number of years has tried to get out, he cannot do it alone. One fall I had three extra boarders, had no lower room to keep them over night, and while from supplying the table we saved every penny. This set me to thinking, and I commenced to asking a way to be opened to me out of my Father in heaven. It did not seem possible at first, but as I prayed, the way was made plain, and the help I asked of him came. I [illegible] him to let me sit still and [illegible] means poured into my lap. It is so grand! I told him I would work, and work very hard, if he would give me the strength to do so.

Brethren, can you believe me when I say, so far God has [illegible] me for beyond my asking?

Although not very strong now, I am better in health than in fifteen years, and have worked very hard. My house is now ready for plastering. I have added six good rooms to what I had, and will be able to keep eight boarders. Have done all the lathing, [illegible] except overhead.

About Sept. 1, when our children open for school, I want to begin my new business, and with the help and strength the Lord has given me I cannot doubt that I shall succeed.

But the best of all is when my house is completed I shall only have debts for it about $300, and have two years or longer to make it up. I took this burden (as the Lord's agent) from my husband's shoulders, according to special agreement.

Just before this matter came to mind I was very ill, and two physicians said I had but a few months to live. I told the Lord if he would spare me to accomplish this purpose and leave my family out of debt, I was ready, but I have walked so closely with God this summer, and consulted and sought his guidance so much that I now feel ready to obey his will, whether the summons [illegible] morn, [illegible] night—in [illegible] houses or wild. The tempest used to be a terrible dread to me, but now there is such a calm within in the wildest storm. I cannot doubt that God has heard me all through, that he is pleased with the motives that have prompted this action. I think I know in fact, it is wholly unselfish and without worldly ambition, and from a little place that would scarce bring $400 is now worth $2500; hence you see that should I fail to pay, the property would bring more than twice as much if sold. By Sept. 1, I hope to have all finished, and in the meantime pay just as much as is in my power to do. I shall make no boasts of what I shall do in the future, for I have only today, but it is my aim to do all things to honor God in the days that he appoints for me.

I will send the money for the paper just as soon as it can be spared from hiring my help—and here let me say, my laborers are all poor men, and receive their full wages every Saturday night. The money I borrowed was from one who could spare it as well as not, that I might not keep a poor man [illegible] for a few days. I want to write for the paper but hands have been too full. Now I trust you will forgive me for my seeming neglect.

One who looks at this building as God's work, has requested me to write an article on the words "Abide in me," or what it is to be in Christ. I will try to get the time as soon as possible. He wants my views.

Mrs. Davis is going to send me some cards of flowers to dispose of for her, and wants me to fix the price. Will you please give some idea of what I shall ask for them, and how to send money to her. I have sent her seeds, and shall send other things this fall.

Pardon this hastily written letter, and pray that I may not live in God's beautiful world in vain.

Your Sister in Christ.

MRS. O. F. HALL.

THE DRIFT.

PROGRESS IN PALESTINE.

In a letter in the Austrian Zeitschrift for the Orient, Herr C. Schick, Government surveyor of buildings in Jerusalem, gives some interesting facts to show the progress made in Palestine during the last twenty-five years. This is especially true in the erection of many new buildings. In the small village [illegible] Nazareth, Tiberias, Tabor, Nablus, Jiffa, Ramallah, Bait-Jal, Jyalil, etc. Schools have a number of [illegible] especially in Jerusalem, been built during the twenty-five years. All this progress must not be taken as a sign of any laxity in religion on the part of the Mahommedans, who have during this time built many new mosques, and otherwise shown themselves as much attached to their religion as ever. Science, also, is much more impartially [illegible], and the old barbarous punishments have been abolished. In Jerusalem, the sanitary department is in charge of a German physician, and building affairs are in the hands of a German architect.—Philadelphia Ledger.

SELECTED MISCELLANY.

An expedition to explore the bottom of the Red Sea is said to have been organized. A sum of 750,000f. has been already subscribed for the purpose, and steps will speedily be taken to drag the Red Sea and the Bitter Lakes, with the view of bringing to light such remains as there may be of "the chariots and the horsemen and all the host of Pharaoh."

Cetewayo, whom the British Government recently restored to his throne as King of Zululand, has been killed with his wives and his chiefs. Immediately on his return from England an insurrection broke out against Cetewayo. He had lost his prestige by his defeat by the British, and his country having been divided up among the chiefs, he found it difficult to re-establish his authority. He raised a small army and endeavored to quell the insurrection, but his enemies combined against him, and thoroughly routed his troops, and killed him and his family and officers.

Hicks Pasha's last victory over the Soudan insurgents, in which the slaughter was so one-sided, is accounted for by the fact that a great lady of the Mahdi's force attacked a position at Wandia where Hicks' mitrailleuses, mortars, and twelve field guns had full sweep. He was thus able to mow down the enemy for half an hour, and only lost two men himself. One of the lieutenants of the False Prophet lately claimed that he had 85,000 men, the forces and their leaders being reorganized in detail; and, having given the exact strength, he added, with an imaginative touch, "We are coming with armies whose numbers can only be counted by the Most High, and with arms which you possess not, including rockets and Remingtons." But if El Mahdi even had an easily counted number of breechloaders and Gatlings, he might make things dark for Gen. Hicks and the Khedive.

The tombs of Egypt continue to furnish evidence in support of the Scriptures. In one at Sakkarat the name and titles of Joseph have been found, and inscriptions virtually calling him the savior of the people. In another at Thebes a painting has been discovered, which it is decided represents the Hebrews making bricks. In every field of oriental archæology confirmations of the Scriptures are found.

Tom Thumb, the dwarf, whose real name is Charles S. Stratton, died of apoplexy, at his residence in Middleboro, Mass., Sunday, July 15. He was over 45 years old and 32 to 36 in high, and had been upon exhibition about 30 years. His wife, to whom he was married in 1863, is also a dwarf. He was born in Bridgeport, Ct., Jan. 4, 1838, and was the third of four children—two boys and two girls—all of whom were of ordinary stature.

THE SCORPION.

Dr. C. J. Wills, late one of the medical officers of Her Majesty's telegraph department in Persia, in his volume on Modern Persia says that he had heard from a Swedish physician at Shiraz that scorpions, when they see no chance of escaping capture, commit suicide. He told me, that when one was surrounded by a circle of live coals it ran round three times and then stung itself to death. I did not credit this, supposing that the insect was probably scorched, and so died. I happened one day to catch an enormous scorpion of the black variety. In Persia there are two kinds, black, and light-green, or greenish-yellow; the black variety being supposed to be much the more venomous. The full-grown scorpions generally are from two to three inches long; I have seen one five inches when extended from the tip of the claws to the sting, but he was phenomenal. The one I caught was very large, and to try the accuracy of what I supposed to be a popular superstition, I prepared in my courtyard a circle of live charcoal a yard in diameter. I cooled the bricks with water so that the scorpion could not be scorched, and tilted him from the finger-glass in which he was imprisoned unhurt into the centre of the open space; he stood still for a moment, then, to my astonishment, ran rapidly round the circle three times, came back to the centre, turned up his tail (where the sting is) and deliberately, by three blows, stabbed or stung himself in the head; he was dead in an instant. Of the curious scene I was an eye-witness, and I have seen it repeated by a friend in exactly the same way since, on my telling the thing, and with exactly the same result. For the truth of this statement I am prepared to vouch."

THE DAY IS AT HAND.

The wild beasts of the night who have roamed this dark and bloody wilderness and devoured much flesh," are trembling. Something in the eastern sky troubles them. The morning birds and day animals are waking; the people, long trodden down by king and priest, are moving. They feel the influence of approaching morning. The statesman and moralist are busy with schemes for realizing the ideal government. The clergy are hastening the Bible to all lands, hoping to make day-light with their lamps. The socialist, communist, and nihilist, drunken from the apocalyptic whore's golden cup, and maddened by oppression, reach wildly after a perfect government.

But the student of the sure word of prophecy waits for the morning without clouds,—the rising of the Sun of Righteousness,—who having, along the ages, chosen the officers for his kingdom, tried them, and found them faithful, will make them princes in all the earth,—will give them "the kingdom and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heavens." Dan. vii 27. Then will be established a government so strong that none can oppose, so good that none can complain. All its officers will be pure, wise and merciful; and like their King, having suffered wrong will hate it, and drive it from the earth. The Son of man will avenge the wrongs of his children, and restore to the family their old estate. Under his righteous reign, "the inhabitants of the world will learn righteousness," Isa. xxvi. 9; and living delivered from the dead ones, "All the ends of the world shall remember and turn unto the Lord: and all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before thee: for the kingdom is the Lord's, and he is the governor among the nations." Psa. xxii. 27, 28. Then will they join in the chorus: "Blessing and honor, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever." Rev. v. 13.—C. in Watchman's Alarm.

News Items.

CAIRO, August 9.—Floods in Egypt are feared, owing to the unusually rapid rise of the Nile.

ALEXANDRIA, August 14.—The number of deaths here from cholera yesterday was fourty-four.

LONDON, August 14.—There were 470 deaths from cholera in Egypt Monday, including six at Cairo.

The Peninsular and Oriental steamers will cease calling at Alexandria for the present, owing to the difficulty and danger of shipping the Indian mails on the open coast at Mex, in conformity with the order of the Sanitary Board. The Postmaster-General has decided that the Peninsular steamers shall take the Indian mails direct from Port Said to Italy, and from Italy to Port Said, without calling at Alexandria. The Egyptian local mails will probably be carried between Port Said and Alexandria by the weekly Khedivial steamer.

The whole gendarmery cordon from Kiltaryeh to Rosetta is infected with cholera. There were several painfully sudden deaths today of ladies in good position. Great faith is placed in the rising of the Nile, and it is hoped that the disease will soon begin to decrease generally.

CONSTANTINOPLE, August 14.—The Sanitary Council has ordered vessels arriving from Smyrna to be subjected to observation for twenty four hours in the Dardanelles. This order is due to the fact that a French man-of-war from Port Said disregarded the quarantine regulations at Smyrna and communicated with the town.

COMTE DE CHAMBORD.

VIENNA, August 14—4:25 p. m.—A telegram just received from Frohsdorf [illegible] Chambord is wrestling with death. The Comte de Paris, the Orleanist Prince, and a number of Legitimist Chiefs have left for Frohsdorf.

VIENNA, August 15—3 a. m.—Crowds stand at the gates of the Comte du Chambord's chateau at Frohsdorf awaiting the sufferer's end.

Another fire horror has startled the English people: An insane asylum at Ealing, Middlesex, burned Monday night. Five of the inmates perished and many were hurt. The proprietor and his son both lost their lives while trying to rescue their unfortunate charges.

The extent of the ravages of the cholera in Egypt may be judged when it is stated that thus far there have been 16,115 deaths from the scourge. The deaths in the city of Cairo alone have exceeded 6,000.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

The Annual Assembly of the Church of God will, if the Lord will, convene at the House of the Brethren, in Winchester, Va., on Friday the 7th before the second Sunday in September, and as it is to be a conference of committees, appointed by various churches in the East, in order to effect a more general union to work in the Lord's vineyard, all of the brethren in Christ, everywhere, who have not been conferred with, as well as all who have, are respectively invited, and all who cannot attend in person, are requested to represent themselves whether individually or collectively, by letter. H. V. Reed, J. W. Wilson, Samuel Wilson, and other able ministers of the Word, are expected to be in attendance. All coming by rail will be met at the Winchester depot, and conducted to the House of the Brethren, where they will be cared for as long as it may suit them to stay.

POSTPONEMENT.

The Arkansas State Christian Conference will hold its next annual session with the Palarm church, 6 miles east of Conway Station, on the Little Rock and Ft. Smith Railway, to convene on Thursday night before the third Sunday in September, instead of August, as formerly announced. By order of the Executive Board,

N. B. RIDGEDILL, Sec.

The Lord willing, the Christian association of Iowa will hold a conference meeting at Glad-Brook, Tama Co., Iowa, on the Toledo and North Western R. R., commencing Thursday, Sept. 13, 1883, and holding over Sunday or longer if the interest warrants. Churches are requested to send the usual number of delegates, and all preaching brethren throughout the state are requested to be present. By order of the Board.

JOHN FITZ, Sec.

The fourth session of Quarterly Conference of the 2d District of Arkansas, will meet with the Annual State Conference, with the Church of God worshiping at Palarm Church, six miles east of Conway, Faulkner Co., commencing on Thursday night before the third Sunday in September. It is desired that every church be represented in this meeting, and to bring a full report of the year's work done at each church, and the number of members. Those that cannot send delegates will please send a report to the secretary. Brethren, come filled with God's love, and strength to push the great work forward. JOHN W. TEAS,

Box 35, Morrilton, Conway co., Ark.

There will be a meeting of days two miles southwest of Prescott, Kan., to commence Saturday before the 3d Sunday in September. W. J. Orem and John Foree are expected. All are invited.

By order of the Congregation.

The undersigned expects to hold a meeting of days at LaFountaine, Kan. commencing Saturday night before the 1st Sunday in September.

ABIDING TRUST.

I love thee, oh our Father, I love thee more and more!
I hope to see thy glory on the everlasting shore.
I trust the Christ Savior's voice to bid his people come
To the new home he has fitted in the new earth's beauteous home.

I am pealing on the pavements of the Heavenly White and clean.
While while patience I am waiting till the kingdom glory's seen;
Soon will the people's hearts as roll together as a scroll,
And the sound and voice and trumpet shake the earth and pole to pole.

Ah, then the sleeping millions into life again will spring;
O grave, where is thy victory? O death where is thy sting?
Gold were but chains that bound them for many a century,
But now thyself a captive eternally shall be.

The kings of earth no longer with tyranny shall sway,
The king of Love will break them as a vessel made of clay.
The clash of carnal weapons forever more shall cease,
And his people shall delight themselves abundantly in peace.

Beside the living fountains in the Lamb-ten Eden of green,
Where sweetest flowers blossom and the tree of life is seen,
The children of the kingdom such blessings there will find,
That this present world of evil will ne'r come into mind.

In their hearts his law is written, and they love his righteous will,
And nothing e'er shall harm them in all his holy hill.
For a knowledge of the Lord of hosts throughout that land shall be,
That all will fill it as in this one the waters fill the sea.

All hail the consummation of God's great glorious plan,
The restitution promised ever since the world began,
When to his faithful children all things he doth restore,
And God himself shall dwell with them on Eden's glorious shore.

Letter Drawer.

MT. JOY, O. Aug. 7, '83.

Editor Restitution:

Enclosed please find $2.00 for my subscription for one year for THE RESTITUTION. I met with Bro. J. P. Weethee last September, in Jackson Co. O., at a religious discussion held between J. B. Taylor and W. McBroom, formed an agreeable acquaintance with him, and found him rich in the faith of the gospel.

Shortly after this THE RESTITUTION came to me and I found it abounded with "good news" to every anxious soul in search of truth, and since then I have read it faithfully, and it has proved nutritious food to my soul.

Recently I saw a notice in its columns that nine ministers were receiving it at Bro. Weethee's expense, and that he could not afford to send it any longer if they did not remit. Thereupon my paper stopped. Now I would like for each one of those ministers to have one more copy of the paper, to contain this notice, and then on reading it send Bro. Weethee or THE RESTITUTION his $2.00—or else give his reasons through the paper for not doing so. I would like to know who the other eight are.

"Praise God from whom all blessings flow," meanwhile would say to Brother Weethee, "Cast thy bread upon the waters, for thou shalt find it after many days." He will probably remember me when he sees my name and address.

I would like to have all the back numbers from the time my paper was stopped till now, if you have them.

To the Editor, S. A. Chaplin, I would say, may God fill your heart with love for the truth, that you may "fight the good fight of faith, lay hold on eternal life, whereunto thou art also called, and hast professed a good profession before many witnesses."

Yours in bonds of love and in hope of immortality and eternal life.

Editor Restitution:

By the favor of some kind and no doubt Christian friend, I have been receiving THE RESTITUTION, which I am free to confess I have read with more than ordinary interest. I feel that I would not like to be without it in my family, and earnestly desire its continuance. I have gained more light on the Scriptures from your paper than from anything I have read. I send you $2.00.

Yours in hope of eternal life.

H. STOCKDALE.

HARRISON, O.

Editor Restitution:

Through the kindness of a friend we have been permitted to read THE RESTITUTION for the last six months, and are so much interested in it that we do not wish to be without it.

We think the articles on the "British Phase of the Eastern Question," and the letters from Jerusalem more than pays for the price of the paper, besides all the other valuable matter it contains. My prayer to God is that he will guide his people into all truth, by enlightening our understanding and giving us willing hearts to receive, and courage to declare it. In this day of fables.

Enclosed you will find one dollar which please credit on my paper.

That God may give you abundant success in your endeavors to spread abroad his truth, is the earnest desire of your sister in Christ.

A. O. SEFTON.

SCRANTON, Pa.

Editor Restitution:

Inclosed is $5.00, which is a donation for the benefit of the much-loved RESTITUTION. I have been a reader of its columns over six years, and it is just as welcome in the house today as it was then. I am sorry the paper is behindhand, and am satisfied if every one of the brethren who can would put their shoulder to the wheel, and give a dollar or two they would lift it out of the mire.

If you know of any poor brethren who would like to read the paper, send it to them, the money is yours to dispose of in any way you think will do the most good in the furtherance of the gospel.

Yours in hope of eternal life.

Editor Restitution:

Please say to the friends of truth, through THE RESTITUTION, that I expect, the Lord willing, to start for central Iowa soon, will stop for a few days at Wilber, Saline Co., Neb., and if any isolated brethren living near my route would like to have me call and preach to their neighbors, they may address me at Wilber. I shall be glad to see any and talk with them of the good time coming. Lord, hasten the day, but not my will be done.

Your brother waiting for immortality.

COLUMBUS, Neb.

Editor Restitution:

Inclosed find $2.00, free will offering from myself and wife. We are now living two miles northwest of Columbus, having moved with my family last March from Canton, O., where we had resided some twenty-five years. There we used to meet with the little band every first day, but since we came here we are left to ourselves. We cannot therefore well do without the paper, and we would like to know if there are any brethren in Nebraska or northwestern Kansas, who can come this way; we will be glad to furnish hospitality to all. If any are near let us hear from you either by letter or THE RESTITUTION. So far we like the country here if we only had company. Would like to know Bro. Chiten's address.

We are waiting patiently for the coming of God's dear Son, who will gather his elect from the four winds of heaven. May we be among the happy number is our desire, and enjoy all the pleasure he has reserved for his children in his kingdom is our prayer.

This letter from Mrs. Sweet answers for itself. Have sent her a card, told her you would send her a paper; perhaps you may get a subscriber.

BARRY, Ill.

Dear Friend:

Seeing a letter in the Christian Lamp from your pen, dated March 13, I take the liberty of addressing you in hope of hearing something of interest from the City of the Great King, a city of more prominence in history and promise than any other in the world, and especially to those who are looking for their Lord's return to complete the work of redemption. We read in the journals of the day of the return of many of his ancient people to the land of their fathers, which is one token of the near approach of our Lord.

Now if there is a paper published in Jerusalem that gives general information of what is going on in that part of the world, I want to learn how to secure it; would be willing to pay a good price to get it. Perhaps you can help me, if so you will confer a favor on me.

Although I am over 83 years old, I long to be spared till the coming of the Just One, that I may go forth to meet him with joy, and not have to go down into the tomb.

I will close, hoping this will reach you, and that you will respond.

Editor Restitution:

THE RESTITUTION grows weekly more interesting while it brings tidings of the fulfilment of prophecy, and the spread of light and truth in foreign lands. May the God of Israel bless all who are seeking to know and spread the truth, whether in this or other lands, and help us all to walk worthy of our high calling in Christ Jesus, is the prayer of your Sister.

Editor Restitution:

Herein find $1.00 for my paper. I am not in circumstances to send more. I love THE RESTITUTION better than any other paper I have ever taken. Hope you may be able to continue the publication of the good tidings of Israel's return and the establishment of the throne of David in the land of promise.

ORIENTAL SKETCHES.—Second Series. Number 23.

SHARON AND CARMEL.

"The glory of Lebanon shall be given unto it, the excellency of Carmel and Sharon, they shall see the glory of the Lord, and the excellency of our God." ISA. XXXV. 2.

Sharon and Carmel are enshrined in sacred poetry. In addition to the holy associations that cluster round them as scenes of Bible history, they bring up before the mind's eye plains spangled with the "rose of Sharon," meadows powdered with "the lily of the valley," uplands waving with "forests," and mountains crowned with "the excellency of Carmel." Nor are one's glowing expectations much disappointed when he traverses Sharon, or climbs the heights of Carmel in early spring. The plain stretches out before him as far as the eye can follow it, in gentle undulations of luxuriant pasture, varied here and there by a clump of old forest trees, or a thicket of canes and shrubs round a fountain, or a grey tell strewn with the ruins of some primeval city. And the mountain chain rises in easy slopes, wooded from base to summit; seamed by many a glen, and broken by many a cliff. The curse has fallen lightly upon Sharon and Carmel. Still it is true that the great cities which once lined the sea-board are gone. The restless waves dash in sheets of foam over the ingulphed ruins of its once famous harbors. Dor and Cesarea, Hepha and Athlit, are no more. Towns and villages which thickly studded in ancient days inland plain and mountain side, are gone too. Corn fields, olive groves, and vineyards are now few and far between; and even the pastures are deserted save by the flocks of a few poor nomads. Notwithstanding the grass, and the flowers, and the beauty of Sharon, it "is like a wilderness." "Its highways lie waste, the wayfaring man ceaseth." Isa. xxxiii. 8. And notwithstanding Carmel's waving woods and green forest glades, it has "shaken off its fruit,"—the fruit of human industry. The mountain still deserves its ancient name, "the fruitful." The "excellency (beauty) of Carmel" is yet conspicuous; but even there, in the loviest glades and richest dells, solitude keeps unbroken Sabbath.

SOUTHERN SHARON.

My first view of Sharon was from the sea. From the vessel's deck I looked with as much eagerness as an old Crusader on the white strand, and the sandy downs, and the broad plain, shut in on the east by the blue hills of Samaria. The cape of Carmel was far behind me, dipping gracefully, but not so "bluff" as is usually represented in pictures, into the Mediterranean. Away far ahead a little white rounded hill began to rise slowly from a flat coast. "What hill is that?" I asked of the French officer at my side. "That is Joppa." "And those ruins we passed some time ago, which you can see yonder glittering in the sun—what are they?" "The ruins of Cesarea," was the reply. Historic names are wonderfully suggestive. Especially so when connected with sacred history, and when the eye first rests on the places to which they are attached. Memory then becomes a diorama. It brings before us the great events of other ages. So it was with me. In succession I saw the ships of Hiram conducting rafts of cedar and pine along the sea to Joppa for Solomon's Temple. I saw the great merchant vessel of Adramyttium leaving the harbor of Cesarea, while on its deck stood the apostle of the Gentiles, guarded by Roman soldiers, and with fettered hands waving a final adieu to weeping friends. I saw the proud galleys of the Crusaders bearing down upon the shore, crowded with mail-clad knights, Europes best and bravest warriors, bent on the recovery of the Holy Sepulchre. And then, when the picture vanished, my eye rested on deserted harbors, ruined cities, a dreary desolate shore, silent alike to the bustle of commerce and the din of battle; as if to show that while man is mortal, his glory fleeting, and all his works perishable, God's Word is true and can never fail. Five and twenty centuries ago that word pronounced the doom of Palestine: "I beheld, and, lo the fruitful place (Hebrew Carmel) was a wilderness, and all the cities thereof were broken down at the presence of the Lord, and by his fierce anger. For thus hath the Lord said, The whole land shall be desolate." Jer. iv. 26.

I landed at Joppa, a bustling town of five thousand inhabitants, beautifully situated on the western slope of a hill looking down into the blue waters of the Mediterranean. It is still the port of Jerusalem; but is has no harbor, and it is only under favorable circumstances of wind and weather a vessel can ride at a distance of a mile or so from the shore. Guided by a young Jew I went at once to "the house of Simon the tanner." The house is modern, but it probably occupies the old site, for its Mohammedan owner considers it sacred. It stands "by the seaside," as St. Luke tells us, Acts x. 6: and from its roof—"flat" now as in ancient times—I looked out on that same boundless sea on which the apostle must have looked when "he went up upon the house-top to pray." The hour too was the same—"the sixth hour," or noon. There was something deeply impressive in being thus brought as it were into immediate connection with that wondrous vision which the Lord employed as a key to open the Gentile world to Christ's gospel.

From Simon's house I went through crooked streets to the top of the hill. The way was not pleasant, but the glorious view amply repaid me. On the land side Joppa is girt about with its orchards—the finest in Palestine, and, perhaps, unsurpassed in the world. Away beyond them spreads out a boundless plain; on the north Sharon, and on the south Philistia. My eye soon caught and followed the line of the old road which winds northward along the coast to Cesarea. That was the road by which the apostle Peter went on his divine mission to Cornelius, Acts x. Lydda was hid behind a rising ground; but the mountains of Judah were sharply defined against the bright eastern sky, and their coloring was beautiful—shaded off from soft greyish blue to deep purple.

To procure horses and a guide was a work of time and trouble, and the afternoon was far advanced ere I rode out of the crowded gate of Joppa. How pleasant was the change from the heat and dust of the narrow streets to the freedom and freshness of the country! It was autumn; and never did autumn's richness appear to greater advantage than in these orchards of Sharon. Orange, lemon and citron trees were there laden with golden fruit. Among them appeared the russet foliage and bright red globes of the pomegranate. Here and there the broad-leafed banana grew in wild luxuriance, shut in by tall hedges and impenetrable thickets of cactus; while ever and anon palm trees shot up far overhead, as if to show the great clusters of dates that hung round their tapering necks, or to entice the soft evening breezes to sport with their feathery foliage.

I took the road to Lydda—the same road by which Peter was brought to raise Dorcas from the dead, after he had, by his miraculous cure of Eneas, converted "all that dwelt in Lydda and Saron," (the Greek form of Sharon, Acts ix. 34, seq.) For more than an hour I rode through those shady, fragrant orchards, and then crossed the grey monotonous plain to Lydda. Thence I went to the ancient Ginzo, 2 Chron. xxviii. 18, now a poor village, and onward to the pass of Beth-horon, up which I wound my way to Gibeon and Jerusalem. The southern end of Sharon, which I thus crossed, measures about fifteen miles; while the length of the plain from Joppa to Carmel is nearly fifty. In addition to Joppa and Lydda, there are ten or twelve villages in this part of the plain, and small portions of the rich soil are cultivated by their inhabitants; but further north the country is almost deserted.—J. L. Porter, A. M.

A SUBMARINE BALLOON.

The International exhibition of Nice is reserving some wonders for the foreigners who may propose to pass a portion of the winter of 1883-84 upon the Mediterranean. One of these wonders is a balloon which its inventor, M. Tosalli, calls "the observatory under the sea." It is made of steel and bronze to enable it to resist the pressure which the water produces at a depth of 120 meters. "This observatory under the sea" has a height of eight meters, and is divided into three compartments. The upper compartment is reserved for the commander to enable him to direct and to watch the working of the observatory and to give to the passengers the explanations necessary as to the depth of the descent, and what they will see in the depths of the sea. The second apartment, in the center of the machine, is comfortably furnished for passengers to the number of eight, who are placed so that they can see a long distance from the machine. They have under their feet a glass which enables them to examine at their ease the bottom of the sea, with its fishes, its plants, and its rocks. The obscurity being almost complete at seventy meters of depth, the observatory will be provided with a powerful electric sun, which sheds light to a great distance in lighting these depths. The passengers have at their disposal a telephone, which allows them to converse with their friends who have stopped on the steamboat which transports the voyagers to such places as are known as the most curious in the neighborhood. They have also handy a telegraph machine. Beneath the passengers an apartment is reserved for the machine, which is constructed on natural principles:—that is to say, as the vessel of the fish, becoming heavier or lighter at command, so as to enable the machine to sink or rise at the wish of the operator.—London News.

Youths' Column.

Youth and Age.

MATTHEWS HAMD.

When the hearts are young and lighthouse,
The road is sunlight and clear,
And peace reigns on every side
How bright all things appear!
The dullest music charms us then,
We laugh and know not why;
The very flowers upon our path,
They look too bright to die.

When hearts are old and weary
The road is twisted over,
And there is little to [illegible]
Hey and our village doors;
The flowers in our thought would never fade
Are dead upon the sod;
And then we sigh for peace and rest
Within the arms of God.

Rules for Today.

Do nothing that you would not like to be doing when Jesus comes.

Go to no place where you would not like to be found when Jesus comes.

Say nothing that you would not like to be saying when Jesus comes.

The Lord is at hand!

Morning and Evening.

Speak kindly in the morning; it will lighten all the cares of the day, turn sorrow into gladness, make household, professional, and all other cares move along more smoothly, giving peace to the one who thus speaks and grateful joy to the one who hears. Speak kindly at the evening hour, for it may be that before the dawn of another day some tenderly loved one may finish his or her span of life in this world, and then it will be too late to recall an unkind word, or even to seek forgiveness for an injury inflicted upon the heart of a loved friend departed.

Be Little Sunbeams.

Children, you are household sunbeams; don't forget it, and when mother is tired and weary, or father comes home from his work feeling depressed, speak cheerfully to them and do what you can to help them. Very often you can help them most by not doing something, for what you would do may only make more work for them. Therefore, think before you speak or act, and say to yourself, "Will this help mamma?" or "Will this please papa?" There is something inside of you that will always answer and tell you how to act. It won't take a minute, either, to decide, when you do this, and you will be repaid for waiting by the earnestness of the smile or the sincerity of the kiss that will then greet you. One thing remember always—the effect of what you do lingers after you are gone. Long after you have forgotten the smile or cheerful word which you gave your father or mother, or the little act that you did to make them happy, it is remembered by them, and after you are asleep they will talk about it and thank God for their little household sunbeam.

"Oh, My Poor Boy."

About the year 1863, says J. F. Sanderson, I saw a scene I shall never forget. I was walking down the main street of Nashua, N. H., and came in sight of Jim Bright's saloon, a horrible place, from which honest and sober people turned away in disgust and dismay. As I drew near, the door opened, and I saw them lead out a boy of fourteen or fifteen years, who was drunk, sick and helpless. Being unable to walk, he sat down upon the sidewalk, the picture of wretchedness and distress. A number of persons stood around him, laughing at his pitiable condition, and cracking their customary bar room jokes. As I drew nearer I saw a well-dressed, bright, intelligent-looking lady walking up the street. She came along, apparently happy and unconcerned, until she was opposite the saloon, when she cast a glance at the helpless creature on the sidewalk, and exclaimed, in tones that I shall never forget:

"Oh, my poor boy!"

It seemed as if a life-time of agony was condensed in that one exclamation, which marked a revelation of such sorrow as she had never known before.

She could not leave him in his misery and disgrace. Some of the bystanders helped him up, and the poor mother led away her drunken boy.

There are places all about us where more boys are poisoned, debauched, and ruined by the accursed cup. Shall this curse consume forever? Shall mothers rear children to be devoured by this dragon? Or shall men and women who fear God and love righteousness rouse themselves from their slumbers, and seek to banish this dire and bitter evil from the homes and haunts of men.

Boys and Their Mothers.

Some one has written beautifully to the boys in the following manner. Here is a whole sermon in a few sentences: "Of all the love affairs in the world, none can surpass the true love of the big boy for his mother. It is pure and noble, honorable in the highest degree to both. I do not mean merely a dutiful affection. I mean a love which makes a boy gallant and courteous to his mother, saying to everybody plainly that he is fairly in love with her. Next to the love of a husband, nothing so crowns a woman's life with honor as this second love, this devotion of a son to her. And I never yet knew a boy 'turn out' badly who began by falling in love with his mother. Any man may fall in love with a fresh-faced girl, and the man who is gallant with the girl may cruelly neglect the worn and weary wife. But the boy who is a lover of his mother in her middle age, is a true knight who will love his wife as much in the sere-leaved Autumn as he did in the daisied Spring-time."—Gospel Advocate.

CIRCULAR.

To the Students of Prophecy throughout the World:

The undersigned proposes to issue from the press, either in Chicago or in New York City, as circumstances may decide, the following works, to-wit:

I. The Coming Age—Its Nature and Proximity. In the first division the nature of the Coming Age is fully discussed, as to its physical and moral character: 1. That the earth itself has a crowning age, in which it shall be perfected [illegible] man [illegible] in that resurrection state, will be under the endless reign of the Personal Messiah; 2. In establishing the proximity of that age, the prophecies of Ezekiel, Isaiah, Daniel, Zechariah, Christ, Paul, Peter, and the Apocalypse, are critically examined, relative to its rapid approach.

II. The second work will be devoted to the investigation of the various phases of the Eastern Question:—1. The Egyptian phase, 2. The British phase, 3. The Russian phase, 4. The Ottoman phase. 5. The Hebrew phase. 6. The American phase. 7. Lesser phases of the Eastern Question, 8. The location of each of the Great Powers in the coming contest, 9. All nations marshal under the banners of the dragon, the beast, and the false prophet. These powers are traced in history to the present time. All the great national issues are fully investigated.

If all that are interested in these great and most sublime topics will aid, they will be issued immediately. They will be printed and bound in a form that will do credit to the vastness of the subjects, and put to subscribers at prices quite reasonable. The books will contain about 500 large royal 8vo. pages each.

Obituary.

DIED—Near Auburn, Placer Co., Cal., July 9, 1883, of consumption, Sister Alice Condon, aged 24 years, 3 mos., and 21 days.

Sister Condon's maiden name was Stone—was a native of Wisconsin—was married to Frank Condon five years ago last January. She was immersed by the writer nearly two years ago, in Sacramento City, was a very devoted Christian, and died with a well grounded hope of soon being called from sleep to meet her Lord at his coming. She has left a devoted husband and two children, her mother and a sister, and many sympathizing friends to mourn; but "they sorrow not as others who have no hope."

Peaceful be thy rest, dear sister, till the Great Life-Giver calls thee forth to immortality, endless life and an incorruptible inheritance in the kingdom of God.

May all her friends be ready to meet her in the great day.

SEE HERE! READ THIS!

Quite a large number of our subscriptions have expired in June and July, and are hence delinquent. Please renew as rapidly as possible, as we need the assistance of all our friends. Some who promised to pay back subscription before this, have not yet done so. We trust they will as soon as possible.

Several complaints have been made of late of money sent and lost. We will now say that we cannot be responsible for money sent loose in letters. Send by Bank Draft, Post Office Order or Registered letter, and it may be at our risk; otherwise the sender takes his own risk. Please do not send Bank Checks, as we often have trouble in collecting them.

A. R. INGERSOLL, Agent.

To the Friends of "The Restitution."

The cost of publishing THE RESTITUTION for the year just closed exceeded the receipts over $300. To repay this deficiency and secure means to publish the paper another year, we must raise, outside the regular subscription, at least $500. To secure that amount, the Board of Directors have requested me to appeal to each subscriber to contribute at least one dollar extra. This is not asked as a donation, but brethren are requested to send names of persons to whom they wish the paper sent, with their contributions and the paper will be sent to such persons in payment for the amounts sent by each.

There are a large number of brethren and sisters in different localities who are unable to pay for the paper, and who would be very glad of the privilege of reading it. These are known to Brother Chaplin, the Editor. I would suggest that brethren who have no one to whom they specially desire to send the paper, send their contributions to THE RESTITUTION office with a request that the paper be sent to some worthy Christian who will appreciate it, but who is unable to pay for it. In this way brethren will be able to gladden the hearts of many poor but honest good Christians, and at the same time help to furnish the means to keep the paper going.

The fund will be known as "Free Will Offerings." Let each reader of THE RESTITUTION make a small sacrifice, and contribute at least one dollar, always remembering that the many persons to whom the paper will be thus sent will thank and bless you, and your Heavenly Father will reward you.

R. S. DWIGGINS, President.

THREE THINGS.

"There are three things that return not."—Joshua Proverbs.

Three things never come again.
Speed may vanish from the plain,
Blossoms from the dewy soil,
Verdure from the frozen pool,
Water from the riverside,
Flowers from the mountain's head;
Night may brighten into day,
Noon is midnight's fadeaway:
Yet the snow shall come once more
When the winter tempests roar;
Blossoms, each returning spring,
In her laden arms shall bring;
Grass on plain and on plowshares rust;
Life's flesh is a mortal's rain;
Time shall bid new beards grow,
Noon and night both come and go,
Yet, though all thy soul complain,
Three things never come again.

Love once vanish from the heart,
Swept aside by woe and wrath;
Hope may leave thee in despair,
Riches flee like smoke in air,
Home forsake thee, friends decay,
Life itself be fit to die;
But thy love may come once more,
Greater than it seemed before,
Hope return like smiling charm,
Riches heap their visible harm,
Home be built from out the mire,
Friends beguile to new mistrust,
Life renew its joy and pain,
Three things never come again.

Never time for that love's
Counts the sorrow that it causes:
Speed to spare, its wing is light
Vigilance like fear delight:
When with rapid aim it springs
From the bow-string's shivering twang,
Straight to heart or heart it sped,
Once for all its course was sped;
No wild word upon its track
Calls the bird of vengeance back;
Hold thy hand before it go,
Think before thou draw'st the bow:
Hurtful care across the plain,
No sped arrow comes again!

Never returns the chance that passed,
That one moment was its last;
Though thy life upon it hung,
Though thy death beneath it swung,
If thy future all the way
Now forever goes astray,
When the instant, fount of fate,
Passes through the golden gate,
Within the hour I cast for man
Comes and goes from Nature's plan,
Never more the consummate
Bears upon the close of time,
Never more that time shall re
Burden-bearer unto Doom
Woe and want must cry in vain,
Last chance never comes again!

Never shall thy spoken word
Be again unsaid, unheard;
Well their work thy lips have wrought,
Joy, or grief, or evil thought:
Once for all the time is sped,
Though it pierce, a poisoned spear,
Through the soul thou hold'st so dear:
Though it quiver, fierce and deep,
Though some stainless spirit's sleep,
Idle, vain, the sting sting
That a passing rage might bring:
Speech shall give it fangs of steel,
Utterance all its might reveal;
Give thy tears of blood and fire,
Pray with peace of mad desire,
Utter life and soul and all
That soul sentence to recall;
Wrestle with its fatal w
Gnaw with dying fuel its pain,
Rive it all thy lingering days,
Hide it deep with love and
Come for all its woes to
None escape it but the dead;
All thy travail's in vain,
Speech and sorrow and shame

"ONE FAIR CHANCE FOR ALL."

ARGUMENTS CONCLUDED.

9. The holy prophets declare that some shall never be raised from the dead. If this be so, then away goes the fair-chance theory; for if the race be not raised, then is their premise gone. And let me say, it is no matter whether the Bible says little or much upon the subject; whether we like it or dislike it; the words of God only through the holy prophets must govern here entirely. The restitution age and the restitution doctrine must be gauged by the holy prophets who were moved upon by the Almighty "to speak as the Holy Ghost gave utterance."

Prov. xxi. 16: "The man that wandereth out of the way of understanding shall remain in the congregation of the dead." No interpretation that can be given this text will benefit the fair-chancers; for unless the race be raised, their theory goes by the board; for the Book says the evil who have had a chance will be raised to damnation! If they were ever in "the way" and got out of it, they were wicked. I suppose the meaning is that their fathers were once in the way, but the children knowing nothing about it, when dead, shall forever "remain in the congregation of the dead." But we shall notice the subject more minutely when we come to speak of the heathen dead.

Isa. xxvi. 13, 14: "O Lord, our God, other lords besides thee have had dominion over us; but by thee only will we make mention of thy name. They are dead, they shall not live; they are deceased, they shall not rise; therefore thou visited and destroyed them." I know it has been asserted that these were graven images. Silly! How could graven images have dominion over people? And how could they die unless they were once alive? Here, then, Holy Writ cannot make it plainer that some shall never be raised from the dead!

Obadiah 15, 16, reads: "For the day of the Lord is near upon all the heathen: as thou hast done it shall be done unto thee: thy reward shall return upon thine own head. For as ye have done upon my holy mountain, so shall the heathen drink, and they shall swallow down, and they shall be as though they had not been." Here, then, a part of the heathen have been punished and destroyed, or will have been before the general resurrection, that they will "be as though they never had been"? therefore not subjects of a resurrection. But not to be unmercifully tedious I will refer to only a few other cases.

a. The world destroyed by water. Here the swift and awful destruction came upon the whole world, eight excepted. This destruction is final. It was the judgment and punishment from God, and a finality. Will these be raised from the dead? For what purpose? Will God punish twice for the same offenses? They were not destroyed for Adam's sin, but for their own; and if never raised from the dead, the system goes by the board as a universal salvation is the foundation corner-stone of the whole concern.

b. The Sodomites. The vile practices and unheard-of sins of this people pierced the heavens and became a stench in the nostrils of Jehovah. He rained down from God out of heaven fire and brimstone, and literally burned up the people, and whelmed them forever under the waters of the Dead Sea! Their punishment was swift, awful, eternal! Why bring them up again? and for what?

c. The Egyptians. This people had lorded it over God's people so long, and sinned with a high-handed and outstretched arm so long, that God crated them from the earth with the besom of destruction. From the time Moses stood before Pharaoh the first time, and demanded in God's name to "let my people go," the wrath of God was poured out upon them in destruction, culminating in the destruction of Pharaoh and his army in the Red Sea. The munitions of heaven's destruction were poured out upon that people and nation. Why raise them from the dead for another destruction? And, if not, the doctrine of the resurrection of the race, upon which the theory is based, is not a Bible doctrine.

d. And what shall I say of the Hittites, the Amorites, the Amalekites, and all those wicked nations whom God commanded his people to destroy? Will they be raised from the dead for [redacted]? And e. The Assyrians. What about these? The angel of God destroyed one hundred and eighty-five thousand of these in one night. Their destruction was from God, swift, awful, eternal. Why raise them again from the dead?

f. Korah, Dathan and Abiram. These were a part of God's elect—a chosen, his redeemed from Egypt; but, becoming jealous of Moses and Aaron, they rebelled against God, and were utterly destroyed. The earth trembled, quaked, and opened up her mouth and swallowed them up alive amid their heart-rending cries! And so great was the terror at this punishment, that even those who stood not with them fled from these terrible scenes, greatly alarmed. Will these be raised for another destruction? Not even all the enlightened wicked will be raised again, for they have already received a just, an eternal doom! Let the Book, "the holy prophets," talk, and let uninspired men be dumb.

g. The Bible disposition of the heathen. We cannot say much here; for the Bible was not given to satisfy the curious, not to make plain what does concern us. Why should we be solicitous about the heathen who have never had God's revelation? We cannot alter, change God's plans and purposes. Why distrust God? Does he not know what is best, and will he not do it? What good can we do to them now in talking about a fair chance for them? If true, when the time comes for its proclamation, all the opposing powers in God's universe will be swept away by its irresistible and onward march, as a woman sweeps away cobwebs with her broom. Why, then, oppose such other here on account of that doctrine? Its advocates admit that it cannot do the heathen, dead or living, any good now. Why run before we are called? This places us where the man was who ran from the army to give David tidings; but when he arrived he had no tidings, save that he saw a great tumult! David told the skinny to stand aside if he had nothing to tell. And better would it be for our educated men, mighty logicians, if they have nothing better to talk about or write about, to stand aside! We have men in our ranks who, with their splendid education, their persuasive rhetoric, if they would preach nothing but the old-fashioned gospel, tell nothing but "the old, old story," would carry conviction to thousands all along the line of battle, and bring the cry from their lips, "what shall we do?"

But on the [illegible] heathen [illegible] the world—to say nothing of his inspiration—give a little glinting light just peeping out from the throne of God. Rom. i. 20–23: "For the invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead; so that they"—the heathen—"are without excuse; because that when they knew God"—by the light of creation—"they glorified him not as God, neither were thankful; but became vain in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was darkened. Professing themselves to be wise, they became fools, and changed the glory of an incorruptible God into an image like to corruptible man, and to birds, and four-footed beasts and creeping things."

Thus the great logician and orator said that creation speaks an invisible God; that he was understood by what he had made; and that therefore the heathen could have no excuse in their idolatry; and that if they willingly became "fools," they were justly doomed for their own sins, not Adam's. Nor did the great logician stop here: "For as many as have sinned without law," —done violence to the light they had, in creation—"shall perish without law: and as many as have sinned in the law shall be judged by the law.... in the day when God shall judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ according to my gospel."

If they knew God by creation, and sinned against the light and knowledge, their own "conscience" condemned them to "perish" without revealed law, they being "a law unto themselves," and this condemnation would be vindicated "in the day when God shall judge the world according to" Paul's gospel. And if they lived according to "the law written in their hearts," "their conscience also bearing witness" that they have lived up to the light of that "law written in their hearts," they shall be saved "in the day when God shall judge the world." Christ died for them: brought eternal life for the world; and if they did not reject it, but reached after it all they could according to the light they had, then will God's throne and government be vindicated in their salvation, without any further chance in the eternal world. If these words of Paul, justly interpreted, do not mean this, then I confess I do not know why Paul should have spoken them. But, as before remarked, we all would be much better employed in preaching the gospel to those who are living under its light and living it, too: for in this way we could heal divisions, allay strife, and put behind the old, old story into regions unknown to it.

10. The Bible contemplates the salvation of infants. Now Christ has died for all, purchased eternal life for all who do not reject that salvation. 1 John ii. 2: "And he is the propitiation for our sins; and not for our sins only, but for the sins of the whole world." And again: "Behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world." And still again: "And this is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life in his Son." Once more: "I am the resurrection and the life."

Natural life was lost in Adam; the eternal life was bought by Christ; he gave his life a ransom for all; the eternal life in the Son; and if it were bought for all, none then can lose it only by rejecting it. Infants cannot reject by sin; for "sin is transgression of law." Infants lost their natural life by reason of their connection with Adam; they gain the eternal life by their connection with Jesus the Christ. Man cannot purchase this eternal life by works of righteousness; that purchase has already been made for them, and the price paid—the precious blood of Christ. Adult man may lose that life, because he will not accept of it on God's terms. Infants cannot, for they cannot refuse; they cannot sin. Being incapable of choosing and receiving, Jesus chooses and gives it to them. He is pure, even purer than the best saint on earth, because he never has sinned personally; and "Jesus hath taken away the sin of the world." Being raised from the dead he enters upon that eternal life bought for him. It savors too much of self-righteousness for any one to say without formation of good character none can be saved. If Christ's righteousness were not to pass upon the saint, and he were dependant upon his own for salvation, he never could be saved. The saint is counted holy when he believes and does all Christ commands, not that that brings his salvation or holiness but because these were purchased for him and are freely bestowed upon him in the decree not yet it. A system that would raise the infant mortal for a fair chance to formation of character, when Jesus has bought eternal life and character for him, surely never came from [illegible] ry, that is just one of the things it does teach.

True, the Bible says but little upon this subject, but that little is all on the right side. And I, for one, do not want to be on the side of the unconverted disciples who rebuked those who once brought little children to Jesus. No! Bring them along in the only way they can be now; dedicate them to God in prayer, and give them to the Lord, as Samuel's mother gave him—consecrate him in all the teachings of the Lord's house, as soon as he can understand it—and in the end he will be like Timothy, who knew the Holy Scriptures from childhood.

Jesus rebuked the disciples for their very unnatural conduct. Matt. xix. 14: "But Jesus said, Suffer little children, and forbid them not, to come unto me; for of such is the kingdom of heaven." He "took them in his arms and blessed them," yea, and they shall be blessed forevermore! All children are gathered in the arms of Jesus and held there until they are old enough to accept or reject him for themselves.

Jer. xxxi. 15–17: "Thus saith the Lord: a voice was heard in Ramah, lamentation, and bitter weeping; Rachel weeping for her children refused to be comforted for her children, because they are not. Thus saith the Lord: refrain thy voice from weeping, and thine eyes from tears; for thy work shall be rewarded, saith the Lord; and they shall come again from the land of the enemy. And there is hope in their end, saith the Lord, that thy children shall come again to their own border." Now what does this teach? This: that these children from two years old and under, being destroyed by the monster Herod, that he might destroy Christ, shall be raised and saved. The everlasting Spirit gave Rachel that hope, and the same Spirit now gives that hope for all children.

11. The holy prophets teach the first resurrection in which and upon which "the second death hath no power." This has been sufficiently discussed under another head from the fifteenth chapter of 1 Cor.; and I say no more here, only that in this "first resurrection," "the better resurrection," the celestic resurrection, none are raised only the righteous, or those so counted because of their connection with the Christ. And millions of wicked will remain in their graves during the reign of a thousand years. 1 Cor. xv. 24–28, teaches this reign, during which all will be subjugated to God and his word, or be destroyed; that during this time or at the end, sin and death and the devil will be destroyed, and a redeemed, purified, and world headed back to God.

12. At the end of this reign the second resurrection takes place, which empties all graves of both good and bad; and forever ends all probation and trial. John v. 28, 29: "Marvel not at this: for the hour is coming, in the which all that are in their graves shall hear his voice and come forth: they that have done good unto the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil unto the resurrection of damnation." Who are to "hear his voice"? First, "they that have done good;" and second, "they that have done evil." The first are raised to eternal life, but not to any reign with Christ; for that reign is over; the second to damnation, and this takes place at the end of his reign. I have proven that the first resurrection takes place in order to his reign, and in that, none are raised but the righteous or those considered as such by their connection with the Savior; and that for one thousand years after that none are raised. Therefore none are raised in the first resurrection for "a fair chance," and none are raised during that reign to any chance, fair or unfair. And now, at the end of his reign, the great battle of God Almighty takes place, in which all the opposing forces are drawn up in battle array; God and Christ and his people on one side, and the devil and his hosts on the other. "And when the thousand years are expired, Satan shall be loosed out of his prison, and shall go out to deceive the nations which are in the four quarters of the earth, Gog and Magog, to gather them together to battle; the number of whom is as the sand of the sea. And they went up on the breadth of the earth, and compassed the camp of the saints about, and the beloved city; and fire came down from God out of heaven, and devoured them." Rev. xx. 7–9. Sin, treasons with this battle the general judgment takes place. "And I saw the dead, small and great, stand before God: and the books were opened: and another book was opened, which is the book of life: and the dead were judged out of those things which were written in those books. And the sea gave up the dead which were in it; and death and hell delivered up the dead which were in them; and they were judged every man according to [illegible] For the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and cast into the lake of fire. This is the second death." Rev. xx. 12–14.

Just before this awfully grand scene takes place, the law of God rolling through the heavens, and all along the line of battle, strikes through the lines of the guilty with alarming power, as also through the lines of the redeemed with the music of eternal life. "He that is unjust, let him be unjust still; and he which is filthy, let him be filthy still; and he that is righteous, let him be righteous still; and he that is holy, let him be holy still." There is now no more chance, fair or unfair, for chance. Time is now rolled over into eternity. No more proffers of pardon, mercy, salvation, will ever greet the ears of the sons and daughters of men. This closing scene of the world's great drama, this mighty battle about to be fought for the world's supremacy, draws upon itself the eyes of the assembled hosts of heaven, earth and hell, and when feeling is most intense, and the closing scenes of earth's most powerful conflict is intensely painful, God unbolts the bars of his hitherto pent up munitions of destruction, and hurls down thick and fast "fire and brimstone," and "devours" all the ungodly forever and forevermore! And now in the rounding out of God's grandest climax, which he purposed to bring about in Christ Jesus from the beginning of the ages, the grand corridors of heaven and all the highways of a glorified earth, are filled with the grandest anthems of the ages: "the voice of much people in heaven, saying, Alleluia; salvation, and honor, and power, unto the Lord our God"—"for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth." Amen and amen!

WORDS OF OUR LORD CONCERNING HIS SECOND ADVENT.

We must always remember that there are two stages in our Lord's second coming, and though the second part (when his feet shall stand on the Mount of Olives, and he shall come with all his saints) must be during the last days of the final portion of the great tribulation mentioned in Daniel and in Zechariah, yet the first portion for his saints will probably be before the great trouble or at its commencement. We find the lightning flash of the rapture. "For as the lightning cometh out of the east, and shineth even unto the west; so shall also the coming of the Son of man be"—is mentioned in Matthew, before the verse which connects with "Immediately after the tribulation of those days."

THE TWO STAGES OF THE ADVENT.

I firmly believe the two stages of the Lord's second advent are mingled in this prophecy, and so concealed from the eyes of the world, in the same way that the two advents of our Lord were blended in the accounts given of them in the old prophets. In Luke xvii. we read: "For as the lightning, that lighteneth out of the one part under heaven, shineth unto the other part under heaven; so shall the Son of man be in his day." "I tell you, in that night there shall be two men in one bed; the one shall be taken, and the other shall be left."

This is the rapture; but we read in Matthew: "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light. And then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven, and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory. And he shall send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet, and they shall gather together his elect from the four winds from one end of heaven to the other." And in Mark: "But in those days, after that tribulation, the sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light." Then follows the description of the coming, and "the gathering together of his elect from the uttermost part of earth to the uttermost part of heaven." Then in Luke, "And there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and then shall they see the Son of man coming in a cloud with power and great glory."

CHRIST FIRST COMES FOR HIS CHURCH.

From these and other verses we may conclude that our Lord will come first for his church, as suddenly and as universally as the lightning flash, and that he will then gather his elect from the uttermost part of earth to the uttermost part of heaven. Some, I know, will not agree with me, but I believe the gathering of God's elect in Matt. xxiv. 31, by the angels, and "with a great sound of a trumpet," to be indicative of the rapture of the church of Christ at the first stage of the second advent. Read in the first of Thessalonians, iv. 16–17, and in 1 Cor. [illegible] we shall be changed." These verses undoubtedly refer to the rapture of the living saints when our Lord comes; and this event clearly follows the trumpet sound, and the raising first of the dead in Christ. The words also correspond with those in the above verse of Matthew, where the elect are gathered after "a great sound of a trumpet," and by the angels. There can be no catching up of living saints before the dead in Christ are raised, and that event is evidently after our Lord descends from heaven into the air with a shout, and with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God!

THE RAPTURE PRECEDES THE MANIFESTATION.

The gathering together of God's elect in Matthew and Mark is the same gathering as is mentioned in the second of Thessalonians ii. 1: "Now we beseech you, brethren, by the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, and by our gathering together unto him;" and there is no doubt that St. Paul here refers to the rapture of living saints, at the first stage of the Lord's advent, spoken of in his first epistle, and which I have just read. From other prophecies it is very clear that the rapture must precede the glorious manifestation of Christ with all his saints; but we have no data to enable us to determine the interval between the two stages of the advent. We know that great troubles are coming upon this earth before our Lord again stands on the Mount of Olives with his saints; and we have the cheering words of St. Luke: "And when these things begin to come to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads; for your redemption draweth nigh." Note the words, "begin to come to pass," as if the rapture would take place before the world was convulsed with trouble. In Luke xvii. we read: "And as it was in the days of Noah, so shall it be also in the days of the Son of man." "Likewise also as it was in the days of Lot." Noah was safe in the ark before the flood came, and Lot was removed out of Sodom; and "thus shall it be in the day when the Son of man is revealed." That is, real Christians will probably be removed before the final great troubles come upon the earth. Our Lord will undoubtedly come as a thief in the night for his church, when least expected by the world, as we read in Matt. xxiv. 43–44, and in Luke xxi. 34–36. Here again is a statement, that faithful Christians will be accounted worthy to escape the great troubles that are coming, and to stand before the Son of man, at the lightning flash of the rapture.

A DIFFICULTY IN THE PROPHECY.

Now there is one difficulty in our Lord's prophecy, viz., the verse: "Verily I say unto you, This generation shall not pass away till all be fulfilled." But "this generation" is proved to be the Jewish race by Matthew xxiii. 32–39, where our Lord denounces them as a generation of vipers, filling up the iniquity of their fathers, whose house would be left desolate, and who would not see him again, until they hailed him as the blessed one coming in the name of the Lord. This, of course, is still future, and it proves that the "they" must refer to the Jews as a race.

THE TIME OF THE RAPTURE.

There is still an impenetrable obscurity about the time of the rapture. Each year increases the signs, but there are no just grounds for saying it will take place this year, any more than for saying it will not. The Lord may now come at any time for his church, although it is very probable that that day will not come as a thief on watching Christians. It is very possible (very probable I think) that some of the Jews may first be restored at Jerusalem in unbelief, and that they will then see him whom they pierced. In the parable of the ten virgins, we read of the midnight cry before the Bridegroom appeared, and we hear of the Master's knock before he comes in. There is also "the sign of the Son of man in heaven." This (whatever it may be) may synchronize with the advent. At any rate, the foolish virgins will not have time to buy any oil when the cry cometh, "Behold the Bridegroom cometh," but will be left behind. Therefore it is easy to see that the proper attitude of Christians ought to be one of watching and praying.

SIGNS OF THE END.

It does not say anywhere that we shall not know the period of the Lord's return; and we have two signs given us of the end. Matt. xxiv. 14: "And this gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations; and then shall the end come." Only as a witness. Surely that is now almost an accomplished fact. There is certainly no civilized nation where the gospel has not been preached as a witness; and when it has been preached in all nations, then shall the end come. We also read about the fig-tree putting forth its leaves. There is a reference here to the fig tree the Lord curs[illegible] the Jewish nation, [illegible] forth of leaves by [illegible] future revivalscence of that race, which the Lord declared should not pass away till all things be fulfilled. Surely the Jewish fig-tree is beginning to bud!

Therefore be ye all ready, and "let your loins be girded about, and your lights burning; and ye yourselves like unto men that wait for their Lord, when he will return from the wedding; that when he cometh and knocketh, they may open unto him immediately. Blessed are those servants, whom the Lord when he cometh shall find watching: verily I say unto you, that he shall gird himself, and make them sit down to meat, and will come forth and serve them." Surely this refers to the marriage supper of the Lamb! With such a prospect as this before us, what manner of persons ought we to be?—Dr. Abbe Smith, in Prophetic News.

THE LIFE EVERLASTING!

THE LIFE EVERLASTING. What is it? whence is it? whose is it? By J. H. Pettingell, A. M., (author of "Homiletical Index," "Theological Trilemma," etc.,) with a copious symposium, in which twenty representative men—clergymen, laymen, professors, doctors, and scholars—of the various churches of Europe and America, unite with the author in giving their own views of the Christian doctrine of the immortality of man. The whole constituting the most thorough and exhaustive discussion of this question now exciting such general inquiry, ever published. Just out of press; 300 pages. Price by mail $2. May be had at the office of THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Ind.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXII. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, AUGUST 22, 1883. NO. 32.

THE RESTITUTION,
TERMS—TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR,
Payable in advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.

Address all Letters and Communications to THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:
THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential to final salvation.

BRITISH PHASE OF THE EASTERN QUESTION.—No. 31.

Isaiah xviii. Examined, Explained, and Interpreted—Views of that Chapter Noted and Examined—What Land? What People?—Conclusion Reached as to Anglo-Israel—Items that Hang to this Subject

Is. xviii. Attention is invited to this chapter. It has been called obscure, and, indeed, the translation of it and the various interpretations given to its language, have rendered the chapter exceedingly obscure. Please read.

"This is one of the most obscure prophecies in the book of Isaiah. The subject of it, the end and design of it, the people to whom it is addressed, the history to which it belongs, the person who sends the messengers, and the nation to whom the messengers are sent, are all obscure and doubtful."—Bishop Lowth.

Bishop Lowth, however, gives it an Egyptian interpretation, and consequently an Egyptian translation. Since the learned prelate had no confidence in his own views, we are safe in rejecting both his opinions and the peculiar features of his translation.

Bishop Horsley, another very noted Bishop, says that it refers to the Jews at the period of their restoration, and the destruction of anti-Christ. Since, however, his ideas of anti-Christ are quite obscure, and as he does not make any distinction between Judah and Israel, we are obliged to reject his interpretation, and rely upon the correctness of our own researches, and upon what we regard the most accurate interpretation of the text.

"Woe (ho) to the land shadowing with wings, which (is) beyond the rivers of Ethiopia." The Hebrew particle 'ho,' here used, is sometimes a note of exclamation, and at others of lamentation, according to the context; and is therefore differently rendered, either 'Woe, alas!' or 'Ho! come on,' which seems to be its meaning here."

The land here intended. Two points of identification are given: "Shadowing with wings," and its location, "beyond the rivers of Ethiopia." Let us examine these expressions. The second is properly a key to the first, and, indeed, to the whole prophecy. The land beyond the rivers of Ethiopia. It cannot be either the land of Egypt or of Ethiopia. The prophet was in Palestine. The prophet, looking south, southwest, west and north-west, would name the countries that he knew. Egypt would come first; then Ethiopia, and, beyond Ethiopia, the country shadowing with wings. Ethiopia was often called Cush. How extended was it? It, in the days of Isaiah, included all Africa. Ethiopia had but one fixed boundary; on the north, to the south, west and north-west it seemed in early days to be unlimited. The country beyond the rivers of Ethiopia would be beyond Africa. The word in the authorized version that is rendered beyond, is translated "borders on." The Hebrew word is מֵעֵבֶר mai-ai-ver, over, beyond, on the opposite side. לִנְהָרֵי־כוּשׁ—lan-na-har Kush—the rivers of Kush. If the land of Kush, whose rivers are named, was in Africa, the order, looking towards Africa, would be, 1, Egypt; 2, Kush; 3, land beyond—not stating whether the land joined that of Kush, or had a sea between them. There would seem to be waters between them, from the expression, "Earth shadowing with wings."

הוֹי אֶרֶץ צִלְצַל כְּנָפָיִם Hoy eretz tsil-tsal ke nop-phah-im. "Ho to the earth, shady, overshadowing with wings."

It is said that four countries were called Cush, after the name of the eldest son of Ham; by what authority we know not. In Gen. ii. 13, the second river of paradise (is) Gihon: the same (is) it that compasseth the whole land of Ethiopia (Heb. Kush). Cush is here an Asiatic country. In Isaiah xi. 11, it may also be called an Asiatic region. Dr. Wm Smith, in his Dictionary of the Bible, has these remarks: "Cush as a country appears to be African in all passages except Gen. ii. 13. We may thus distinguish a primeval and a post-diluvian Cush. (Might it not read, Which in the days of Moses was called Cush?—W.) The former was encompassed by Gihon (Arvee.—W.) the second river of paradise: it would therefore seem to have been somewhere to the northward of Assyria. It is possible that it is in this case a name of a period later than that to which the history relates; but it seems more probable that it was of the earliest age, and that the African Cush was named from this older country. In the ancient Egyptian inscriptions, Ethiopia above Egypt is termed Kesh, or Kesh; and this territory probably perfectly corresponds to the African Cush, of the Bible. The Cushites, however, had clearly a wider extension, like the Ethiopians of the Greek, but apparently with a more definite ethnic relation. The Cushites appear to have spread along tracts extending from the higher Nile to the Euphrates and Tigris. History affords many traces of this relation of Babylonia, Arabia, and Ethiopia. Zera the Cushite (A. V. Ethiopian), who was defeated by Asa, was most probably the king of Egypt, certainly the leader of an Egyptian army. Very soon after their arrival in Africa, the Cushites appear to have established settlements along the southern Arabian coast, on the Arabian shore of the Persian Gulf, and in Babylonia, and thence onward to the Indus, and probably northward to Nineveh; and the Mizraites spreading along the south and east shores of the Mediterranean, on part of the north shore, and in the great islands."

Hence it will be seen that the expression, "Beyond the rivers of Cush," may mean beyond the rivers of the African or the Asiatic Cush. As far as our argument is concerned, it matters not which land the prophet intended, since the term "beyond" points westward towards another land. If the African Cush is intended, it follows the course of commerce, and Israelitish colonization; if the Asiatic Cush is in the prophet's eye, it follows the pathway of the Saxon emigration north and west. The land shadowing with wings beyond the rivers of Cush, must be North-western Europe with its islands. It will be seen that to identify the land is to solve the problem. It was necessary, therefore, to dwell upon this point of identity. The land being identified, it will not be very difficult to ascertain the people. Bishop Lowth decided, first, that Egypt was the country, and, consequently, that the Egyptians were the people, and adapted his translation to the idea. This will appear if we compare his translation with the Hebrew text. The expression, "Beyond the rivers of Cush," with the same Hebrew text, is found in Zeph. iii. 10. "From beyond the rivers of Cush my suppliants, (even) the daughter of my dispersed, shall bring mine offering. In that day shalt thou not be ashamed for all thy doings, wherein thou hast transgressed against me; for then will I take away out of the midst of thee, them that rejoice in thy pride, and thou shalt no more be haughty, because of my holy mountain. I will also leave in the midst of thee an afflicted and poor people, and they shall trust in the name of the Lord. The remnant of Israel shall not do iniquity, nor speak lies; neither shall a deceitful tongue be found in their mouth; for they shall feed and lie down, and none shall make (them) afraid." This prophecy is dated nearly one hundred years later than that of Isaiah. It serves to identify the people referred to by Isaiah, viz., Israel. The time, however, is not the same in each prophecy.

One point relative to the land should be noticed. Its location we have examined. It is the land where the colonizing and captive Israelite must, viz. in North-western Europe, where they give birth to one of the most extraordinary people and nation that has ever existed. Two features relative to the land itself, are: "Shadowing with wings," "The rivers have spoiled." Will Northwestern Europe and its islands suit these two features?

"The land shadowing with wings." One Hebrew lexicon defines the word צִלְצַל tsil-tsal, as follows: Shady, overshadowing; another says, Tumult of an army or shadowing. In both the principal idea is shade; something that, like a cloud, casts a shadow over the land. No such a thought is conveyed by the word "cymbal" as Bishop Lowth has translated it, and, consequently, makes Egypt to be the land.

"Wings." This word in Hebrew is from כָּנַף, was hid, concealed. As a noun, a wing, skirt, corner, extremity, battlement. Wings carry the idea of shadow. It would not be a forced construction to call these wings sails, especially as vessels or ships are mentioned in the next verse. Another idea is contained in the term "wings," that of protection. The British navy, protecting its merchant vessels, coming into and going out of all the harbors of the world, wafting like bees to the hive, the rich productions of every clime; entering all her British harbors could not be more poetically expressed than by "Land shadowing with wings." How varied, how vast the commerce of British Israel. Born, Crst, in the land of Israel, banished to Central Asia, they are buried to the world, till they are seen beginning a second life amid the marshes and bulrushes of North-western Europe, out of the "Inaccessible marshes and swamps" of Ditmarsia and Stormaria. They traverse the ocean and rivers in boats, framed of osiers, and covered with skins sewed together; and such was their skill or prodigality of life, that in these they sported in the tempests of the German Ocean. The second birth of a people scattered and peeled, of a nation terrible from their beginning hitherto; a nation meted out and trodden down, whose land the rivers have spoiled."

Isaiah's prophetic view as all must admit, extended beyond the present. With his far reaching telescope, took in the wanderings of Israel and Judah till their final union under Messiah, son of David. This being true, they must have been seen during their long banishment in the west; for we cannot suppose that such a mighty empire composed of Israel and his companions should for thousands of years have had such a noted history without coming within range of prophetic vision. What a rea training has fallen to the lot of the Saxons (sons of Isaac)! What other people can hold any comparison? Americans only, who are of that race, have any claim to equality.

The land and the people! Where? What? Who? Please ponder over their answers. 1. A land, located at the junction of Israel's highways to the setting of the sun, that of commerce and colonization along the Mediterranean and Atlantic, and the land rout through western Asia and central and northern Europe, beyond the rivers of Cush. 2. The land itself, its distinctive features: a. "Shadowing with wings," war vessels, and fleets of commerce; b. Whose lands, rivers, and arms of the sea and ocean have grooved into thousands of fragments. 3. The people, their past history, and their future destiny; a. A nation scattered and peeled; b. Terrible from their beginning hitherto; terrible to Egypt at the Red Sea, terrible in the waste, howling wilderness, terrible in the land of Canaan, terrible in their wanderings through Asia and Europe, terrible in northwestern Europe, terrible in their island home, terrible as sea-kings on the ocean, terrible by the arm and the hand that opens their way and guides them. 4. A nation (once) meted out and trodden down. 5. A people of missions and of missionaries; "Go ye swift messengers, go to my people, the scattered and down-trodden. Proclaim my salvation through the Messiah, my beloved Son, that they as the angel through mid heaven (Rev. xiv. 6) may at that time (vs. 7) bring a present unto me, to the place of the name of the Lord of hosts, the mount Zion.

"The vessels of bulrushes," is an expression that is supposed to identify that land exclusively with Egypt. To this we answer, 1. The papyrus or bulrush is not indigenous to Egypt; is scarce there at this time; it belongs to a more northern latitude. In north-western Europe and in England they are abundant. 2. The Saxons navigated the ocean in vessels like those made of bulrushes, while the Romans and the French had large and durable vessels.

We are not willing to leave this chapter without expressing an abiding conviction that the prophet sees Israel and his companions in their western home; sea-kings in Europe; a nation in the British islands, expanding into an ocean and island empire, extending onward into the age of subjugation, when an age gospel shall be trumpeted through every land throughout the world, and all people shall see the ensign and hear the trumpet of Jehovah on the mountains of Israel.

JEWETT, N. Y.

Editor Restitution:

I see and feel my feebleness—aim to avoid in act and spirit all self-reliance, and consent that others should be wiser and better than I; yet I have not lost my faith that "the Lord he is God,"—and his word the only foundation for faith or hope.

"Faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God." Rom. x. 6-17. Hence to me the plain word is the end of controversy; as to "o logos," "o theos," "to pleroma," "o kosmos," and these single articles—literal phrases.

"O logos" is that spoken: from logo, I speak, say, etc., and it occurs literally like other cases over 200 times in the New Testament, and over 1,000 in the Old Testament, Greek.

In the prolonged, elaborated and repeated assumptions of brother M. L. and the Bible Banner, no notice is taken of this and all like fundamental facts relating to the person of our Savior. "The life"—o zoe—is as primal and personal as o logos; and both appeared—were manifested—in Jesus' personality. 1 John i. 1-3; 1 Peter xix. 21; Heb. i. 1-3.

All know that the New Testament gives us "the record God hath given of his Son." 1 John v. 10-12. The genealogy 73 generations, and the reason for Jesus' name as "the Son of God." Mat. i. 21; Luke i. 35. Hence faith accepts the record—high as heaven above "all human inference and argumentation." Isa. lv. 9.

"The divine nature" and sonship of Jesus arises from and answers to his divine fatherhood; just as his human nature descends from his divinely appointed line, through the worthies to Abraham, David, and Mary. Mat. i; Luke iii. In John xiv., Father, Son, and the pronouns, occur over seventy times.

The divinity of Christ stands thus firmly on the same foundation with his humanity. Amen!

"The Father loveth the Son and sheweth him all things that himself doeth. The words that I speak, I speak not of myself; but the Father that dwelleth in me, he doeth the works." John iii. 16; v. 17-38; xiv. 10; 1 John iv. 16; 2 John iii. and ix.

This Fatherhood and Sonship are both one. 1. Cor. viii. 6; 1 Tim. ii. 5; Mark xii. 20-32. A volume of truth belongs here.

The Father and the Son, the angels and apostles, the nature and facts of the case—all concur to forbid another or diverse Sonship for Jesus Christ our Lord.

But as Israel failed in their fidelity, so has our erring christendom. "Hear, O Heavens! Give ear, O Earth! For the Lord hath spoken! I have brought up children, and they have rebelled against me." Isa. i. 2.

"God in Christ reconciling the world to himself," does not suffice. An intermediate, indeterminate divinity has been argued from "o logos." Then most of all that is said of Jesus' divine relations is assigned the "incarnation" of this "divine being." Surely this cannot be allowed to crowd out the very foundations of faith as to "God in Christ and the one Fatherhood!" Nay, more, it must not undo or let down the "one" divine Sonship of Jesus! It would destroy "the foundations."

In other words, we may ask to which we should adhere, to the unmistakable "record of God's Son, Jesus," or the argument that deranges the one faith, and distributes both the Fatherhood and the Sonship? As if "yea and nay" (2 Cor. i. 18-22), against all truth, to the contrary.

"Let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus....He humbled himself—obedient unto death—the death of the cross! Wherefore God hath highly exalted him, and given him a name above every name; that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, and every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father." Amen. Phil. ii. 5-11; Acts iv. 10-12; 2 John ix.

Now who can be competent to reconstruct this profound, fundamental and incomparable record of Jesus and insert the indefinite idea of a divinity—nowhere given for faith?

Observe: There has been no pre-existent one as to Adam—Abram—David John the Baptist, or the calling of "the church of the first born." No, not one.

Man was made of dust—not of a sunbeam or supernal spark! So now, he has not made known a super-angelic being—not of woman—not born and not at all in time—to be the "second man." Gen. ii. 7; 1 Cor. xv. 47; Gal. iv. 4; 1 Cor. i. 26-31.

"God's chosen Son" was cradled in a manger. "On this rock" the church is built. "Other foundation can no man lay". The seven-fold unities center here. Eph. iv. 4-15. All godly measures from Father, Son and Spirit, sustain our faith in Jesus—Jesus—Jesus—the one mediator! Amen!

"Only believe!" The Son is divine from God his Father!

Yours in the Faith, J. B. COOK.

Youths' Column.

Sooner or Later.

HANNAH F. STODDARD.

Sooner or later the storm shall beat
Over my slumbers from head to feet;
Sooner or later the winds will rave
In the long grass above my grave.

I shall not heed them where I lie,
Nothing their sound shall signify;
Nothing the heedlessness feel or raise;
Nothing to me the dark day's pain.

Sooner or later the sun shall shine
With tender warmth on that mound of mine;
Sooner or later, in summer air,
Flower and violet blossom there.

I shall not feel, in that dear old rest,
The shouting light fall over my breast,
Nor even note in those hidden hours
The pale blown breath of the passing showers.

Sooner or later the soldiers come
Shall fold their hands from my made repose;
Sooner or later shall hand and shill,
And heart, be [illegible] the travelling drift.

Chill though, that frozen pall shall seem,
Its touch no colder can make the dream
That we are [illegible] and sacred dread
Surrounding the clay of the dead.

Sooner or later the bee shall come
And fill the noon with its golden hum;
Sooner or later, on bright-pied wing,
The butterfly's warble about me sing—

Sing and chirrup and whistle with glee,
Nothing his music recalls to me!
None of these beautiful things shall know
How sweetly their love sleeps below.

Sooner or later, far out in the night,
The stars shall over me wing their flight;
Sooner or later the sparkling dews
Catch their white sparks in their silent mews.

Never a ray shall part the gloom
That wraps me round in the kindly tomb;
Peace shall be perfect for lip and brow,
Sooner or later—oh, why not now?

Watching One's Self.

"When I was a boy," said an old man, "we had a school-master who had an odd way of catching the idle boys. One day he called out to us, 'Boys, I must have closer attention to your books. The first one that sees another idle I want you to inform me and I will attend to the case.'"

"Ah," thought I to myself, "there is Joe Simmons that I don't like. I'll watch him, and if I see him look off his book, I'll tell." It was not long before I saw Joe look off his book, and immediately I informed the master.

"Indeed," said he, "how did you know he was idle?"

"I saw him," said I.

"You did? And were your eyes on your book when you saw him?"

"I was caught, and I never watched for idle boys again."

If we are sufficiently watchful over our own conduct, we shall have no time to find fault with the conduct of others.

Ants at Play.

The old story of ants indulging in games and play was for a long time thought to be a fable, but grave scientific gentlemen of our day have seen it, and we shall have to believe it now, queer as it seems. The old story was told by Huber, who saw the ants on a fine day assembled on the surface of their nest and behaving in a way that he could only explain as simulating festival sports or other games. They raised themselves on their hind legs, embraced each other with their fore legs, seized each other by the antennæ, feet, or mandibles, and wrestled, but all in friendliest fashion. They then let go, ran after each other, and played hide-and-seek. When one was victorious it seized all the others in the ring and tumbled them over like ninepins.

So much for the old writer; now says the new: The players caught each other by the feet or jaws, rolled over each other on the ground like boys playing, pulled each other inside the entrance of their nest, only to come out again, and so on. All this was done without bad temper, or any sparing of poison, and it was clear that all the rivalry was friendly.

Let all your words be full of truth,
Let kindly feelings reign;
Be good to all and let your smiles
Leave blessings in their train.
If Satan seeks by winsome wiles
To lift your life with woe,
Oh! heed him not, but turn away,
And boldly answer, No!

Only Once.

A man leaped from a railway car while in motion, only once, but it was a fatal leap. A youth who was unable to swim ventured out into the water beyond his depth, only once, and he never came back alive. A clerk who had made a good record and gained the confidence of his employers tried the experiment of taking and using a little money for an emergency, intending to restore it again, but the act was discovered, and it struck dead his reputation. A hot-tempered man gave way, only once, to a furious impulse, but in that one tempest of passion he struck a cruel blow that left its deep marks for a lifetime. Only once did a young girl tamper with a seducer, but it blasted her life.

Beware of making the "only once." One shot is enough to kill. One word is enough to embitter a lifetime. One rash act may darken the sky of hope forever. We die only once. We live only once in a probationary sphere. We have only one life chance. There is only one Savior. There is only one way of salvation, one door of escape from perdition. There is only one Book that reveals the way of life. You need but to refuse that Savior only once, and persist in your decision, and you are doomed forever. If you neglect only once that "great salvation," and abide by your choice, escape must be forever impossible.

A bright and once promising young man, under sentence for murder, was brought forth from his prison cell to die on the scaffold. The sheriff said, "You have but five minutes to live. If you have anything to say, speak now." The young man, bursting into tears, said, "I have to die. I had a little brother with beautiful black eyes and flaxen hair; and I loved him. But one day I got drunk for the first time in my life, and coming home I found him getting berries in the garden, and I became angry with him without a cause, and killed him with one blow of a rake. I was so drunk I knew nothing about it until the next day, when I awoke and found myself bound and guarded, and was told that my little brother was found, his hair clotted with blood and brains, and he was dead. Whisky had done it. It has ruined me. I never was drunk but once. I have only one word more to say. I say to young persons, never! never! NEVER! touch anything that can intoxicate!" The next moment the poor wretch was hung. He was drunk only once, but it was enough!

Only once! A minister was seen drunk only once, but years of penitence and devotion could not wipe out the stain from his character. That single blow struck down a fair reputation built up by the laborious efforts of years. Only once did a worthy citizen compromise his character with disreputable associations, but the shadow that fell upon his life was never lifted.

Happy are those who give heed to the words of wisdom: "Ponder the path of thy feet, and let all thy ways be established. Commit thy way unto the Lord, trust also in him. Keep thy heart with all diligence." In God alone is security.

My Dear Nephew:

The closing words of my last letter, (John iii. 16, God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish but have everlasting life) are indeed, as you say, full of meaning. We are not told why God loved the world, it is not necessary we should know. We are told that his love for humanity was such as to induce him to give his only begotten Son as a means through which those who believe on him might have life immortal. We have already seen in previous letters that Adam lost the rulership of the earth through disobedience. For the transgression he was shut out from the tree of life. He was a mortal, dying creature, and of necessity all his posterity were the same by nature, as it is an established fact in nature that like begets like.

God in his infinite wisdom devised the plan of man's salvation, and made it possible for him to obtain in or through faith in Christ, what Adam lost—opportunity of obtaining from the tree of life, that is endless life, immortality. In Heb. ii. 5 we are told "For unto the angels hath he not put in subjection the world to come whereof we speak." In the 7th verse we read that "he was made a little lower than the angels....and didst set him over the work of thy hands." In verse 8 we read that all things are put in subjection under his feet...."we see not yet all things put under him." Because his reign is not yet even begun on earth. Verse 9, But we see Jesus who was made a little lower than the angels for the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honor that he, by the grace of God, should taste death for every man. In verse 10 we learn that the Captain of our salvation was made perfect through suffering. Read also verses 11, 12, 13, indeed the whole chapter is full of deep interest. In verse 14 we read, "Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood he also himself (referring to Christ) likewise took part of the same, that through death he might destroy him that hath the power of death, that is, the devil.

In Heb. xii. 2 the apostle, in his exhortation says, "Looking unto Jesus the author and finisher of our faith, who for the joy that was set before him endured the cross, despising the shame and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God. For this joy that was set before him our blessed Lord endured the death of the cross. Again in Phil. ii. 7-11, we read of Christ, "But made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant and was made in the likeness of men. And being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself and became obedient to death, even the death of the cross."

Wherefore (for this reason) God also hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name.....That at the name of Jesus every knee should bow.....And that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord to the glory of God the Father. These are but very few of the multitudes of texts treating on this subject, but from these few can you not see that the All Wise placed an object or reward before his beloved Son when he sent him into the world, and that for this object or reward, the joy that was set before him, he bore a life of suffering, a life of most perfect obedience, in all things doing his Father's will. Isaiah tells us by inspiration, chapter liii. 7, "He was oppressed and he was afflicted yet he opened not his mouth. 8. He was taken from prison and from judgment and who shall declare his generation, for he was cut off out of the land of the living for the transgression of my people was he stricken." Read this entire chapter and see how very accurately is described by the prophet's pen the sufferings of Christ although written more than seven hundred years before he was crucified for us. Who can doubt the truth of inspiration? I think only those who refuse to read its sacred pages.

In conclusion then let me say that the sacrifice of Christ was for man's redemption or salvation. He, as it were takes the place of the tree of life to our race. Through faith and obedience all may live forever, for God wills not the death of any. All who will hear, believe, and obey shall be made immortal and dwell forever on this earth restored to Eden beauty—freed from the curse of sin and all its fearful consequences. More anon.

Yours in hope of life,
AUNT CARRIE.

THE RESTITUTION.

Plymouth, Indiana, Aug. 22, 1883.

NOTICE—Our next paper will bear date of September 5. Will be printed early in the week.

LITERARY BEVANS are inclined to discard the reported very ancient copy of a part of Deuteronomy as a forgery.

ANGOLA, the place of our next Quarterly Conference, is a town where the New York, Chicago & St. Louis Railway—the Nickel Plate—crosses the Indianapolis, Peru and Chicago Railroad of the Wabash system. Those coming east and west can take the former—those north and south the latter.

THE PAPAL HORN.

"But the judgment shall sit, and they shall take away his dominion, to consume and to destroy it to the end." Dan. vii. 26.

The following is a striking commentary on the fulfillment of the above prediction. On the 21st of August, 1870, Rome was completely evacuated by French troops in consequence of the war with Prussia. On the 8th of September Victor Immanuel wrote to the Pope announcing his intention to occupy Rome. The Italian troops entered the Papal territory September 12, and on the 20th entered Rome after a short resistance. In October the Plebicite gave an overwhelming vote for union with Italy. On the 9th of December Rome and its provinces were incorporated with the Italian kingdom by Royal Decree. Eighteen hundred and sixty-six was the 1260th year from that of the decree of the Emperor Phocas making Boniface III head of all the churches, A. D. 607. From the death of Phocas the 1260 solar years terminated in 1870.

"TIME, TIMES, AND AN HALF TIME."

END OF THE POPE'S TEMPORAL POWER.

The first of the following articles was written in the autumn of 1870, and the second shows the state of Rome today.

At a meeting called by the American and Foreign Christian Union in New York, Oct. 2, 1870, Rev. S. Irenæus Prime, D. D., said, "Is there a living freeman upon this earth who does not rejoice before God that that horny despotism, the Papal sovereignty, is gone down? that the most oppressive, tyrannical government, the most opposed to railroads, to telegraphs, to Bibles, to free schools—that such a government has fallen like Lucifer, never to rise again! Four years ago I was in Rome, and was pleasantly associated with a Scotch clergyman who was holding every Sabbath day a religious service in his own hired house, with a few British and American Christians. But while I was there an order came to this Scotch preacher, telling him that he was violating the law of the city, and exposed himself to the Inquisition. He must stop that preaching, or the Inquisition would put its loving arms about him, and crush him in the fatal hug.

The Inquisition was an existing institution in Rome three weeks ago, and is it nothing to thank God for that it exists no longer? In 1849, when for a brief hour the republicans held Rome during the flight of this pope, the dungeons and pits of that infernal Inquisition were opened, and out of the depths were drawn up the remains of clothing, and human bones, and long locks of human hair, women's hair—the ghastly relics of hapless victims of religious persecutions and hate in the nineteenth century of the Christian era. That is what is meant by the pope's temporal power. It was wrecked on the shoals of infallibility. In the pride of his heart the pope called his captains, and counsellors, and mighty men together from the four winds of heaven and feasted them in his palace, and they became drunk with pride and vain glory, and cried out, "He is infallible." God only is infallible; the pope is infallible; the pope is God! That same night was written on the walls of the Vatican in flaming characters, Mene, Mene, Tekel, Upharsin.

The next day the emperor of France proclaimed war against the great Protestant power of the north. He hurled his legions against the Prussians, and sank like Pharaoh and his hosts before the Lord. The surrender at Sedan tolled the knell of Rome's temporal power. The gospel is free in all Italy. It is free in Rome. Praise be to God! There should be a Protestant church in Rome. All over Italy they are springing into existence. The American and Foreign Christian union is doing a great work. It ought to have $100,000 now, this moment, for Italy. They want the gospel; they are hungering for the Word; they are free of the pope's accursed temporal despotism; give them the gospel, and they will be free indeed; and in spite of the Roman Catholic power in New York the Protestants of Christendom will yet sit in council in Rome, and we will pray for the conversion of the pope; for while there is life there is hope."

ROME UNDER THE POPE.

A dozen years have worked a mighty change in Rome. Twelve years ago it was the sleepiest and the least progressive of the cities of Europe. It was a city of priests and nothing else. Popes ruled it spiritually and temporally and it was their interest to not have it progress. What they wanted was a purely ecclesiastical city—a city devoted entirely to religion and religious establishments. They wanted no railroads, no gas, no streets, no trade, commerce or manufactures. It was a refuge for priests and nothing else. Gas was first introduced into the city in 1856, and thirteen years ago the Corso, the principal street of the city, was only partially lighted.

The pavements were wretched, the buildings were shabby to a degree, nothing of any account had been done to rescue the antiquities from destruction; in short, Rome was the harbor for priests, the seat of Papal power, and that was all.

There were at that time 200 monasteries in the city, the churches numbered nearly 600, and there was a horde of priests and friars who controlled the schools, such as they were, the hospitals, all the public works, and everything pertaining to the city and its government.

In 1870 the dream of the progressive Italians became a reality, and all Italy united under one Government. Victor Emanuel, by the help of Garibaldi, and guided by the great Cavour, entered Rome, made it the capital of the kingdom, and gave the city a municipal government, wrested the control from the church, and made Rome a city, indeed.

The most of the monasteries, all but about twenty, were taken by the government, payment being made to the church in bonds, and converted into schools or barracks, and laws were passed limiting their number. The Government left them enough houses to hold the number of monks it limited them to, but provided that no addition should be made to the number of inmates, and that when these should die out the property should go to the Government for public uses. The schools, especially, were cleaned of religious influence, and the church and state were permanently dissolved.

The orders, as orders, were forbidden to acquire or hold property as under the Papal rule, the design of the Government being to so curtail their power that they should be subservient to the Government instead of controlling it as before. The dog proposed to waggle the tail, and not the tail the dog. It was a bitter struggle between the clerical and liberal parties. But the latter has complete possession of the field, and is likely to hold it.

Pius, the then Pope, took all this in high dudgeon, and both he and his successor have ever since kept themselves very closely in the Vatican, posing before the Christian world as martyrs, at which Rome laughs.

Immediately there began an era of improvement. There was at that time but one railroad leading into the city, and that only twelve miles in length. English capital and skill was invited, and it came, as it always does where there is profit. When it became evident that Rome was to be rescued from the sloth and inaction of centuries, the energy and enterprise of the northern countries of Italy came down and infused new life in the old city. Piedmont and Tuscany, which have the best blood of Italy, sent down representative men who astonished the old Romans, who were in the habit of leaving things exactly as they found them, by inaugurating a system of improvement in everything. They regulated the police, they built new streets, in conjunction with the King they inaugurated a system of restoration and preservation of antiquities of the city, they built great hotels as fine as those in Paris and Berlin. Railroads were built north and south, street railroads were introduced, gas was supplied as plentifully as it is in other cities, the streets were paved, and old rookeries not worth retained as antiquities were torn down and replaced by modern structures, and new Rome grew up in the midst and by the side of old Rome. They made Rome something of a place to live in as well as to attract strangers.—D. R. Leake, in Toledo Blade.

Obituary.

DIED—At Argos, Ind., Aug. 17, 1883, Alice Wickizer, aged 31 years, 1 mo. and 11 days.

Sister Wickizer was baptized by Br. H. V. Reed some few years ago. Her family, friends, and the church have sustained a great loss in her death. Funeral discourse by the writer.

Editor Restitution:

I am requested by Sister E. L. Scott, of Wakeshma, Kalamazoo Co., to announce through THE RESTITUTION the death of her son Elmer, who was drowned in the South fork of Rogue River, Oregon, on the 30th of May last. The circumstances as obtained by those who last saw him and reported to Sr. S. by a family by the name of Nye with whom Elmer had formed an acquaintance are these, on the morning of the day he was supposed to be drowned, he started out in company with two other men in search of timber for R. R. ties (as they were engaged in getting out ties and camped in the woods) and thought they would prospect across the river, and in order to get there they felled a tree across the stream, but it did not fall favorable for a safe crossing, but Elmer being resolute determined to cross on the log and did so against the admonition of the rest of the party who dare not attempt to cross, so Elmer went on his search alone and the other men returned to camp.

Elmer was never seen alive after that. His body was found (the 29th of June) about six miles down the stream from where he crossed, making 30 days he was missing. Foul play was surmised until he was found. His body was in a good state of preservation and no mark of violence was found. An inquest was held and the jury returned a verdict of accidental drowning. Whether he attempted to cross back on the same log and fell in or whether he undertook to swim the stream and was taken with a cramp of course is not known, in either attempt it is thought that must be the case for he was an excellent swimmer although the stream is said to be a treacherous one.

Elmer had been in that section of the country but a short time, but had made the acquaintance of this Nye and his family who lived about six miles from their camp, and according to letters from them to Sr. Scott had formed a strong attachment for him. They say although a stranger in a strange land, yet he seemed to them like one of their family, and their letters to the bereaved mother are full of sympathy and truly affecting. The last Sunday he was seen alive he spent at Mr. Nye's house. When he was found, Mr. Nye took charge of the body after the inquest, procured a coffin, and attended to the burying which was done near the place where it was found. It appears it was quite a secluded place as they write they had to carry the coffin on their backs a mile and a half.

Elmer was 22 years old and the only son. We have been acquainted with him since he was a small boy and a noble boy he has always been too. A young man of purer habits and character could not be found; he was large and muscular and manliness could be seen in every look and action. How hard it is to become reconciled to the death of so noble a young man and especially cut off as he was! Yet it is comforting to the mother and sisters that notwithstanding he was a stranger in a far off country still he found those that appreciated his sterling worth.

Sister Scott is truly deserving of all our sympathy, pity and condolence in this great affliction. May the Lord help her to bear the stroke with fortitude.

Yours Truly,
D. F. SPENCER.

Editor Restitution:

Thinking it might be of interest to some of your readers to know what I have been doing, therefore I write.

Upon my return from Canada about last Jan. 1, my time up to April was spent mostly at home in study, reading, writing, teaching, manual labor and entertaining brethren and friends. Only absent from home a few evenings to preach the word near here. Meetings were good.

Since April much of my time has been spent in Canada, where I have labored much of my time for many years preaching the kingdom of God, and teaching those things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ, where a certain writer in the Sabbath Advocate states that they have "no one to preach to us"—them.

I have spent a number of Sundays with the church at Fonthill. Had good congregations, and a free time in presenting what I believe to be the truth, as revealed in the Living Oracles. This church eat the memorial supper every week. Some of them are deeply interested in the Palestine movement, as well as myself.

Have visited Thorold, Brantford and Collingswood; had refreshing seasons with the brethren and lovers of truth. Trust good was done.

June 22 I arranged to leave home to hold our annual grove meetings at Norwich and Sweaburg, on the last Sunday in June, and first Sunday in July. At Norwich, owing to the heavy rains, our meeting was held in Bro. Davis' driving house, which was very large. The day was favorable. The audience good with many outside the house; all gave good attention to my message. Closed the afternoon service by eating the memorial supper. It was a joyful time and a feast of fat things to all the lovers of truth. This was the 25th meeting of the kind that I have held in this vicinity.

The first Sunday in July we held our 17th annual grove meeting in Sweaburg. The day was beautiful, and the congregation large. It was judged that there was 1000 people out, some coming 10, 15, and even 40 miles. Better attention could not have been expected of so large an audience. Ate the memorial supper at the close of the afternoon service. A husband and wife requested immersion at this meeting.

Subject at morning meeting, The Coming of Jesus.—Its place in the Scriptures of Israel; its place in human redemption; its place in the faith and hope of the early disciples of Jesus; how they began to lose sight of it, and when, and the great loss they sustained; the place it should occupy in the church at the present time.

At afternoon meeting I gave a discourse predicated upon 1 Cor. i. 18. One of my hearers was heard to say they there was more saving truth in this discourse than would be preached by all the Orthodox preachers in Canada the coming year. But when I announced to the congregations at these meetings that my age and strength taught me that it was not my duty to give out any more appointments for grove meetings a year ahead, sadness was visible on many faces, and some said, what shall we do? is he never to come and preach for us again?

At these meetings my needs were remembered liberally.

Preached at Fonthill July 8, discoursing upon Eph. ii. 20.

July 20 left home for Oshawa, Ont., and the next morning Bro. D. Hogarth came and took me to his beautiful home, where I have for 24 years had a warm welcome. Stopped over two Sundays with the lovers of truth.

As usual, our meetings were well attended, some coming 12 miles. Brethren and friends did all for me that duty demanded.

After the close of the meeting in company with Bro. Bowerman and this family, I rode about ten miles to Whitby, where I stopped over two nights. Tuesday morning started for home. Stopped over one train in Toronto, and called on some of the loved ones.

We reached Suspension Bridge, and found Mrs. L. waiting to receive us. Took street car for Lyon's corners, where we found home, straw, povender and rest for our weary frame.

R. V. LYON.

Queries for those who have their Faces set to go to Jerusalem.

1. Is the evidence clear that the good Lord wants you there now?
2. Is your line of duty clearly marked out, so that you can help instead of hinder the work?
3. Have you means to help on the good work when there?
4. Would not your means and expenses do more good there than you could?

Now I do surely think that the times of restitution have come. God's promises must be fulfilled. Those who have been long cast off, gathered back to their fathers' land, but I am not so sure that some who go off in a hurry will not add a new burden to the overburdened workers.

To the Students of Prophecy throughout the World:

The undersigned proposes to issue from the press, either in Chicago or in New York City, as circumstances may decide, the following works, to-wit:

I. The Coming Age—Its Nature and Proximity. In the first division the nature of the Coming Age is fully discussed, as to its physical and moral character: 1. That the earth itself has a crowning age, in which it shall be perfectly adapted to be the residence of man in his highest type; 2. That man, in that resurrection state, will be under the endless reign of the Personal Messiah; 3. In establishing the proximity of that age, the prophecies of Ezekiel, Isaiah, Daniel, Zechariah, Christ, Paul, Peter, and the Apocalypse, are critically examined, relative to its rapid approach.

II. The second work will be devoted to the investigation of the various phases of the Eastern Question:—1. The Egyptian phase, 2. The British phase, 3. The Russian phase, 4. The Ottoman phase, 5. The Hebrew phase, 6. The American phase, 7. Lesser phases of the Eastern Question, 8. The location of each of the Great Powers in the coming contest, 9. All nations marshal under the banners of the dragon, the beast, and the false prophet. These powers are traced in history to the present time. All the great national issues are fully investigated.

If all that are interested in these great and most sublime topics will aid, they will be issued immediately. They will be printed and bound in a form that will do credit to the vastness of the subjects, and put to subscribers at prices quite reasonable. The books will contain about 500 large royal 8vo. pages each.

BIBLICAL RESEARCH.

Mrs. E. Consul Finn answers the question where was the Emmaus of Luke's Gospel by identifying it with certain baths in the Valley of Urtas, to the south of Bethlehem. Starting with the premise that the reading of sixty furlongs, in Luke xxiv. 13, is the right one, she concludes that the "village" or "hamlet" (κωμη) must have lain within such reach as would not prevent the due observance of the Paschal festival in Jerusalem by one passing the night at Emmaus. The word Emmaus, Josephus being interpreter, signified "a warm bath," and was the Greek form of the Hebrew חַמַּת Hammath. The same historian gives fifty furlongs as the distance of Etham from Jerusalem, and sixty furlongs as that of Herodium. Now, Etham lies at the head of the Valley of Urtas, while the Herodium or the Frank Mountain stands, as it were, over against its end, showing just about the proper measure for the valley in question. In the time of Solomon the valley was converted into a פַּרְדֵּס Pardes, "paradise" or "orchard," (Canticles iv. 13); and Herod, in his day, continued the term a little further down the vale, for what is still known as Furaidis, "the little Paradise." But in the Roman times, and among the Latin-speaking inhabitants, the same designation took the form of Hortus, whence the Hortus conclusus, "the Fountain Sealed" at the head of the water-source, of which the modern Arabic appellation is an unintelligible corruption. Why, then, was it called Emmaus, or "Baths" among the Greeks?

In 1857, when digging for foundations to a retaining wall of a garden plot, on striking some hewn stones and indications of former buildings, the fellahin workmen exclaimed, "Hammam!" and afterward explained that they were accustomed to call that part of the Valley Hammam, and a certain promontory by Liyat el-Hamman. This was the missing link to Mrs. Finn—Hammam, Hammath, Emmaus. Later, in 1861, in company with Mr. Cyril Graham, excavations were made in the adjoining field, where two Corinthian capitals, with portions of a cornice, had been recently dug up; and presto! only a few feet below the surface a bath was discovered, lined with purest white marble, four feet long, by three and a half wide, by three and three-quarters deep, provided with a step or a seat for the convenience of the bather, and all in perfect preservation. In it were two bronze strigiles, or scrapers similar to those found in the baths of Pompeii. Another was found, four feet four inches long by four feet wide and deep. Then, near by, further research revealed a tank, twenty-three feet long, by eighteen wide and four and a half deep. Higher up, and communicating with the tank by a cylindrical bore, was found a swimming-pool fifty-one feet wide by eight feet deep, of an undetermined [illegible]. In the earth with which they were filled lay many things indicating the ornament and richness of the work—columns of pure white marble nearly nine feet long and four in diameter, capitals carved in palm-leaf designs, white marble pavements, and also of the precious black bituminous stone from the Dead Sea, bits of Roman tiles, mosaics of colored and gilt glass, greenish window panes of glass, bits of thin glass vessels, the harp of a brass lock, other metal implements, Jewish copper coins, an iron hinge, a rusty sickle, etc., etc. The resemblance to Roman baths was complete, and the style and magnificence indicated the Royal Thermæ, perhaps of King Herod himself. Not that there were any hot springs here strictly to justify the term, but merely in the general sense of a fountain and bathing, where an abundance of water had caused the establishment of artificial conveniences for washing. That such a position for the Emmaus of our Lord's first walk with his two followers after his resurrection well suits the requirements of the narrative there can be no question; but it is only natural to wish for some other historic evidence that the spot bore this name during the first century of the Christian era.—The Independent.

New Postal Notes.

The new postal notes, which are to be used after September 3 in the transmission of small sums of money through the United States mails, are being printed rapidly in New York city, and it was announced on Saturday that they would be ready for shipment to all the post-offices in the country on Wednesday. Books of notes for the post-offices in the far West were completed yesterday. Every book contains 500 postal-note forms, with the address of the post-office printed on each note. The pages of the books are perforated, so that when the notes are torn out stubs remain to show the amounts for which they were issued. A note can be filled out by a postmaster for any amount not exceeding $5, at a cost to the sender of three cents for each note. The notes are made payable to "the bearer," and they can be used as fractional currency in any place to which they are sent. To guard against the use of the notes before the law authorizing their issue goes into effect, C. F. Macdonald, Superintendant of the Money-Order system at Washington, has caused to be pasted in each book of forms the following notice: "The postal-note business will commence on September 3, 1883. Under no circumstances whatever are any postal notes to be issued from this book before that date."

God Counts.

A brother and sister were playing in the dining room, when their mother set a basket of cakes on the tea-table and went out.

"How nice they look!" said the boy, reaching to take one.

His sister earnestly objected, and even drew back his hand, repeating that it was against their mother's direction.

"She did not count them," said he.

"But perhaps God did," answered the sister.

"You are right," he replied; "God does count, for the Bible says that 'the very hairs of your head are all numbered.'"

Herein find $25 to help THE RESTITUTION. If the friends of the paper will raise $90 to help it in the next month, I will give $10 more in addition to this. I am disposed to help Sister Davis, and would like a relic of Jerusalem, like a flower. I am a gardener, and hope soon, very soon to see the Garden of Eden, our old home. Oh! won't that be joyful when we meet to part no more!

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

The next Quarterly Conference is appointed to convene at Argos, Marshall Co., Ind., Friday, Sept. 7, 1883, at 4 p. m., and continue over the following Sunday. A general attendance and a good meeting are anticipated. Let us come together to exhort one another, and so much the more as we see the day approaching.

By Order of the Brethren.

The Annual Assembly of the Church of God will, if the Lord will, convene at the House of the Brethren, in Winchester, Va., on Friday the 7th, before the second Sunday in September, and as it is to be a conference of committees, appointed by various churches in the East, in order to effect a more general union to work in the Lord's vineyard, all of the brethren in Christ, everywhere, who have not been conferred with, as well as all who have, are respectively invited, and all who cannot attend in person, are requested to represent themselves whether individually or collectively, by letter. H. V. Reed, J. W. Wilson, Samuel Wilson, and other able ministers of the Word, are expected to be in attendance. All coming by rail will be met at the Winchester depot, and conducted to the House of the Brethren, where they will be cared for as long as it may suit them to stay.

POSTPONEMENT.

The Arkansas State Christian Conference will hold its next annual session with the Palarm church, 6 miles east of Conway Station, on the Little Rock and Ft. Smith Railway, to convene on Thursday night before the third Sunday in September, instead of August, as formerly announced. By order of the Executive Board,

N. B. ETHERIDGE, Sec.

The Lord willing, the Christian association of Iowa will hold a conference meeting at Glad-Brook, Tama Co., Iowa, on the Toledo and North Western R. R., commencing Thursday, Sept. 13, 1883, and holding over Sunday or longer if the interest warrants. Churches are requested to send the usual number of delegates, and all preaching brethren throughout the state are requested to be present. By order of the Board.

JOHN FITZ, Sec.

The fourth session of Quarterly Conference of the 2d District of Arkansas, will meet with the Annual State Conference, with the Church of God worshiping at Palarm Church, six miles east of Conway, Faulkner Co., commencing on Thursday night before the third Sunday in September. It is desired that every church be represented in this meeting, and to bring a full report of the year's work done at each church, and the number of members. Those that cannot send delegates will please send a report to the secretary. Brethren, come filled with God's love, and strength to push the great work forward. JOHN W. TEAS,

Box 58, Morrilton, Conway Co., Ark.

There will be a meeting of days two miles southwest of Prescott, Kan., to commence Saturday before the 3d Sunday in September. W. J. Orem and John Foore are expected. All are invited.

By order of the Congregation.

The undersigned expects to hold a meeting of days at Lakountains, Kan. commencing Saturday night before the 1st Sunday in September.

To the Friends of "The Restitution."

The cost of publishing THE RESTITUTION for the year just closed exceeded the receipts over $360. To repay this deficiency and secure means to publish the paper another year, we must raise, outside the regular subscription, at least $500. To secure that amount, the Board of Directors have requested me to appeal to each subscriber to contribute at least one dollar extra. This is not asked, as a donation, but brethren are requested to send names of persons to whom they wish the paper sent, with their contributions and the paper will be sent to such persons in payment for the amounts sent by each.

There are a large number of brethren and sisters in different localities who are unable to pay for the paper, and who would be very glad of the privilege of reading it. These are known to Brother Chaplin, the Editor. I would suggest that brethren who have no one to whom they specially desire to send the paper, send their contributions to THE RESTITUTION office with a request that the paper be sent to some worthy Christian who will appreciate it, but who is unable to pay for it. In this way brethren will be able to gladden the hearts of many poor but honest good Christians, and at the same time help to furnish the means to keep the paper going.

The fund will be known as "Free Will Offerings." Let each reader of THE RESTITUTION make a small sacrifice, and contribute at least one dollar, always remembering that the many persons to whom the paper will be thus sent will thank and bless you, and your Heavenly Father will reward you.

E. S. DWIGGINS, President.

Request.

Wanted—The names and addresses of all the brethren in the State of Arkansas, not belonging to the Arkansas State Conference. Realizing the fact that THE RESTITUTION is reflecting the Light of God's Truth wherever read, I wish and pray for its success.

Yours in Gospel Bonds.

THE JEW IN PALESTINE.

MRS. E. D. WASHBURN.

For the first time my feet have pressed
The soil which once Jehovah blessed!
I stand on holy ground. A Jew;
I breathe the air my fathers drew;
I view Jerusalem at last;
O'er hallowed scenes mine eyes are cast;
The temple of our God rose there:
Our fathers' tombs are stretching here;
By Zion's broken walls we mourn
Our fathers' graves despoiled and torn,
The olive groves defaced and sere,
The marble fountains dark and drear.
The furbished Turk, with haughty brow,
Walks o'er our ancient places now;
The symbols of our tribes are gone;
The hated Crescent towers alone:
And the false prophet's rites are paid
Where to Jehovah vows were made.
God of our Land! thou reignest still,
Let my soul bow before thy will!

'Tis said the tears which sorrow force
Afford relief to Misery's source.
And I have wept; for manhood's power
Avails not to this bitter hour.
The lingering sunbeams spread their glow
Over the gray walls on Zion's brow,
And cast their rays athwart the place
Where rest the tombs of Judah's race.
Land of sin promise, smilest thou yet
Or, as a harlot in shame art set.
God of our life, thy word is sure!
Through endless ages it will endure.
Ages may pass, the hour must come
Zion shall be our cherished home:
Her walls rebuilt, her dead shall rise;
Fragrant and pure, in cloudless skies,
Sweet incense through the healthful air
Shall blessings with its odors bear;
Again the grass shall clothe the plain,
Again shall fall the latter rain;
Its luscious fruit the fig tree bear.
The wilderness rich beauty wear.
From lands afar our children come.
Shout, Father! and their welcome home!
No blood of goats shall then be poured;
Elohim shall reign, our King and Lord.
Oh, Father! cast the veil away,
Surrending our eyes from that bright day.
Jehovah, Savior, Sovereign Lord,
Open our hearts to know thy word!

Enclosed please find a letter and my answer. When I commenced I thought to send direct to him, but now think perhaps others would be interested in these questions and answers.

P. H. WINTERSTEIN.

Rev. P. H. Winterstein, Dear Brother:

Today I stopped and took dinner at your father's. Have just read your your letter to your people here. Was glad to hear from one of my old scholars. I want you to write to me and give your opinion on the following questions:

1. Do you expect a general return of the Jews to Palestine soon?

2. Do you think they will accept Christ before his return?

3. Do you not think we are now living the closing scenes of the gospel dispensation?

4. Is there not a general expectation on the part of all nations of some great national change?

5. Will the coming of Christ be visible to the world, or only to the waiting ones?

6. Do you look for any great physical changes when the Savior comes?

7. What does living cost at Jerusalem compared with Nebraska?

When you write give me the particulars of your journey—cost of same, etc., also general church movements about the Ancient City.

W. R. S.

W. R. S., My Dear Sir:

Your interesting letter of June 9, just received, and as yours is the first of the kind I am anxiously looking for, I answer at once. You cannot know how much good it does me to get this kind of a letter from a minister of one of the popular churches; for it appears to me that they of all people, are paying the least attention to the "perilous times" which we have already entered upon. Again, for all the professed love for Jesus among the churches, they are the first to slur and scoff at the doctrine of his literal, personal second advent; of all the doctrines of the Bible the one the most to be cherished, and longed for, as it is then we receive our reward, as it is then he will deliver his people from the power of Satan, and at that time set up his kingdom and reign on the throne of his father David, as literally and personally as Mr. Arthur now holds the chief power at Washington over the United States. All the trouble with the people on this point arises from the idea handed down from the Pagan Rome Church, that at death we pass direct to heaven or hell. This, so far as the supposed righteous are concerned, does away with the day appointed for judgment, and the necessity of a personal return of Christ, and the resurrection. Now I think of it, it was because of this same doctrine that Paul was persecuted, and as these two events amount to one and the same thing, the heathen dogma would do away with both, as it is out of the question to suppose that people after once being admitted into what is called heaven, that they could after enjoying all the blessings to be found in a place of perfect bliss be brought back to earth, the place appointed for judgment, and then be judged to see whether they were worthy of what they had been enjoying, or of eternal torment—this same being another of the Old Harlot's festering sores.

Now, I am satisfied with the Bible plan, although every truth found therein is just to the opposite of what the natural man would like; our nature is corrupt. Man is a living lie, and cannot accept of truth in his Adamic condition. Will give you a few texts if you will be kind enough to look them up, and I am persuaded that you will; however, before doing so, my brother, I want to say to you before you commence the investigation of these few points, that are so repulsive to us at first, just resolve within yourself, and call on God for help, that you may be enabled to lay aside every thing that may stand between you and truth. If you are ready to sacrifice church associations, father, mother, sisters, brothers, lands, houses, wife and children, and preconceived opinion, which is harder to give up than all the balance, then you may depend you are where God can use you, in this dark hour, amidst the closing scenes of this corrupt anti-Christ age.

Now for the references—Eccl. ix. 5, 10; Psa. cxlvi. 3, 4; 1 Cor. xv. 32; Ezek. xviii. 4, 20. Repeated: The soul that sinneth it shall die, v. i., perish, the opposite of life; become as if it had not been, etc. Then, in a word, when once we cut loose from the doctrine, or dogma of natural immortality, and cease to use and believe in such terms as "the immortal soul," "never-dying spirit," etc., which are not found in God's word, then we have gained a victory over self and Satan. That moment a flood of light on God's plan of salvation will come to us, that we never dreamed of before. Not till then can we understand or appreciate Christ. Then can we see that eternal life depends wholly on his return, for he brings it with him. Rev. xxii. 12.

I have a book before me containing the following from Justin Martyr, on the Resurrection and Millennium; he says: "If you have fallen in with some who are called Christians, but who do not admit this (truth), and venture to blaspheme the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob, who say there is no resurrection of the dead, and that their souls, when they die, are taken to heaven, do not imagine that they are Christians."

Take Christ's personal return, and the resurrection away from me, and my hope, my all, is lost, nothing left.

Now I will take up your questions, and answer them as I understand God's word, with the light he has been pleased to give me, a creature mortal, perishable, having nothing, whose hope is the same as Paul's, who knows full well that eternal life is a gift of God, through and by Christ, at his second coming.

1. Yes; I believe they will return here as a nation, and then that remnant will be taken out; that is, the children of the promise; being the seed of Abraham is not sufficient, for they are not all Israel (the seed of Christ) which are of Israel (the flesh). I think it quite likely that when the armies of all nations come up here, to take part in that last great battle in this age, that many will then have their eyes open to their real nationality; likewise to see Christ as the Messiah, and will step out of the ranks of the armies. God works through human agencies; don't believe he will perform any miracles in bringing his people here; that is, I don't think he will use any means that will appear to the world as miraculous, but after the great work is finished, then will be seen the hand of the mighty God. I am happy in the belief that his good angels are now abroad in the world preparing and starting his chosen ones this way.

2. Yes; I believe they will accept of Christ before he comes, and that if there is the faith in the world at his coming, it will be among them as a people; for their house is left unto them desolate, and they are not to see him until the time comes, when they shall say "Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord." At least, I think there will be 144,000 of them, ready to receive him with the song of Moses and the Lamb. If the "Christian world" was not blinded through self-righteousness it might see that the Jew has the advantage in every way.

3. Yes, most assuredly we are living in the closing scenes of this age, and the darkest one of the world's history. You see I don't endorse your way of putting it; if this Babylon, Rebel, or confusion that the human race is battling with, is the result of the so-called gospel dispensation, then indeed the word has made a great mistake, for we read, "There is one body, and one spirit, even as ye are called in one hope of your calling. One Lord, one faith, one baptism." All candid thinkers, who have no creed to sustain, and no conference fund for their support, will agree on this, that if this is the gospel dispensation, the anti-Christ age is one to be dreaded.

Now my opinion is that God is shedding light on his word, as he has not been doing for ages. I believe he is giving different truths to different people, and that these truths when first presented are very unpopular. It is plain to me that these truths are being brought out gradually, and also it is plain for me to see that in this corrupt age it would not do to give one body of people all the truth; as it would exalt them to such an extent that they would want to climb up and sit astride the moon; and this would certainly bring ruin. But when one people is given say baptism, and another the Sabbath, and another some other truth, (not saying but what all may have more than one truth) and I am satisfied that some sects have no truth at all, and by these different people these truths, which have been buried under the "papal dung hill" for ages are brought to light, are rubbed up, and defended at whatever cost may be required, and after a time all will be brought together in one body. Then will the Holy Spirit be poured out, without stint or division, for then truth will be united, and the Holy Spirit can only come in its fullness where there is unity of truth. Unity of error brings another spirit. Now I understand that the work above referred to has been going on for some time in the world; at least since "the time of the end" commenced, and that soon all truth will be brought together under one head, here at Jerusalem, and then the antitype of Pentecost will come; for truth, nothing short of it, will prick the hearts of sinners, and cause them to cry out, and ask what they must do.

Now when this is done, and such work as Peter did is done again, that being only a shadow of this to come, then may we say indeed the gospel age has truly come. How long it will last I know not.

4. Yes I believe the idea is pretty general that we are approaching great national changes; but perhaps not such as the head men of the nations would desire, for their aim is to go forth to conquer, and get more territory, and more subjects to domineer over, and grind into the earth by their extravagances. Think of $10,000,000 worth of bread taken out of the mouths of God's hungry poor to gratify one bigoted fool, who imagines he is a god on earth. Yes all this squandered for the gratification of one who is not half so great in God's sight as lots of his subjects, who bear their oppression patiently. However, he and his like will come to their end, here in the "glorious holy mountain," and their carcasses will be food for the beasts of the field and the birds of the air. Ezek. xxxix. 17, 18.

National changes! Yes; for when these have come to their end then the God of heaven will set up an everlasting kingdom.

However the idea that has taken hold of the minds of the people, of some great calamity near at hand, is goading the masses on to greater villainy and lawlessness; this is on the increase, and what it will lead to may be called "perilous times" indeed, for as Paul says, "evil men are waxing worse and worse."

I am glad you see Christ's coming prior instead of after the millenium, as is the popular theory. I am very careful about how I have to do with "ideas that are popular."

Your next question is one that is puzzling the minds of many people. We read that this same Jesus shall so come in like manner, etc. He went away in a cloud. We also read he is to be seen coming in that way. We read that angels accompanied him, and they are to be seen when he comes. We read also that he ascended from a point near Bethany, and again that he is to rest his feet on the top of the Mount of Olives. We judge too that those who saw him ascend had faith enough to go out that far on his journey, if the road was a little rough and stony. I don't believe they could have seen him if they had remained in Jerusalem, shut up with their hearts filled with unbelief. I believe the electric telegraph, the Atlantic cable, and Edison's inventions are all great inventions, and that God has caused them to be made for an all-wise purpose; but I think the most of us prefer seeing an object to hearing others describe its beauty. But some will say, are not all the tribes of the earth to mourn at that time? and does it not say also that they are to see him? Matt. xxiv. 30. Yes, but this does not say that those same tribes spoken of are to be scattered throughout the world at that time. Wheresoever the carcass is there will the eagles be gathered together. I can think of nothing resembling a carcass more than Jerusalem. But if some say Christ is meant, I will not be contentious, simply answer that when he comes and commences that separating work of the sheep from the goats, that work is certainly done on earth, and we are told that he is to sit on the throne of his father David, and none will dispute but that was in Jerusalem. Those who imagine that their wings are sprouting and that in "the sweet by and by," etc., will see nothing in this, neither would they believe if one came from the fair regions beyond the clouds, that they sing about and know nothing of, and told them in plain English, that Jerusalem was the City of the Great King, and that it would be simply impossible for him to come to any but his own.

Next, I think those physical changes have already began, am quite sure the "wise" (Dan. xii. 10) can see them in America. It requires something of the kind to stir the people up, and cause them to enquire if there is a place of safety. But these changes have only begun, and according to the word they will gradually increase up to the time of his coming, at such a rate that the cities of the earth will be brought low, by tornadoes, floods, fire, and earthquakes. It does not require the spirit of prophecy to foresee what terrible havoc the nihilists and the numerous other secret organizations, will soon bring about, to compare this great evil to a mine filled with giant powder, and torch in hand ready to touch it off, is tame indeed. When that mighty element gets ready for its horrible work no earthly power will be able to stay its hand. Burning, and blood, everywhere murders by the score in broad day, for gold. Bankers, R. R. kings, and all the leading men, will not dare to venture abroad without being disguised. Officers of the law will be powerless, for even now the "Judge asketh for reward, and receiveth it." The heads of the nations see these murderous hands raising up on every side. See this awful monster in the shape of vicious men advancing, plans being perfected, and all getting ready for one mighty strike for equality. Yes, they see it, but can do nothing to stop it. It is simply inevitable. There are certain signs spoken of in Matt. xxiv., in the sun, moon, and stars, that some think have had their fulfilment. This I don't believe, and think I can prove to any unprejudiced mind that those things are yet future. Some have set their stakes, by those very things, as having already taken place, and we fear it will be like the 43–44 movement, many will die by their stakes. I will drive none!

Next. Living is about the same here as in Nebraska, save this, we get along here very well without those little extras that Americans delight in. We don't care for them any more, the fact of the matter is, there are so many here that have scarcely enough food to keep "soul and body" together as the saying is, we feel like getting along with as little as possible. Staples are about the same price as in Nebraska.

Now to the journey. It cost us (two) $54 from Omaha to New York. This was second class from Chicago, but I got one-half rate on first class from Omaha to Chicago. We took the Bordeaux steamship line from New York, got tickets through to Marseilles, but this company landed us at Bordeaux, and then sent us flying across France about 500 miles by rail. This was a change, after twelve days on the Atlantic, and we appreciated the delightful scenery of France. This cost us $32 each steerage on board ship, food furnished, and third class by rail. This I believe is the cheapest route at present, and starts from Pier 54, North River. Parties getting ready to come would do well to communicate with the General Agent of this company, and get posted on the time of departure of ships, etc.

From Marseilles we took the Messageries steamer, or rather one of them, third class from here to Alexandria for Mrs. W. $25, deck for myself $16, and we decided that the deck was preferable. Deck again from here to Joppa $4 each; then to Jerusalem there is no set price. We got a carriage for us, and baggage, all for one Napoleon ($4.) We had four good comfortables and two pillows in a shawl strap, and I can recommend it to all who are traveling on just money enough to take them safely through.

We arrived all right with $4 left. The God of Daniel has wonderfully provided for us, and will continue to do so.

Now brother, in future please do not attach "Rev." to my name, for with the aid of my concordance, I only find it once in the Bible, and then it refers to God, while I am only a very small part of his creation. Our opinion is that some of these high-sounding titles will take a very low seat in the kingdom, for there are but few of them who are not breaking one of the commandments and teaching men so.

Yours in hope of eternal life and more light.

P. H. WINTERSTEIN.

THE GLORIOUS FUTURE AS REVEALED BY GOD'S HOLY PROPHETS.

The prophet Isaiah may be justly regarded as emphatically the millennial prophet; he appears to have spoken more about the glorious future of the nation of Israel in connection with the coming kingdom than all the other prophets together. It seems that he could not write scarcely a single chapter without making allusion in some way or other to the glorious time when "the glory of God should be revealed and all flesh should see it together; when the Branch of David should reign and prosper, and execute justice and judgment in the earth." We find his first chapter, which begins with a record of Israel's rebellions and sins, could not be finished without an allusion to the coming period when God would "purge Israel of their dross, and restore her judges as at the first; and her counsellors as at the beginning, when Jerusalem should be called the city of righteousness, the faithful city." What, says one, are Israel's judges to be restored as at the first? Well, the Word says so, and we think Jesus said something that will greatly confirm it; well, what did he say? When his disciples, who had forsaken all to follow him, asked him what they should receive, he said unto them: "Ye which have followed me, in the regeneration, when the Son of man shall sit upon the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of the children of Israel." Matt. xix. 28. Then, according to this, when the disciples are resurrected and glorified, they shall sit as the judges of the twelve tribes of Israel, who will not be burned up root and branch, but made an "eternal excellency in the earth."

Well it is this glorious period that is now near at hand, that seems to have claimed Isaiah's special attention, so much so that John when speaking of certain prophecies belonging to this dark age, said, "these things spake Isaiah when he saw his glory and spake of him." John xii. 41. The chapter we wish to make a few remarks from is the 65th of Isaiah, commencing at the 20th verse. This chapter, like almost every other chapter in the book, contains an allusion to the sins of Israel, and then concludes with a glowing description of Israel's flourishing condition under the reign of their returned Messiah in his Melchisedical character when he shall sit as king and priest upon the throne of David. We wish some of our brethren had a little of Isaiah's spirit, so that they could not write or speak or preach without making allusion to the glorious future when Jerusalem shall be established and made a praise in the earth, and when all nations shall flow unto it and learn the righteousness that shall be diffused from that illustrious centre of the world as the brightness of the sun; and also be participants of the saving health that shall go forth therefrom as a lamp that burneth.

How Isaiah must have longed for the time to come when his bright vision would have its effect in the literal fulfilment in the glorious revelation of the King in his beauty as the restorer of the breach in the nation of Israel, and as the mighty conqueror of sin and death, and upon whom depends the accomplishment of the work of restitution, by which and in which all those glorious predictions will be fulfilled. Isaiah will be there in immortal vigor, says he: "Thy dead men shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise." As soon as the "day-star" emerges from the dark horizon, and before the Sun of Righteousness has poured forth a ray of light upon the dark and sinful world, the silent sleepers of the dust shall awake and spring forth into the immortal image of Christ and be caught away to meet the Lord: and when he comes to Zion and to them that turn from transgression in Jacob, his glorified friends come with him. Thus will Isaiah and all the assembly of the faithful of all ages be eye-witnesses and participators in the glory that is to be revealed when the Lord comes to make the "place of his feet glorious."

We must now proceed to consider the 20th verse of this chapter which certainly indicates a very different state of humanity from that which now exists. It reads thus: "There shall be no more thence an infant of days, nor an old man that hath not filled his days: for the child shall die an hundred years old, but the sinner being an hundred years old shall be accursed." From the time Jerusalem is made a rejoicing city, and the voice of weeping and crying is ceased in her, from this time onward, no one will die before 100 years, and even then no one would except they are sinners. This is certainly a very desirable time, a glorious time when no one will die except they are a sinner. How long think you the present age of the world would continue before such a condition of the human race would be attained? We have read of a French scientist who gave it as his opinion that the discoveries and attainments of the medical sciences would, in process of time render the human race impregnable to the attack of death. But this to the Bible believer can only pass as a vain speculation of philosophy and science falsely so called. Such a radical change in the human race, as that none will die except they are sinners, cannot be brought about until the Great Physician, "the Son of Righteousness shall arise with healing in his wings," and abolishes the vices and corrupt systems of society that has very much to do in causing untimely deaths.

We do not think that the language has reference to the renovated nation of Israel, for this reason: When the nation of Israel is born at once or in one day, they cannot sin any more, for ungodliness is turned away from them, and the Word says, "They shall be all righteous;" and "the remnant of Israel shall not do iniquity, nor speak lies, neither shall a deceitful tongue be found in their mouth." Zeph. iii. 13. For they will have a new heart, and a new spirit, and consequently it will be impossible for them to sin. Neither do we believe that the posterity of Israel that shall be born after they are regenerated will ever sin; for then the voice of weeping and crying might again be heard in Jerusalem, whereas the Word says it shall be no more; neither shall they see evil any more. We think Israel will neither sin nor die, after the veil is taken away from their eyes. But the Lord does say that he "will leave in the midst of Israel an afflicted and poor people and they shall trust in the name of the Lord." Zeph. iii. 12. And again, "He that gathereth Israel will gather others besides them. It may be among these people sinners might be found. We think it is Scriptural to apply the language to people outside of Israel, or to the surrounding nations.

However, the word is true, and will be fulfilled. And what a contrast to the present age of mortality, where a large portion of the human race die before seven years of age. Think of it, no one dying before 100 years, and then only a sinner will die; what a rapid increase in population will there be; is it any wonder the revelator said, at the close of the millennium the number of earth's population were as the sands of the sea? There shall be no more an untimely death from the time Jerusalem is created a rejoicing city; neither shall there be an old man that hath not filled his days. That is, all who survive 100 years will advance from childhood (which will be reckoned at 100 years) unto old age, or fill out his days, which will be living until the close of time, or end of the millennium, and then become partaker of the leaves of the tree of life, which are said to be for the "healing of the nations." Thus having lived through the age to come and until the enemy death is destroyed, and having their constitution changed and renewed with youthful vigor by partaking of the "tree of life which is in the midst of the Paradise of God," which is to be located on the new earth. They will then be beyond the reach of death, and consequently will live on, on forever. Of glorious future awaiting the elect nations of the earth.

We understand the first part of this verse to refer to a state of things in Jerusalem, and in the kingdom; but when the kingdom of God is first set up it does not fill the whole earth, but will be small, like the "stone" cut out of the mountain, that finally becomes a great mountain and fills the whole earth. Outside of the kingdom, and upon the earth in the age to come the condition of things will be different from what it will be in the kingdom, and very much different also from the present state of things. And this is where we understand the last part of this verse is applicable. For the elder shall be as the young at 100 years, but the sinner or child, dying 100 years old shall be accursed. Outside of the kingdom in Palestine, and at some time in all other parts of the earth, will this be true. That is, what is true of the kingdom where the first part of the verse will be first fulfilled, for the sinless state of perfection that will be found in the kingdom at commencement, will ultimately fill the whole earth. Outside of the kingdom, where the sinless nation of Israel are enjoying its blessings, there will be sin and death, yet it will be a state far superior to the present; inasmuch as there will be no premature death, for the child or sinner will die 100 years old. Seventy years are now the common age of man, and one sixth of that may properly be called childhood. Upon the same ratio, in the age to come, where men's lives will be prolonged in mortality to such a great age, as the "age of a tree," a hundred years would not be an unreasonable period for childhood; a hundred years will only be the one-tenth of the full age in mortality. This will not exceed very much the longevity of man before the flood, where they lived over 900 years. The sinner being accursed at 100 years of age, will be the child that shall die an 100 years old. It would seem from this that it any should not prove to be obedient they would not be suffered to live beyond the age of 100 years.

Certain it is, that the passage indicates a glorious change and reformation in the mortal condition of humanity, when their lives will be prolonged through 1000 years, for if one is called a child at 100 years, must not the old man that fills his days be 1000 years old? Surely he must. Is it any wonder that all nations should call the King of all the earth blessed, when all men shall be blessed in him? Well might the Psalmist in anticipation of this glorious period, when the King of Israel should have dominion from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth, exclaim in the glorious strain in the 72 Psalm, "Blessed be the Lord God, the God of Israel, who only doeth wondrous things; and blessed be his glorious name forever; and let the whole earth be filled with his glory." The next verse says, "And they shall build houses and inhabit them." This language sounds strange in the ears of many people who cannot understand how it can be that people will build houses in the kingdom of God. We understand that houses have been built in the kingdom of God, for the kingdom of God has been set up on the earth though on an earthly plane. If you will read the 29th capter of 1 Chron., 23 verse, you will find that Solomon sat on the throne of the Lord as king, instead of David his father; then read the 21 chapter of Ezekiel, 25–27 verses, and you will find he was speaking of Zedekiah, the last king that sat upon the throne of David or throne of the Lord; and Ezekiel says concerning this last evil king, that he should be dethroned, and the diadem and crown removed, and the kingdom overturned and be no more, until he come whose right it is, and saith the Lord, "I will give it him."

Thus the kingdom of God has been on the earth, and glory to God it is going to be on the earth again, for says Jesus: "The Son of man shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend and them which do iniquity." And did he not say to the Jews, "The kingdom of God shall be taken from you"; and how could it be taken from the Jews, unless in their possession? hence once on the earth. Thus there have been houses in the kingdom of God, and why not they be built again? The Word says they will, and I believe it. Turn to the 9th chapter of Amos, and you will find it stated in plain literal language, that in that day the Lord will raise up the tabernacle of David that is fallen, and close up the breaches thereof; and raise up his ruins and build it as in the days of old." And then in the 14th verse he says: "And I will bring again the captivity of my people of Israel, and they shall build the waste cities and inhabit them." Of course a large collection of houses make a city, and if the waste cities are going to be built, and the Word of God says they are, then there will be a great many houses built, will there not?

AN INQUIRY.

Say, is thy lamp burning, my brother?
I pray thee look quickly and see
For if it were burning, then surely
Some rays would fall bright upon me!

Straight, straight in the road, yet I falter,
From the Shepherd I oft go astray;
I am weary and faint and disheartened—
Discouraged because of the way."

But He only thy lamp had trimmed richly,
And showed forth what Christ was to thee,
I too might have seen his salvation,
And felt it was also for me.

There are many and many around thee
Needing sorely thy Father's favor;
If then knowest they walked in the shadow,
Thy lamp would burn brighter, I know.

I think were it known each night and morning,
It would never grow dim or go out,
Nor the fierce raging storms of temptation
And the terrible tempest of doubt.

Oh, if all the lamps that are lighted,
Were steadily burn in a row,
While over the land and the ocean,
What a circle of glory would shine!

How all the dark places would brighten!
How the mists would roll up and away!
How earth would laugh out in her gladness,
And hail the millennial day!

'Tis stored, Christ alone, in whose power
Thy lamp may again bright y shine,
For he is the life of his children,
And no, if true trust, may be mine.

ORIENTAL SKETCHES.—Second Series. Number 21.

NORTHERN SHARON.

We halted at the Western gate of Samaria, waiting for one or two straggglers, and to take a last look at the place. The gate is a shapeless heap of ruins, forming the termination of the well-known colonnade. I was never more deeply impressed with the minute accuracy of prophetic description, and the literal fulfilment of every detail, than when standing on that spot. Samaria occupied one of the finest sites in Palestine—a low, rounded hill, in the center of a rich valley, enclosed by picturesque mountains. Temples and palaces once adorned it, famed throughout the East for the splendor of their architecture. But the destroyer has passed over it. I saw that long line of broken shafts with the vines growing luxuriantly round their bases—I saw a group of columns in a corn-field on the hill-top—I saw hewn and sculptured blocks of marble and limestone in the rude walls of the terraced vineyards—I saw great heaps of stones and rubbish among the olive groves in the bottom of the valley far below—but I saw no other trace of the city founded by Omri and adorned by Herod. One would think the prophet Micah had seen that desolate site as I saw it, his description is so graphic: "I will make Samaria as an heap of the field, and as plantings of a vineyard; and I will pour down the stones thereof into the valley, and I will discover the foundations thereof." Micah i. 6.

Our road—a mere goat-track—led down the hillside through fields of ripe grain, in which the reapers were at work, though it was still early in May. We soon entered Wady Shair, a prolongation of the fertile and beautiful valley which separates Ebal and Gerizim, and at the head of which stands Nabulus, the modern representative of Shechem. Down it wound our long cavalcade, through corn-fields and olive groves, and past threshing-floors already heaped up with the fruits of the early harvest. I observed with interest how masters and servants were there grouped together—the sheikh in his scarlet mantle, and the stalwart fellah in his coat of many colors. Women and children too were there, and cooking utensils, and beds, showing that the harvest scenes of modern days among the villages of Palestine are just the same as those we read of in the Book of Ruth.

After a three hours' march we defiled from the valley into the plain of Sharon. Up among the mountains where the valley was narrow, and the declivities steep and rugged, nearly every available spot was cultivated, and populous villages appeared on each side. Here, on looking over the broad, fertile plain, not a human habitation was visible, and only a few patches of the soil near the base of the mountains were under culture. Vineyards and olive groves here disappeared. Traces of the Roman road which once connected the great cities of Cæsarea and Sebaste are there, but it is overgrown with thistles and rank grass; and in a ride of four hours we did not see a solitary traveler—so true is it that "the highways lie waste, and the wayfaring man ceaseth."

We turned north-west along the base of the mountains. On our right, perched on hill tops or standing on rocky slope, were a few small half-ruinous villages: while, on our left, out upon the plain, we saw at long intervals little circlets of black tents. This is border land, between plain and mountain, between tent and house, between industrious villagers and wandering vagabonds, whose hands, like those of their forefathers, are "against every man."

We found our tents pitched at Bakah, a populous village on the side of the plain. Its inhabitants are rich, well armed, and powerful. They wage an unceasing warfare with the Bedawin who infest Sharon, and by their courage, watchfulness, and rifles, they manage to keep them at a respectful distance. We were no little amused to find that the escort we had brought from the Governor of Nabulus would not advance an inch beyond Bakah. So far the road was perfectly safe, and so far the soldiers guarded us; but the plain westward swarmed with Bedawin, among whom the soldiers would not venture, and consequently, pocketing their bakhshish, they returned in peace to their commander.

From Bakah I found it impossible to obtain either guide or escort to Cæsarea. There is a standing blood-feud between its people and the Hawara Arabs, who roam over the intervening plain. But I arranged with the village sheikh to conduct our party to a neutral tribe, with whom he assured us an arrangement could be effected. He did not fail to advise us, however, to turn backward into the mountains, and proceed northward by a less dangerous route. This did not suit my plans: but as some ladies had joined my party, I thought it necessary to inform them and their companions of the true state of matters, and to show them how they might escape all danger by taking another route. In reply they asked me if I intended to go to Cæsarea. "Most assuredly," I said. "Then we shall go too."

Our party mustered at sunrise and set out at once, led by two sheikhs splendidly mounted, and armed with tufted lances, carabines, and pistols. The caravan had a formidable look. Every rifle was unslung. The muleteers and servants, with their guns on their shoulders, kept close together in the center, while a few active villagers brought up the rear. We numbered about forty animals, and as many men. Recent disturbances among the Arab tribes made the road unusually dangerous; and as our friends of Bakah had, only two days previously, killed two of a plundering party of Sukrs, they were now apprehensive of an attack in greater force. For the first half hour we traversed the cultivated fields of Bakah, and then entered a wild, rugged district. Low rocky spurs project from the mountains into the plain, sprinkled with oak trees, and covered with dense jungles of thorns and thistles—such thistles as are only seen in Palestine, often as tall as a man on horseback. We had gone but a short distance when one of our leaders raised a cry of alarm. I galloped to the front, and saw a number of Bedawin lurking among the trees. Fortunately the path was tolerably wide. We drew up the horsemen on each side, placed the ladies and baggage animals in the center, and then marched in military order. It was an anxious moment. We knew not at what point the enemy might assail us, or in what force they might come. For about an hour we advanced through the tangled thicket cautiously and silently. Then, with feelings of relief, we defiled into the open plain, and rode over it half a mile to a large fountain.

The scene around us was thoroughly oriental. A tribe of semi-nomads were assembled on their threshing-floors, all busily engaged in the various details of "treading out the corn," winnowing, and carrying off the grain to subterranean magazines. Every man had his gun within reach. Some were driving the oxen with muskets slung on their shoulders, and pistols in their belts. Women were there too—bold, stalwart women, whose look and mien reminded one of Deborah and Jael—armed with heavy clubs, partly intended to help their husbands in case of attack, and partly to toss up the grain and straw on the "floors." A number of horsemen, acting as patrols, scoured the neighboring heights to give timely notice of an enemy. The moment we emerged from the oak forests the patriots galloped in, and the men and women prepared, with a skill and quickness that would have done credit to regular troops, for defending their position.

Our Bakah escort could conduct us no farther. The outposts of the Hawara and Sukr were not far distant. We were consequently delivered over to this neutral tribe. After much difficulty and long negotiation, we succeeded in persuading two footmen to guide us to Cæsarea. We had to abandon all idea of an escort, for we were plainly told that we must defend ourselves in case of attack, and that the guides would not interfere in any quarrel. Before parting, the guides very deliberately proceeded to divest themselves of every bit of decent clothing they possessed; even guns, and pistols, and daggers were laid aside. Retaining each a tattered shirt, and a bit of rag for a turban, they took a couple of clubs from the women, and led us on.

We set out due west, through cornfields recently reaped. In a quarter of an hour all cultivation ceased. The plain extended away before us, not flat, but in graceful undulations, covered with rank grass, and weeds, and tall thistles. Clumps of trees were studded here and there over it. Away on the left, about two miles distant, was the long dark line of an oak forest shutting in the view, while about an equal distance on the right were the roots of Carmel shooting down into the plain in picturesque wooded promontories. The whole landscape reminded me of some of the noble parks of old England. The only living creatures in sight for miles were some flocks of gazelles.

There was no path and no impediment, and so we rode straight forward to the white sand-hills faintly visible on the horizon. We had got about half-way, when, on topping a rising ground, we found before us a depression or valley, all cultivated. Here a number of men were at work—some gathering in the newly reaped grain, some on the threshing-floors with yokes of oxen, some tending herds of cattle, and a goodly number on horseback scouring the surrounding country. Our sudden appearance created a great commotion. The size of our party, the glittering of our arms, and our warlike aspect, made them believe that a Bedawy Ghuzu was upon them. The workmen fled, the shepherds drove in the cattle, the horsemen galloped round, urging them on with their spears; and in a very few minutes they were all concentrated on a little mound, prepared for defence. We passed half a mile to the south of the gathering-place; but here we unwittingly cut off a small party of some seven or eight men, engaged with their harvest in a retired glen. On seeing us they fled, leaving donkeys, and oxen, and even clothes, as they supposed, at the mercy of the spoilers. Riding onwards at a sharp pace, we entered a valley, where we halted for a few minutes to examine an old building, apparently a fortified caravanserai. While scattered about the ruins we were startled by a wild shout, and looking up we saw a party of Hawara dashing down upon us at full gallop. A word was given, and in a moment we drew together, formed a line in front of the ladies, and prepared to give the Arabs a warm reception should they venture on attack. Our bold front, and the sight of a formidable file of English rifles, cooled their ardor. They reined up, and looked steadily at us, as if trying to note a single sign of wavering or fear. While standing there they formed as wild and picturesque a group as ever peaceful pilgrims encountered, or wandering artist sketched. Their lances poised high overhead, the bright steel points glittering in the midst of black tufts of feathers—their arms and legs bare—their hair streaming in long plaited locks over breast and shoulders—their faces bronzed, and their eyes flashing with excitement—and their noble horses, with curved neck and expanded nostril, more eager for the fray even than their riders. We could not but admire these wild children of the desert, worthy representatives of their progenitor Ishmael.

While the balance hung between peace and war, the ladies, with a coolness and a "pluck" that would have done honor to veteran campaigners, were quietly passing remarks on the proud bearing and strange costume of the Bedawin; and one of them—a daughter of the most distinguished prelate that ever adorned the Irish church—took out her book and pencil to sketch the scene. I shall never forget the astonished look of the Hawara chief, as he exclaimed, on seeing this act, "By the life of the prophet the Englishwoman is writing us down!"

The courage of the ladies produced apparently as powerful an effect as the sight of our rifles and revolvers. But be this as it may, the Hawara thought discretion the better part of valor. Shouting a friendly Salamu alekum—"Peace be with you!"—they wheeled round their horses and galloped off. We watched their movements, fearing that they might return in greater force. But we saw them strike off northward, until, coming upon a couple of poor fishermen on the banks of the Crocodile river, they seized them and left them, in point of costume, precisely as the thieves left the man who "went down from Jerusalem to Jericho."

Such is modern life on the plain of Sharon. "No flesh has peace" there. Those who venture to till the soil must guard the fruit of their labor with the sword, and even rich life is not enjoyed properly. "Sharon is a wilderness," and through that wilderness the spoilers now come upon all high places." Jer. xii. 12.

BLOOD-REVENGE AND THE CITIES OF REFUGE.

In the year 1874 the writer, with two friends, made the trip from Jerusalem to Jericho. We had with us a dragoman, a servant who carried the lunch, and an Arab guide and protector. This last, a lad of sixteen or seventeen years, was said to be a son of the sheik whose authority extended over the Bedaween of the region. He was ragly dressed, having a scarlet jacket slashed at the sleeves, and a variegated kaffiyeh on his head. He rode a dappled gray horse, spirited but gentle, which he controlled, as did every mounted Bedawi I met with, not by a bridle, but simply with a red rope fastened on one side to an ordinary headstall

Our journey completely fulfilled the anticipations excited by the unusual realness of the books in illustration of the parable of the Good Samaritan as to the character of the road leading down to Jericho. It was as desolate and dreary as can well be imagined. We rode mile after mile without seeing a house, an enclosure, a cultivated spot or any other sign of inhabitants. Indeed, for the first half of the way the only thing of life that could be seen was a small flock of sheep on a hillside guided by their shepherd to a spring which burst forth at the foot of the hill. It was doubtful if even in Palestine there is any spot where it would be less desirable to meet with wandering marauders. The gloomy ravines, the waste and barren hills, the oppressive solitude, seemed to invite to deeds of violence.

After we had been in the saddle for several hours, the quiet of the march was suddenly interrupted. A cloud of dust in the distance announced the approach of a band of horsemen, and we felt some trepidation, which was not lessened as they came nearer and we could see that every one of the riders was armed to the teeth, a musket slung across his back, and his belt liberally supplied with sword, pistol or knife. Their faces, naturally fierce and forbidding, did not become less so as they saw us, whom they at once recognized as hated Giaours or infidels. Our dragoman at first took out a pair of old pistols which he was in the habit of carrying, but which in his hands would, I think, be more dangerous to himself than to his foes. His soon, however, replaced them, and we continued our course with as much show of unconcern as we could command. The two parties met and passed each other without salutation, but also without molestation. Afterward it came out that these men were a band from the neighborhood of the Frank Mountain who had gone across the Jordan in pursuit of some robbers that had carried off a considerable flock of sheep, and were now returning unsuccessful.

There seemed no reason why these men, from ten to twenty in number, should not fall upon our party and treat us as the man was treated of whom our Lord's parable speaks. Certainly we could make no effective opposition. I asked the dragoman why they refrained. He pointed to the young sheik who rode at our side. But, said I, suppose they killed him along with us and so no witness would be left to tell the tale? The answer was that the young man was known to be our conductor, and if missed, his family would at once make inquiry as to the reason, and when they found out, as they certainly would, who were his murderers, his nearest blood relation would set out in pursuit and never rest until justice was done. This was far more certain than the slow and languid proceedings of the Turkish pasha at Jerusalem. He might be discouraged or indifferent, but, according to the immemorial usages of the Bedaween there could be no abatement of zeal or effort until the guilty party was arrested. Hence, our protection by the presence of the young and unarmed Arab was complete. The unwritten law of the desert, which makes the nearest relative the avenger of a homicide's victim, is a restraint as efficacious as the severest penalty of any European code. This is shown by the character of the Bedawi now. Crimes against property may abound, but those against the person are rare. More than once, in the east, I saw parties who were quarrelling come to blows, but the blows were given with the open palm and never drew blood. Similar was the testimony borne by the late Mr. E. H. Palmer, who was more familiar with the Arabic customs than anybody else.

It is impossible to consider the state of things among the nomads of the East in this respect, without seeing the wisdom of the Mosaic enactments in regard to the judicial protection of life. The great law-giver found a custom prevailing which in that state of society was the only guarantee against unrestrained violence. It made the nearest kinsman of a murdered man the lawful prosecutor of the criminal, thus calling in the attachments of the family and the tribe to aid in the administration of justice. The wise leader of Israel left this arrangement in force, but guarded it against abuse by providing cities of refuge in places convenient of access, whither a manslayer might flee and be safe from assault until an investigation of the case could be made. Six of these were established in Israel, three on either side of the Jordan, conspicuous for position, easy of approach, and large enough to resist any sudden attack. The elders of these cities would, of course, through the experience acquired in dealing with fugitives in the course of years, acquire ability to treat wisely and justly whatever came before them, and to award shelter to the involuntary manslayer, while the wilful murderer was given up to the doom which he richly merits by all law, human and divine. No part of the Mosaic institute exhibits a more skillful adaptation of new plans to old customs, so as to preserve what was valuable in the habits of the people, and yet guard it against haste and passion. And the experience and observation of the present century show that however rude the judicial usages of the tribes of the desert may seem to us, yet they are admirably fitted to their wandering life, and if supplemented by such a provision as Moses enacted, would serve all needful purposes.

The existence of the cities of refuge and their purpose have often been used in illustration of the escape of men from the avenger of sin under the gospel, and certainly with fine effect. There is much in any suggestion from such a source to stir the imagination and awaken the feelings. And this use of Old Testament uses is not only legitimate but praiseworthy, as indeed is everything which gives to well-known truth point, force and incisiveness. But when matters are pressed beyond this, and we are bidden to see in all this arrangement a typical foreshadowing of the elements of the gospel, essential truth is needlessly sacrificed. The avenger of blood of old who, though fulfilling a judicial function, may have been, and no doubt often was, full of pure human wrath, angry at a wrong done to himself, was no type of God the Most High, in his calm and holy opposition to sin and his righteous displeasure at sinners. Nor is the manslayer, in his flight, a type of the sinner, because the former was, or supposed to be, comparatively innocent, one who had slain his companion unawares, and without malice aforethought, whereas the latter is wholly depraved and guilty, doing their undone, and a suppliant not for justice but for mercy, offering no plea in his own behalf founded on anything done or suffered by himself. Nor yet is the city of refuge a type of the Lord Jesus Christ. The city preserved him who came to it only until an investigation could be made. It stood in the way of sudden and undeserved violence—a matter of very great importance to every fugitive. But if on inquiry it was found that any one who enjoyed its safeguard was really a murderer, there was no longer any protection for him. He was given over at once to the execution of the Noachian precept, "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed." Not so the gospel refugee. Whoso has fled for refuge to lay hold upon the hope set before him has strong consolation. He is never surrendered. He has come as lost and helpless, and his help has been laid upon one mighty to save, able to save unto the uttermost. He is held, kept, saved, not because he is innocent, but because confessing and forsaking his sin, and believing in the anointed Savior of sinners, he is within the range of the blessed promise, "Him that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out."

The typology of Scripture is a very important and useful branch of Biblical study, but it needs to be pursued with reverence and care. Conducted on genuine principles, it illumines much of the Old Testament, and imparts great freshness and vividness to the didactic statements of the New. But followed under the guidance of mere fancy or a capricious and arbitrary use of analogies, it sheds darkness instead of light, and is likely to lead its votaries sadly astray.—Rev. Talbot W. Chambers, in New York Observer.

WORK AND OBEDIENCE.

We must work. We must pursue our appointed task till a new command comes. It may seem a poor and dull thing to go back from scenes of great excitement and lofty expectations to simple duties which belonged to an earlier time. But that, we see, is the method of God. Perhaps it will be through these that the higher call will come; perhaps no higher call will ever come to us. But our duty is still the same. We cannot tell the value of any particular service either for the society or for our own training. Much must be done to the end of the workman's life, which is a preparation only. The Baptist continued to labor as he had first labored, though he knew and confessed, "I must decrease."

We must obey. The order is given at last, (so we are inclined to fancy), at an ill-chosen moment. We are wearied with long and fruitless toil. The favorable time has passed. We think that experience has made us acquainted with the conditions of hope, and we hope no longer. Moreover, the order is given by one whom we do not recognize. But nevertheless it is clear and precise. We remember past crises not unlike that in which we are placed, when such an order was proved to be divine. And happy are we if we dare to trust the bidding which sounds in our hearts, to acknowledge the special call which brings home to us that vague, general presence in which we profess to believe. Then in the sequel of late and unlooked for success, as it may be, we shall know him from whom it came.

In one sense it will be always true that we toil in the night; true that the gathering of the church will be in the night; true that we shall be tempted to say within ourselves, "We have taken nothing." Even so we can strive, God helping us, to win our own souls in patience, and to win souls for him, till the day break and the shadows depart, waiting, working, obeying; and on the Great Morning, when there shall be no more sea, no more storm and peril and change, the Lord will stand ready to welcome us with the gifts of his eternal kingdom; whence, even now, though unseen, he beholds every disappointment and every effort.—Canon Westcott, in The Revelation of the Risen Lord.

FULL TIMES.

God's times are full times. "In the fulness of time Christ came." Twelve hundred and sixty years is a full prophetic period. Three hundred and sixty-five years, and a day for a year as counted in prophecy. Last year when Mohammedan Egypt was conquered by Great Britain was just 1260 years from the Mohammedan hegira, and just 365 years from the banishment of the Caliphs from Egypt, and the establishment of the Caliphate at Constantinople in Turkey.

"In that day, (Isa. xix. 19, 20), Egypt was promised a savior and a great one" to deliver them (not the Savior.) Query: Is Great Britain that Savior?

The date of this event is 40 1-2 centuries from the time when the great pyramid was founded; 40 1-2 is the radius of the remarkable circle which has 81 for its diameter. That in the great pyramid the radius of a circle points to both the circle and its square, notice John Taylor's last discovery concerning the pyramid's vertical height.—James Fenwick, in International Standard for July.

The Restitution.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXII. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, SEPTEMBER 5, 1883. NO. 33.

THE RESTITUTION.
TERMS—TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR, Payable in advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.

Address all Letters and Communications to THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:
THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

BRITISH PHASE OF THE EASTERN QUESTION.—No. 38.

Isa. xviii.—Supplementary—Its application to the Saxon family further considered. — Progressiveness of prophecy—Stick of Joseph must include Manasseh as well as Ephraim. British Empire—Its growth—Its Eastern mission.

Supplementary on Isa. xviii. We have dwelt on the stick of Joseph in the hand of Ephraim; that stick, however, included Joseph's two sons, Manasseh as well as Ephraim. Since each was to be great, Jacob's blessings were on both: "The angel which redeemed me from all evil, bless the lads; and let my name be named on them, and the name of my fathers Abraham and Isaac: and let them grow into a multitude in the midst of the earth." Gen. xlviii. 16. Ver. 19—And he (Manasseh) also shall be great: but truly his younger brother shall be greater than he, and his seed shall become a multitude of nations." The blessings which Jacob pronounced upon Joseph (Gen. xlix. 22, 27) must, therefore, be divided between Ephraim and Manasseh; giving Ephraim more than half. Since the British nation answers to Ephraim as Saxons (sons of Isaac), the Saxons are seen by Isaiah in a home still to the west — in America — and in other ocean homes.

Isaiah is called the Evangelical prophet, since he describes the gospel mission, "Go ye swift messengers." Isaiah's vision landscape extended into the age of Messiah. The prophet's landscape constantly varied as he ascended into the horizons of coming ages. Every step in advance, like ascending a mountain, increased the area of his prophetic vision.

Hence the prophet Isaiah had first the Babylonian horizon. As he ascended the tower of prophetic observation; the next in view was the Medo-Persian horizon; above this the Macedonian earth came to view; on a higher platform of the tower the Roman world fills his vision: from the summit of the tower the glories of Messiah's kingdom reveal the new order of ages, in succession, the Babylonian, the Medo-Persian, the Macedonian, the Roman and Hebrew horizons fill the prophet's vision. Isaiah is permitted to look beyond the metallic empires into the universal kingdom of the stone. The sons of Isaac are traced to their western homes; the Saxon is followed as he extends over the wall, and encircles the globe.

The thought which should be left with the reader is this: Manasseh constitutes part of the stick of Joseph, since his was to be a great nation, and was associated with Ephraim in the family relationship. Is Manasseh the United States? Such is the view entertained by those expositors who hold to the idea of Anglo-Israel. The unity of our subject will not allow us, at present, to dwell upon that phase of the Eastern Question. We may find time to illustrate that subject in the future. Our present theme is the British empire, its growth and its eastern mission.

Growth of the British Empire.—John Baptist said of Christ, "He must increase, but I must decrease." Other nations may decrease, become few and finally expire, but the stick of Joseph in the hand of Ephraim, like Aaron's rod, has in it a living principle, which will cause it to bud, blossom, and fill the earth with its golden fruit.

We shall now trace the growth of the Saxon element as seen in the British Empire. The growth of the British Empire is confined principally to the past one hundred and fifty years. Her oldest colonies extend farther back; but her dependent nationalities are confined principally to the present century as will appear from the following dates; 1. Heligoland, taken from the Danes, 1807; ceded to Great Britain 1814; 2. Gibraltar was taken in 1704; 3. Malta in 1798; 4. Gambia, 1780; 5. Sierra Leone about the same date; 6. Cape of Good Hope 1806; 7. Natal, May 12, 1843; 8. Zululand, 1879; 9. Mauritius, 1810; 10. Aden, Jan. 11, 1839. 11. Perim, 1857; 12. Straits settlements, 1867; 13. India, gradually erecting the purposes of the Almighty, while she is making use of vain titles of "My Empire of the Indies," "My dominions," "My subjects," etc. Are these the proper expressions of an humble servant of the Being that gives her life and all things? It is done in utter ignorance of God's purposes. The true object of her prosperity is still beyond her blinded vision. The Empire, as Anglo-Israel, is still "lost," and the time has not yet come when her true character and mission will be publicly made known. God opens His eyes first upon Judah, afterwards he causes Israel (British empire) to find herself. She has been nominally serving Jesus of Nazareth, but not as Israel. They have been his followers under a new name. Victoria serves the divine purposes as did the Persian Cyrus: "For Jacob my servant's sake, and Israel mine elect, I have even called thee by thy name: I have surnamed thee though thou hast not known me." Isa. xlv. 4.

The British empire is in pursuit of wealth and power. Beyond her own selfish purposes she sees nothing, knows nothing. The wealth of those ancient empires of India, China and Japan is a powerful magnet to draw her eastward; and she is directing her mighty energies to secure them and open up a grand highway directly to them. For selfish, commercial purposes she desires to establish on her highway eastward a commission nation composed of the Jews (Judah) as they are acquainted with all languages, and are familiar with every species of traffic. To guard against their great enemy of the north (Russia) it is her policy to protect for the present the Turkish and Persian empires. They serve the purpose of a wall while she is securing her eastern dominions, and her water and land communications. Such seem to be the motives of the British empire in her movements to the east. She is being wonderfully prospered in her plans. Her success in Egypt was so natural and apparently so just, that Europe and even Russia allowed it without making any very serious objections. Indeed Egypt appears to have been forced upon England, while, at the same time it was necessary for the accomplishment of her purposes. Thus is a nation led by the great Unseen. Apparently independent yet a national servant.

We have said that England's purpose is to control the wealth of the East. To do this she must 1. Hold the sovereignty of the seas; 2. She must command the Eastern highways; 3. She must keep in her hands the paramount control and the protectorate of Syria, Assyria and Persia; 4. She must keep up a national barrier against the Empire of the North. These being secured she will then be able to command the commerce of the East.

That England has any other object in view by her eastern movements we have no reason to believe. Pure selfishness as follows all her national operations; wealth is her primary object of pursuit. Mammon is her national god. To that deity she pays her public devotions.

While we thus speak we do not forget her missionary work. She is the chief patron of the great missionary enterprise of modern Christendom. Her colonies, belting the globe, till the bounds of the seas with the name of Jesus of Nazareth. The Cross and the Crown, through her mighty arm, are held up to the view and acceptance of all nations. The swift messenger, flying through mid-heaven with "an everlasting gospel, never flies beyond the shadow of her proud banner, nor lights upon any land that does not utter her anthems of divine harmony. What a nation! The national missionary of the last days! An oppressor; and the asylum of the oppressed!

RICHARD OSMAN.

1773; 14 Ceylon, March 2, 1815; 15. Labuan, 1846; 16. Tasmania, 1825; 17. Western Australia, 1829; 18. Southern Australia, 1834; 19. New Zealand, 1841, 20. Victoria, 1851; 21. Queensland, 1859; 22. Hong Kong and 15 Chinese ports, 1843. These constitute the eastern circle of dependent nations.

The western nations and colonies are the following: 1. The 13 colonies became independent, 1776, (Manasseh?) 2. The following confederacy was formed in 1873: 1. Canada; 2. Manitoba; 3. British Columbia; 4. Vancouver's Island; 5. Fiji; 6. Other Pacific Islands; 7. New Zealand; 8. Falkland Islands; 9. St. Helena; 10. Ascension Islands; 11. British Guiana; 12. Trinidad; 13. Windward Islands; 14. Granada; 15. Barbadoes; 16. St. Lucia; 17. St. Vincent; 18. Tobago; 19. Leeward Islands, 20 Antigua; 21. Montserat; 22. British Honderas; 23. Turk's Island; 24 Bahamas; 25. Bermuda; 26. Nova-Scotia; 27 Prince Edward Island; 28. New Brunswick; 29. Newfoundland.

This growth of the British empire is graphically expressed in Gen. xlix. 22, concerning Joseph, whose stick is in the hand of Ephraim (Ezek. xxxvii. 16, 19), "Joseph (Ephraim and Manasseh) (is) a fruitful bough, even) a fruitful bough by a well: (whose) branches run over the wall." What nation can answer like Britain to the following? "Thou shalt break forth on the right hand and on the left, and thy seed shall inherit the Gentiles, and make the desolate cities to be inhabited." Isa. liv. 3. "Listen, O Isles, unto me, and hearken ye people from afar." Isa. xlix. 1. In her Eastern circle now reckon Cyprus and Egypt. Egypt, it is true, is nominally a part of the Ottoman empire, still no one can say that it is not under the control of the British Empire. The Khedive is a British tool with which to accomplish her eastern mission. Egypt, Palestine (all the Holy Land) and Assyria, will form her eastern national confederacy. Isa. xix. 23-25.

This is necessary for the accomplishment of that prediction, "In that day shall there be a highway out of to Assyria, and the Assyrian shall come into Egypt, and the Egyptian into Assyria, and the Egyptians shall serve (serve whom?) the Assyrians. In that day shall Israel (Ephraim) be the third with Egypt and with Assyria (even) a blessing in the midst of the land: whom the Lord of hosts shall bless, saying, "Blessed (be) Egypt my people, and Assyria the work of my hands, and Israel mine inheritance."

The British empire must, therefore, grow till her East India possessions and her Egyptian extension, through the land of Israel and Assyria, form a union. This empire of the south will then be prepared to meet the empire of the north on the mountains of Israel.

II. The Eastern Mission of the British Empire.—We have very briefly traced the modern growth of the British empire. We have marked her movements eastward, seen her establish an empire in the Indies, gain a strong footing in China and in Japan, holding Australia and many of the Pacific Islands, holding Egypt, and becoming the great protectorate of the Ottoman empire which now reckons Egypt, the land of Israel and Assyria as elements of her empire in Asia. What, then, is her mission in the East? What is her special work? This we now propose to consider as fully as our space will allow. The book which we shall consult is the prophetic Scriptures. They are replete with future history, especially of the two great powers of the last days: viz: The king of the North and the king of the South; or Gog, with his royal companions, opposed by the great protector of the Hebrews, the merchant princes of the great west, known by the names of "Sheba, Dedan and the merchants of Tarshish, with all the young lions thereof." Ezek. xxxviii. 13.

Great Britain is evidently in the dark as to God's purpose in making her mistress of the seas, and pushing her towards the Orient. Nations know not Jehovah till he forces their monarchs into pastures to feed upon "grass." They will say, "My kingdom," "My empire," while they ignore the power that works behind the visible throne. Queen Victoria is ignorant that such a name was there! But the Moabite stone dropped out of the patched wall, to bear witness for God. Here and there the Anatolian shepherd picks up a coin and sells it in Smyrna. It bears its witness for Luke. The late survey of Palestine has been as it were a second edition of the book of Joshua. The fish-nets of Tyre, the silence of Petra, the furrows of Zion, the dead cities of Moab and Argob are on God's side.

And, doubtless, there are a thousand more such witnesses under the dust of Eastern lands. Whether it shall please God to call up many of them we may not assert. Enough has already been unearthed to convict every reading man of our day of great hardness of heart, if he believe not that these Scriptures are the true sayings of God.

Pompey boasted he needed only to stamp his foot on Italian soil, to call up legions of Romans to fight for him: and we read in poetry how, in a moment, Roderick Dhu could make fern and heather bristle with armed followers. But in our day, Jehovah makes the stones cry out for witness. The stone heap, the mound of pottery-sherds, the lost coin, the inscribed brick, the empty sarcophagus, the papyrus, the crumbling triumphal arch, the crocked cippus, the painted tomb-cavern, the swathed mummy, the blurred palimpsest, the hieroglyphic obelisk, the sculptured rock-face, the sepulchral lamp, the ciphers of the catacombs, all utter their voice, and lift up their hands on high to testify, "These are the Oracles of God!"

And many more such voices will yet be heard. Many a lonesome mound in Canaan or Shinar must now is scratched by the jackal's brood or shakes under the lion's tread, will yet lift up its voice. It will be as the Galeed, the Jegar-sahadutha between Laban and Jacob. It will prove to be an Heaped Witness, to testify for God.

Not that Jehovah needs the testimony. Not that we have a right to it. But as a help to the weakness of the faith of his people; and as a part of that tremendous case which he is now making up against his adversaries, and which he will bring forth at the last session.

Judex ergo cum sedebit,
Quidquid latet apparebit.

The sea of time is a whirlpool that swalloweth all things yearly. Yet from year to year must that vast oblivious gulf regurgitate some of its spoils. From the voiceless deeps they are cast up, that they may rest as trophies at the base of God's eternal word. That word of truth is standing, a column of rock in the waste of tumultuous and tossing foam. There it rises, white and solemn, unshattered and grand. Its friends are saved by clinging to it. Its enemies are dashed in pieces against it. He that evoked the clay which had been four days in the tomb, can summon his witnesses which have been four millenniums beneath the dust, and make them "plead like angels, trumpet-tongued," against the unbelief of sinful men.—Thomas A. T. Hanna in National Baptist.

ORIENTAL SKETCHES.—Second Series, Number 25.

CESAREA.

We were just two hours and a half in crossing the plain, and it was not yet noon when we entered the southern or Joppa gate of Cesarea. Cesarea was the capital of Palestine in the days of the apostles; it was the favorite residence of that Herod who "killed James the brother of John with the sword;" and it was the scene of the tyrant's awful death, recorded in Acts xii. 21-24. The city was closely connected with the early history of the Apostolic Church. Philip, after baptizing the Ethiopian eunuch, passed through Philistia and Sharon, "preaching in all the cities till he came to Cesarea." Acts viii. 26-40. Peter here first preached the gospel to the Gentiles, and here he baptized Cornelius, the first Gentile convert (x. 47). It was to Cesarea Paul was brought a prisoner from Jerusalem. It was in the palace in this city he so spake of "righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come," that he made Felix tremble. It was here the power of his logic forced King Agrippa to exclaim, "Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian." And it was from this harbor he embarked on his long and eventful voyage to Rome. Acts xxiii. 33; xxiv. 25; xxvi. 28; xxvii. 1, 2. Here Eusebius, the father of ecclesiastical history, spent nearly his whole life, having been bishop of the diocese for a quarter of a century (A. D. 315—340). Here, too, Procopius was born in the beginning of the sixth century. The city was thus the home of the two greatest historians of antiquity.

In passing through the gate of Cesarea, I felt that I was indeed entering a "holy and historic place;" and I envy not the Christian or the scholar who could tread that site and look on those ruins without experiencing such a sense of mingled awe and reverence, and inspiring sympathy, as is ever awakened in the mind by the immediate presence of the great and the good. In only a very few other cities of Palestine was I so deeply impressed, so strangely and powerfully excited, by the religio loci. The profound silence, the utter desolation, the total absence of every sign of human life, left me alone, as it were, with the sacred associations and stirring memories of the past. The gate by which Peter entered was there; the ruins of the palace in which Paul preached were there: the remains of the harbor in which he embarked were there; the massive fragments of Eusebius' church were there; the walls which the brave crusaders built were there. Every great event in the sacred and civil history of the city was localized, and fancy grouped again the old actors of the old scenes.

The ruins of Cesarea lie close along the winding shore, projecting here and there into the sea, and presenting huge masses of shattered masonry and piles of granite columns to the restless waves. In the interior all is ruin. Not a building remains entire. Not even the foundations of a building can be fully traced. Heaps of stone and rubbish, here a solitary column, there a disjointed arch, yonder a fragment of a wall—all encumbered or overgrown with thorns, and briars, and thistles, intermixed in spring with myriads of yellow marigolds and scarlet poppies. The famous harbor is choked up with sand and rubbish; and the great mole now forms that picturesque group of broken, sea-beaten masonry which projects far into the sea, and constitutes the most striking feature in the well-known sketches of Bartlett, Tipping, and others. I wandered for hours among the ruins of Cesarea. The sighing of the wind among the broken walls, the deep moan of the sea as each wave broke upon the cavernous ruins of the ancient harbor, were the only sounds I heard. I saw no man. The Arab and the shepherd avoid the spot. The very birds and beasts seem to shun it. The only living creature I saw during my stay was a jackal in one of the crypts of the cathedral.

Eight miles north of Cesarea is Tantura, a small village, built on an open sandy beach. Near it are the ruins of the ancient city of Dor, whose ruler was an ally of Jabin, king of Hazor, and one of the opponents of Joshua (Josh. xi. 1, 2). We encamped for the night on the site, and next morning rode northward along the shore to Carmel. The only place we passed worthy of note was the massive and picturesque fortress of Athlit, built on a rock which juts out into the sea. The Crusaders called it Castellum Peregrinorum, "Pilgrim's Castle," because it was a favorite landing-place for pilgrims on their way to the Holy City. Near it I observed an old road hewn through a cliff; and in its rocky floor the chariots have worn deep ruts, which reminded me of those in the streets of Pompeii.

CARMEL.

The good monks of the Convent of Carmel gave us a cordial welcome; and their neat rooms and clean beds formed real luxuries, which those only can fully appreciate who have spent weeks in camp life. One of the sweetest retreats, one of the most charming resting-places for the pilgrim in Palestine, is the convent of Mount Carmel. Here is a house that would not disgrace royalty; here are men whose intelligence and genial bonhomie even a cowl can not cover; here is air cool and bracing during the hottest summer day; and here is a noble site, looking away out over the deep blue sea, commanding the classic shores of Phœnicia, and showing the snow-crowned peaks of Lebanon and Hermon over the "excellency of Carmel."

Carmel has many attractions for the naturalist, the antiquarian, and the classical scholar as well as for the student of the Bible. Its ridge, descending on one side into the rich plain of Acre, and on the other, to the green vale of Dor or Sharon, contains some of the most pleasing, park-like scenery in Palestine. The wood that clothes it is chiefly prickly oak, a beautiful evergreen, so that while the "excellency of Carmel" (Isa. xxv. 2) might well be regarded as a type of natural beauty, the "withering" of its foliage (Amos i. 2; Isaiah xxxiii. 9) ought to be considered as an emblem of national desolation. The forest glades of Carmel are spangled with flowers of every hue. The thickets abound in game, and are also infested with wolves, hyenas and leopards.

The sides of the mountain near the convent are filled with caves and grottoes, which formed the abodes of hermits in ancient days. The largest of these is called the "Cave of the Prophets," because Elijah is said to have received the chiefs of the people there. It is a plain, rock-hewn chamber, with Greek names and inscriptions on the walls. In the fields below it great numbers of stones may be seen, which resemble melons and olives. The former are flints, with beautiful sparry matter inside; and the latter are good specimens of the fossil echinus.

SCENE OF ELIJAH'S SACRIFICE.

Carmel is chiefly celebrated as the scene of Elijah's sacrifice. The exact spot is marked by local tradition, by the agreement of its physical features with the Scripture narrative, and by its name, el-Muhrakah, "The Sacrifice." It is about six hours' ride from the convent, over the crest of the ridge. I visited it from the plain of Esdraelon, on the opposite or eastern side. It is on the brow of the mountain, and commands the whole plain to Jezreel and Tabor. Close to the base of the range, below the spot, flows the river Kishon, where the prophets of Baal were slain; and just above the spot is a projecting peak from which Elijah's servant saw the "little cloud, like a man's hand, rising out of the sea." 1 Kings xviii.

Another episode of Bible history I read with new interest in this place. Elisha was here when the Shunamite's son died. Looking down one afternoon from his commanding position, he saw her "afar off" on the plain. He sent his servant to meet her; but she pressed up the mountain side "to the man of God." Dismounting hastily, she threw herself on the ground before him, and "caught him by the feet"—just as an Arab would still do under similar circumstances. Elisha, on hearing her tale of sorrow, sent away Gehazi with his staff to raise the dead child; but she, with all a mother's earnestness, exclaimed, "As the Lord liveth, and as thy soul liveth, I will not leave thee. And he rose and followed her." 2 Kings iv.

Carmel was the favorite retreat of both Elijah and Elisha. In the stirring times in which they lived, it was a fitting place for the prosecution of the great work of reform for which they labored and prayed. It was central in position, and easy of access from all parts of Palestine. It afforded in its deep dells and dense thickets sufficient privacy for such as wished to pay secret visits to the men of God; and it offered a secure asylum to all compelled to flee from the persecutions of the idolatrous Ahab, and the cruelties of the infamous Jezebel. The situation of el-Muhrakah also struck me as peculiarly suitable for the head-quarters of the prophets. It could only be reached by a long and steep ascent. No man could approach it unseen; and any hostile party would be visible at a great distance. Beside it is a well with an unfailing spring, and upon it are the remains of a massive ancient building.

Sitting on that commanding height, on a bright spring evening, I felt persuaded I was upon the scene of Elijah's great sacrifice. Beside and under me were probably the very stones of which God's altar was built, and over which played the heavenly flame. A few paces beneath me was the well from which the water was drawn that the prophets servants poured upon the altar. Around me were the thickets from which the wood was cut. Away at the foot of the mountain flowed the Kishon in its deep bed, which on that day ran red with the blood of Jehovah's enemies. There, stretching out before me, was the plain across which Ahab dashed in his chariot; and yonder, on its eastern border, I saw the little villages which mark the sites and bear the names of Jezreel and Shunem. Is it strange that when one thus visits the "holy and historic places of Palestine," the grand events of Bible history should appear to be enacted over again, and should become to him living realities?

"Land of fair Palestine, where Jesus trod,
Thy ruins and thy relics tell of God:
Thine everlasting hills with awe proclaim
The holy records of Jehovah's name:
Thy fallen cities crumbled into dust,
Proclaim the judgment of Jehovah just."

THE TESTIMONY OF THE RUINS.

"The stone shall cry out of the wall."

If the truth of the Scriptures can be said to be on trial in the world of sinners, shall we not also say that the Almighty can make out a strong case for himself? Not a hundredth part of his witnesses have yet been called to the stand. "There are yet words for God.

If the judgment is to be rendered according to the weight and number of witnesses, the verdict will be to uphold the claims of our holy writings.

It is true there are some witnesses against them. But of these it may be said, as of some formerly engaged in a like enterprise, that their witness agreeth not together.

A few boastful voices will outshout a multitude of modest ones. The hoardings of so-called scientific unbelief are loud; but the Lord's people have no need to play that game of bluff. Sir Thomas Browne wrote something like this, once: "I know the names, and something more, of all the principal stars, yet have I seen a prating mariner that could barely name the 'pointers,' outtalk me, and conceit himself a whole sphere above me." The man who is up in a balloon may look down upon his fellow-men as being far beneath him, but his "high blown pride breaks under him,' and all the time his neighbors have more solid ground for confidence than he.

Here and there, God quietly unearths some new proof of the truth of his word. "Egypt shall gather them up, Memphis shall bury them," till God's hour comes, and then the caves of Egypt bring forth their dead secrets, and after forty centuries of silence, the mummy speaks as with man's voice, to forbid the madness of the modern Balaam. Babylon's rough mounds also have found a voice to attest the truth of Moses the man of God. The lonely heaps of Nineveh, dum tacent, clamant, and echo the words of Isaiah and Ezekiel. Pompeii and Herculaneum have been called out of the dust to corroborate Paul's testimony concerning the morals of men. The name of Merba was but a small item in our Scriptures till ten years ago. How many, how few, knew

Milton's Bible.

A Bristol bookseller has a Bible that is assumed to have belonged to John Milton. It is a thick, rough calf quarto volume, being the Royal Version, Cambridge, 1637, and includes the apocrypha. On the margin of the page containing 1 Maccabees xiv. is what appears to be an inscription of 17th century date: "Mr. Hartlibe to Mr. Milton sendeth the 12 booke of the Greeciane volumes, & is obliged to blame. Oct. the 17, 1640." Hartlibe's friendship with the poet is well known, the "Tractate of Education, 1644, being addressed to Master Samuel Hartlibe. On the opposite margin of the same page, and apparently in the poet's handwriting, is the following:

"When that day of Death shall come,
then shall nightly shades prevaile—
soone shall love and musio faile—soone ye fresh turfes tender blade shall florish ore my sleepinge shade.
J. Milt-nius
M. A. C. Coll.

Under these is a pen-and-ink outline portrait in profile, and below is written "Myself, 1640."

On the margin of the opening page of 2 Maccabees is this MS. note, beginning opposite ver. 18: "London—perhaps ye reason why the Persians worshipe fire to this day, 1630;" this inference being drawn from the purification of the Temple, as explained in that verse, being combined with a command to keep the feast of tabernacles "and of the fire."

On the title of the New Testament is "Johne Miltone, B. A. M. 40."

THE RESTITUTION.

E. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, Sept. 5, 1883.

SOME communications that we intended to publish this week must be deferred to another number.

AT our last meeting in Argos, Aug. 25, 26, four persons came forward for baptism. On Sunday afternoon we repaired to the water, when Brother Barnhill immersed these earnest seekers of salvation as commanded by the Redeemer.

THE current y ar is one marked for oft-repeated and dreadful calamities. Another terrible chapter is to be added to the already crowded pages of its saddening history. Since our last issue intelligence has come to hand giving account of one of the most tremendous outbursts of the internal forces pent up in the earth that has ever occurred. Volcanic eruptions, earthquakes and tidal-waves all combined have wrought such destruction in the Island of Java and neighboring islands as renders description almost completely impotent. Towns have been swept away, mountains split in pieces and sunk into the sea, and new volcanic mountains have arisen. It is supposed that fully 75,000 persons have perished. Our limits this week forbid an extended summary of details.

FOR the benefit of many of our subscribers and friends who may desire to visit either Chicago or Fort Wayne this fall on matters of business, or for any other purpose, we give the following notices of very cheap rates over the Pennsylvania Company's Road, at the times designated in the notices. Heretofore very many have availed themselves of the opportunities of visiting these cities at the greatly reduced rates annually afforded by this company, and us many, or more, will gladly avail themselves of one more proffered opportunity. The notices are official. Any interest our brethren may have in fairs is, of course, limited to the agricultural, stock-raising, and mechanical departments.

Cheap excursion tickets will be sold to Fort Wayne by the Pittsburgh, Ft. Wayne and Chicago railway during the continuance of the Northern Indiana Fair, Sept. 10th to 13th; and on Thursday, Sept. 13th, a grand special excursion will be run, for which extremely low rates have been announced. You had better go. The Northern Indiana is one of the best and biggest fairs of the country.

Special excursion tickets to Chicago and return will be sold by the Pennsylvania Company, Tuesday, Sept. 11, good returning until Thursday, Sept. 13, for the benefit of those desiring to visit Chicago and see the Exposition of 1883. For information as to the cheap round trip rates and time of trains, apply to the nearest agent of the P., Ft. W. and C. Ry.

THE GLORIOUS FUTURE AS REVEALED BY GOD'S HOLY PROPHETS.—Concluded.

The next prophecy says: "And they shall plant vineyards and eat the fruit of them." Amos says the same thing. Jer. xxxi. 5, says, "Israel shall yet plant vines upon the mountains of Samaria, and eat them as common things." The Jews planted their vineyards most commonly on the side of a hill or mountain. In these vineyards the keepers and vinedressers labored, digging, planting, propping, and pruning or hurting the vines, gathering the grapes, and making wine. They formed a distinct class among cultivators of the ground. Travelers say it is a rare thing to pass a mountain, even in the wild parts of Judea, which does not show that it was formerly terraced, and made to flow with oil and wine, though it may now be desolate and bare.

Says one traveler, There are many old districts that are sadly encumbered with rock, yet the soil among these rocks is of a very superior kind, and were the rock somewhat broken up, the large places piled, and the small mixed in the soil, it might be made very productive.

There is very striking proof of this in some districts, as that about Hebron, which abounds with rock and yet is covered with the most productive vineyards. As to such a rocky country being so spoken of in the days of the patriarchs, I suppose that it was in truth, at that time the finest of lands; that rock which now lies bare in so many places, was then all covered with earth of the richest kind.

What a garden of delights this must have been, when instead of grass making green the surface, verdant and luxuriant vines were their clothing.—Bible Dictionary.

But today the soil, like the best, is resting under the abomination of desolation, awaiting the time of Zion's appropriate favor, when the prophecy of Ezekiel will be fulfilled, saying:—"But ye, O mountains of Israel! ye shall shoot forth your branches, and yield your fruit to my people of Israel; for they are at hand to come. For behold, I am with you, and I will turn unto you, and ye shall be tilled and sown."

And also the prophecy of Joel, that says, "And it shall come to pass in that day, that the mountains shall drop down new wine."

Isaiah tells us that the sons of the alien shall be Israel's plowmen and vinedressers. Isa. lxi. 5.

Thus it is in exact agreement with the word of God, that Israel will plant vineyards and eat the fruit thereof. And they will do it too, without breaking a temperance pledge. They will have something within them, that will render absolutely unnecessary the fruitless efforts of temperance organizations, which are as powerless to change the carnal heart of man, as his efforts are to Christianize the world. Israel will have within them a new heart, and a new spirit, consequently the stony and carnal heart will be taken away, and they will not commit sin in drinking the pure wine of God's creation. We understand that God caused the earth to bring forth the grapes for the use of man, and that it is right and proper for man to use them, for it is for their health.

"Take a little wine for thy stomach's sake," is a Bible truth, but man who is in possession of a carnal nature will use in excess that which God has created for his health; thus by his gratification of his carnal appetite, he turns that which was calculated to be a blessing to himself, into a curse. But the time is coming when wine shall both be produced and drank in the kingdom of God. New wine shall make the virgin daughter of Israel merry and glad. Well, amen, let it be fulfilled.

The next verse says, "They shall not build and another inhabit; they shall not plant, and another eat." There was a time in Israel's history when the reverse of this was true. If you will turn to Deut. xxviii. 30, you will find that Moses in announcing the curses that should come upon Israel for not keeping the law which God gave them by him, he mentions among them the fact that they should build and another inhabit, and plant vineyards and not gather the grapes thereof. And all this has literally come to pass. But the time is coming when God will give them a heart, so that they can keep his law, and then he is going to have fulfilled this prophecy, which says they shall inhabit the houses they shall build, and eat the fruit of the vineyards they shall plant, for they shall be planted in their own land, and never again be removed out of it; for the Lord says he will rejoice over them to do them good, and will plant them in their own land assuredly with my whole heart, and with my whole soul.

The next verse says: "For as the days of a tree are the days of my people." What does that mean? says one. Why the idea is that Israel will live a great while in mortality, and then forever in immortality. "As the days of a tree," etc.

On this point I will quote from "the unwritten word," by Dr. March. "Far back in the ages of the past a wind-wafted seed fell into the fertile soil of a mountain valley of California. It was among the smallest of seeds. But at that time God was calling Abram to sojourn in the land of Canaan. A hundred years passed on, and Abraham died, and that seed became a tree. Three hundred years more pass, and Abraham's descendants march out of Egypt, and that mighty tree still towers its gigantic height toward the sky. Five hundred years more pass, and Solomon is upon the throne of David; and the history of Greece and Rome is not yet begun, but that tree is still growing. A thousand years more are added to the world's history, and the Rightful Ruler of the world rises from the dead, and that tree still lives. And now eighteen hundred years more come and go, the new world has been discovered, and still that mighty tree, which was alive and no bigger than a blade of grass springing from a decayed seed in Abraham's day, is still lifting its towering columns of green verdure to the skies. It is one hundred feet higher than the highest structure reared by human hands in America. That tree has been the contemporary of Abraham and Moses and David, of Cæsar and Mohammed and Napoleon. It has flourished in perennial beauty while one hundred and twenty generations of men have appeared on the earth and returned again to their original dust. And yet it is green and full of life today.

It all sprang from one small seed that was buried in the ground four thousand years ago. And it may be seen by travellers who pass that way today."

What a fit object, then, are trees to illustrate the longevity of the coming nation of Israel! God's people. God's elect! As the days of a tree shall be the days of my people, saith the Lord, and mine elect shall long enjoy the work of their hands. Israel is God's elect nation, chosen by him to "show forth his praise:" and through them God has blessed the world, and through them he is yet going to bless the world more abundantly in the coming age, when these prophecies shall all be fulfilled.

For if the fall of Israel is the riches of the world, and the diminishing of them the riches of the Gentiles, how much more their fulness; that is, how much more riches shall accrue, when the fulness of Israel is received from the dead, for what shall the receiving of them be but life from the dead.

The next verse reads, "They shall not labor in vain," that is, the result of their labor shall have its desired effect, and they shall long enjoy the fruit of their labors. Neither shall they bring forth for trouble. That is, their offspring or children shall not be brought forth for trouble, as it was in the past in fulfilment of the curses spoken by Moses in Deut. xxviii. 41: "Thou shalt beget sons and daughters, but thou shalt not enjoy them, for they shall go into captivity." But when this Scripture is fulfilled in the kingdom of God their "children which they shall beget and they shall not be few," shall remain forever in the land, and be all taught of God, and great shall be the peace of their children. Isa. liv. For they are the seed of the blessed of the Lord, and their offspring with them. And they shall be to the Lord a name of joy, a praise and an honor before all the nations of the earth, which shall hear all the good which the Lord shall do unto them, and they (nations) shall fear and tremble for all the goodness and for all the prosperity that the Lord will procure unto them. Read all of Jer. xxxiii.

And it shall come to pass, that before they call I will answer, and while they are yet speaking I will hear. This indicates God's readiness to grant whatever they out of their pure heart may desire.

The last verse says, "The wolf and the lamb shall feed together." What a wonderful change must be wrought in the ferocious nature of the animal creation, when this wonderful prophecy is fulfilled! Isaiah speaking of the same glorious theme says, "The wolf shall dwell with the lamb." This shows us that the wolf and lamb shall both feed and dwell together. The wolf is now a flesh devouring animal; a lamb would now be greedily devoured by a ferocious wolf; but in the coming age of Messiah's conquest, the wolf will feed on the verdure of the soil as does the lamb. And the lion also shall eat straw like the bullock. This implies that the herb of the field will become the food of the wild animals. Isaiah tells us the leopard shall lie down with the kid, and the calf and the young lion and the fatling together, and a little child shall lead them. And the cow and the bear shall feed; their young shall lie down together. And the sucking child shall play on the hole of the asp; and the weaned child shall put his hand on the adder's den. What a glorious age that will be when the animal creation will be free from their ferocious natures, and will not hurt nor destroy in all God's holy mountain. Ezekiel says Israel shall no more be a pray to the heathen, neither shall the beasts of the land devour them; for in that day, says Hosea, will the Lord make a covenant for Israel with the beasts of the field, and with the fowls of heaven, and with the creeping things of the ground, and he will break the bow and the sword and the battle out of the earth and will make them to lie down safely, saith the Lord. And dust shall be the serpent's meat, that is, the serpent will not be allowed to eat the flesh of any reptile whatever, for dust shall be his meat saith the Lord. They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain saith the Lord. The holy mountain of the Lord, or mountain of the house of the Lord will be the elevated Jerusalem, the city of the Great King, that will then be established in the tops of the mountains. For all the land from Geba to Rimmon south of Jerusalem shall be turned as a plain and lifted up and inhabited in her place. Zech. xiv. For, says Jeremiah, the city shall be builded upon her own heap and the palace shall remain after the manner thereof.

This will constitute the head quarters of the age to come; the centre of the yet to be Christianized world. Here is where the throne of David is to be re-established; and says Jeremiah, iii. 17, at that time they shall call Jerusalem the throne of the Lord, and all nations shall be gathered into it. Isaiah and Micah say all nations shall flow into it, and from thence shall go forth the word and law of God that all nations shall hear and obey. And the result will be the whole earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the glory of God as the waters cover the sea. Does the knowledge of the glory of God cover the earth today? Is there any prospect of its being filled with the knowledge of God's glory this side of the coming of Christ? Nay, just the opposite is true; for saith the sure word of prophecy, "Behold darkness shall cover the earth and gross darkness the people, but the Lord shall arise as the glory of Israel, and the Gentile nations of the earth and their kings shall come to their light and to the brightness of their rising or in other words all nations shall flow unto the restored Jerusalem (see Isa. lx. 1, 2).

Well, let the word be true, and let it have free course. Thank heaven "the word of God is not bound." Let its blessed light shine which reveals the heavenly truth that the earth on which we dwell is about to emerge from the darkness that for nearly 6000 years has enveloped it, into the light and glory of the coming day whose light shall never dim, when the righteousness and salvation of Zion shall radiate as the brightness of the sun. When the immortal voices of the resurrected saints above the earth shall shout "Alleuia, for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth, and the kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and his Christ; and he shall reign forever and ever."

To the Brethren in Iowa regarding the Conference.

Brethren we see the notice in THE RESTITUTION, the time and place. We trust there will be an interest manifested in trying to come to the meeting, that we may all be mutually benefitted. There is much need of our making an effort, for if we expect to wear the crown we must bear the cross, if it be a cross. We would like to see our brethren and sisters from all parts of the state, and from other states. Most of the brethren at Glad Brook are from Illinois, and will do the best they can to make all comfortable.

Those coming from different parts better get a map of the state. I will give some of the changes. Those coming on the Northwestern will change cars at Tama City: those coming on the Milwaukee will change at Tama City also; those coming on the Iowa Central will change at Gifford. I trust the Board will all be there, and the churches represented as requested in the notice.

Come one, come all, and let us feast on the bread of life. It may be the last time we will meet in Gentile times.

O. H. CROWN, Pres.

JEWETT, N. Y., Aug. 16,

Editor Restitution:

Your postal is received, and three papers. Thank you. My memory is not so good as it was once as to passing items. Please allow a little emphasis as to capitals, etc. I had a blessed free time in the chief church here morning and evening on First Day. For exercise and to relieve others, I volunteered to pick cherries, and fell about fifteen feet from right over a picket fence—turned a somersault, cleared the fence, and came down plump on my head, and that on a stone walk! The abrasion on the very top of my head was frightful, and the bruises reached to my feet. No expert, as such, could have achieved such an exploit, and escaped alive, we think. But the sweet memories that came, after the wounds were deftly dressed (with cold water and witch-hazel), were as a balm of healing power and gracious presence!

In my early Advent experience, while in prayer, in answer to the good spirit's humbling questions to my heart, I gave up my health, my voice, my family comforts and our only child (our Grace), and now I realized, as never before, God's faithfulness, his loving kindness and care—having given them all back with blessing. My whole being seemed as if dissolved, in the presence pervading me, both in the prayer and in its precious revival. "Bless the Lord, O my soul." My hope to live and welcome "the Coming One" was never quite so strong as now. Amen.

Pardon so long a statement, of my personal experience. My private consciousness would keep me out of sight, if I could in that way set forth Jesus, and discharge duty which gratitude constrains me to at least undertake in my humble sphere. This, though not intended when I began writing my answer to yours, may be (as I now see) my most important present duty.

Blessed be God, who is a present help in every time of need. Amen!

Lovingly yours in hope.

J. B. COOK.

Sowing.

Are we sowing seeds of kindness?
They will blossom bright and fair.
Are we sowing seeds of discord?
They will ripen into woe.
Are we sowing seeds of honor?
They will bring forth golden grain.
Are we sowing seed of falsehood?
We shall yet reap bitter pain.
Whatsoe'er we are sowing be,
Reaping, we its fruits must see.

We can never be too careful
What the seed our hands shall sow;
Love from love is sure to ripen,
Hate from hate is sure to grow.
Seeds of good or ill we scatter
Heedlessly along our way,
But a glad or grawsome fruitage
Waits us at the harvest day.
Whatsoe'er we are sowing be,
Reaping, we its fruits must see.

"It Would Hurt Me the Most."

"Would you like to buy some berries?" said a cheerful voice at the back-door.

"How many have you?"

"Two quarts."

"Are you sure there are so many?"

"Yes, ma'am."

The lady hesitated. It really looked to her like quite a small measure.

"I wouldn't cheat, ma'm," said the same clear voice; "it would hurt me the most if I did. But you can measure them."

They were all right, and the lady bought them, the little girl going on her way in the glad possession of her hard-earned money, and in the possession of a truth that it would be well for us all to learn—that when in any way we cheat or rob others, we injure ourselves the most.

Heroism at Home.

How useless our lives seem to us sometimes! How we long for an opportunity to perform some great action! We become tired of the routine of home life and imagine we would be far happier in other scenes. We think of the good we might do if our lot had been cast in different scenes. We forget that the world bestows no titles as noble as father, mother, sister, or brother. In the sacred precincts of home we have many chances of heroism. The daily acts of self-denial for the good of a loved one, the gentle word of soothing for another's trouble, the care for sick, may all seem as nothing; yet who can tell the good they accomplish? One slightest word may have an influence over another for good or evil. We are daily sowing the seed which will bring forth some sort of a harvest. Well will it be for us if the harvest will be one we will be proud to garner. If some one in the dear home circle can look back in after years, and, as he tenderly utters our name, says: "Her words and example prepared me for a life of usefulness; to her I owe my present happiness," we may well say, I have not lived in vain.

A Nocturnal Ascent of Vesuvius.

No one who has not attempted it can have an idea of what Vesuvius climbing is, and to those who have made the experience it is needless to explain. An almost perpendicular stride of from two to three feet brings one to a higher layer of lava, where one tries to steady one's self after the exertion, at the imminent risk of sliding backwards in the gritty, slippery ashes. In the daylight this is difficult enough, but the darkness adds considerably to the task. In the true Italian spirit of "Chi va piano va sano," we climbed and rested alternately, a Vesuvius party always presenting to my mind the idea of flies walking up a wall. After resting at the half-way hut we resumed our climbing, occasionally stopping to listen to the explosion of the mountain, or to marvel at its trembling. At three o'clock a. m. we stood upon the summit; and neither pen nor pencil could adequately portray the scene. The whole place seemed aglow, and the ground under our feet was shaking. At some distance behind the old crater, which is now closed, arose the new one, a cone of considerable height, and out of this seething cauldron was being launched at regular intervals, volumes of ashes, stones, and boiling lava, with a noise like artillery.

The deafening noise, the constant oscillations of the ground under our feet, and the nearness to the infernal power, all conspired to strike terror to the hearts of those whose senses were not dulled by familiarity with the awfulness of the scene, and I confess the feeling of the mind, after the first moment of stupefaction, was a keen realization of the utter helplessness of man in the presence of such an agency as this, and of our own insane hardihood in deliberately placing ourselves where, at any moment, the ground might open under our feet and engulf us in the horrible abyss.

We were, perhaps, ten persons in all—for, during the ascent, we had been overtaken by a smaller party, consisting of two gentlemen, an Englishman and a Frenchman, with their guide—and, I confess, the manner and remarks of each, when observing the same phenomenon, was a curious study. The Englishman's coolness and practical common sense in demanding facts and data, the Frenchman's broken and disjointed exclamations of alternate wonder, admiration, fear, and horror, the German's scientific conjectures as to the how, and when, and wherefore of the threatened eruption, joined to the childlike excitement of those Neapolitan guides who had not before been in the immediate presence of the mountain in agitation, and the quiet, commonplace remarks of those older guides, whose familiarity with the scene was almost unnatural,—these various national characteristics combined to form a whole that interested the mind almost in spite of itself. There was only wanting some wide-awake American, who would surely have speculated as to how such a grand mechanical force could possibly be one day utilized for some commercial purpose.

But there was still some time till dawn, and tired nature reminded us we were not made of iron. So the warm ashes offering a soft and comfortable couch, we wrapped ourselves up and laid down to rest. Profound rest it was indeed to the most of the company, even in that scene; one after another the heavy eyes closed, and the sonorous breathing of not a few told that they were far in the land of dreams. In a few moments I found myself the only living being awake upon the top of Vesuvius, so many thousand feet in the air, alone, in close proximity to one of the most appalling powers of God's creation.

As I lay and mused, scenes and disjointed thoughts passed through my mind like the half-formed and easily-disturbed pictures in a kaleidoscope. A vision arose of those days of horror in A. D. 79, when the lovely and flourishing cities nestling at the base of the mountain were overwhelmed with its ashes and scoria, its inhabitants, in the pursuit of pleasure, justice, gain or science, sealed up for almost eighteen hundred years; of the great philosopher commanding the Roman fleet at Misenum, who, seeing the threatening cloud-cap of Vesuvius, hastened to the devoted spot, half in the desire of rendering assistance to the distressed, half in the hope of increasing his knowledge by fresh meteorological observations, but like so many ill-fated ones of lesser moment, falling a victim to the all-destroying shower.

Suddenly my musings, if they can be dignified by such a name, were interrupted; a great darkness seemed to fall upon us, and the friendly eyes of heaven paled and went out, Vesuvius seeming by contrast to burn more fiercely; a cold wind swept over the mountain, causing us to wrap up more closely and nestle deeper into the ashes. Low down in the eastern sky there was a sort of vibration in the air, a shooting up of a ray of light, and then another, and gradually a steady paleness, deepening into a rosy flush, and then a great red globe seemed to be launched rapidly into space above the horizon. I say "seemed," for it was but the optical illusion of refraction which to the children we illustrate with a coin in a glass of water.

We were now on the eve of the desired moment for which we had toiled and waited—the glorious sunrise from the top of Vesuvius. Slowly the god of day drew aside his morning curtains, as he rose to view, seeming more gigantic than at mid-day.

Long we stood and gazed in profound silence, drinking deeply of the exquisite beauty and sweetness of the scene, and then with a deep-drawn sigh of too intense delight, one closed one's eye to photograph, if possible, forever on memory's tablets, that scene of passing fairness.

But with the dawn of day real life was again upon us, with its, by contrast, too prosy paths and thoughts, and so we had reluctantly to bid adieu to Vesuvius, with its horrors and dangers and fatigues.

BIBLE RESEARCH.

Professor Schrader regards the term Succoth-benoth, occurring in 2 Kings xvii. 30, as pertaining only to a single idol, and that a Babylonian one, similar to the names of the remaining divinities of the passage, Nergal, Ashima, Nibhaz, and Tartak. It was only the Babylonians sent by the king of Assyria to dwell in the cities of Samaria who venerated this divinity. The context forbids considering the term in the light of an appellative, with the signification of "Huts of the Daughters," a circumstance which apparently influenced the Masoretic interpreters to point as benoth rather than the more natural, perhaps, banoth, for popular understanding or use. In like manner the Septuagint and the Vulgate, in very properly presenting the proper name as Sokchoth-Benith and Sochoth-Benoth, reveal a reference to the deity revered by the Babylonians. This agreement can scarcely be mistaken as pointing to the high antiquity of the term and derivation from the Babylonian banit (the native feminine participle of the root bana), often applied in the inscriptions to that divinity who was the consort of Merodach—viz., Zir-banit or Zarpanit. From which it is to be inferred that the Succoth-benoth of the Book of Kings is simply a corruption for the original Zir-banith. The name means "the giver of seed," that is to say, "posterity," and is therefore a name of the goddess of fruitfulness and physical propagation.

Mr. Henry A. Harper calls attention to an expression in the Gospel of Luke which incidentally involves an indication as to the site of Calvary and the Holy Sepulcher—namely, "Simon, a Cyrenean, coming out of the country," Lu. xxiii. 26. Now there are four great roads reaching Jerusalem, to-wit: 1, that from the south, coming from Bethlehem, Hebron, etc.; 2, that from the west, coming from Joppa, 3, that from the east, coming from Jericho; and 4, that from the north, coming from—what would naturally be said? certainly no town of importance, but with most propriety, coming from out of the country, the heart of the land, really from the districts of Samaria and Galilee. This points to a position for the sepulcher on the northern side of Jerusalem, while without the gates "yet nigh to the city," a position in the vicinity of the so-called Jeremiah's Grotto.—The Independent.

Editor Restitution:

Receiving information that a movement is on foot to publish in book form the notes on "The Coming Age," by Prof. J. P. Weethee, which appeared from time to time in your valuable paper, I am reminded to add a word of encouragement in favor of the project.

My acquaintance of over thirty years with Prof. Weethee and his writings makes me unhesitating in recommending the publication of this or any subject from his pen. Having known him these many years to be a devoted student of the Word and his knowledge thereof, I am assured of his ability to master the subject in question, and further assured that this publication will be received with pleasure and read with interest and profit by many. I therefore take great pleasure in recommending an early publication of said work in book form.

Yours Respectfully,

GEO. D. FRY, Sr.

To the Friends of "The Restitution."

The cost of publishing THE RESTITUTION for the year just closed exceeded the receipts over $380. To repay this deficiency and secure means to publish the paper another year, we must raise, outside the regular subscription, at least $600. To secure that amount, the Board of Directors have requested me to appeal to each subscriber to contribute at least one dollar extra. This is not asked as a donation, but brethren are requested to send names of persons to whom they wish the paper sent, with their contributions and the paper will be sent to such persons in payment for the amounts sent by each.

There are a large number of brethren and sisters in different localities who are unable to pay for the paper, and who would be very glad of the privilege of reading it. These are known to Brother Chaplin, the Editor. I would suggest that brethren who have no one to whom they specially desire to send the paper, send their contributions to THE RESTITUTION office with a request that the paper be sent to some worthy Christian who will appreciate it, but who is unable to pay for it. In this way brethren will be able to gladden the hearts of many poor but honest good Christians, and at the same time help to furnish the means to keep the paper going.

The fund will be known as "Free Will Offerings." Let each reader of THE RESTITUTION make a small sacrifice, and contribute at least one dollar, always remembering that the many persons to whom the paper will be thus sent will thank and bless you, and your Heavenly Father will reward you.

"INHERENT NATURE OF CHRIST."

I have observed several papers on the person of our Lord in THE RESTITUTION from time to time. It seems to be generally acknowledged that it is a subject on which no one should presume to be dogmatic, with which I quite agree. In your issue of July 18 is an article on this subject, from "McCulloch's Credibility of the Scriptures," in which the principle I refer to is well stated. He says, "mankind are to regard the Messiah in his official position only, and not according to his inherent nature; for on this subject we have no instruction given in Scripture." He says again: "I fall back, therefore, upon our Savior's own declaration concerning himself, Luke x. 22, 'No man knoweth who the Son is but the Father.'" And yet again, "As respects the office, function, and authority of Jesus as Messiah, the Scripture is perfectly clear."

Some time ago I touched on this subject very slightly in THE RESTITUTION, in an article entitled "Jesus both Lord and Christ," in which I maintained the paramount importance of the Messiahship as compared with the Sonship of our Lord, for similar reasons to those given by the writer of the article above referred to. I suggested belief in the supernatural conception of our Lord, and in his resurrection from the dead, as necessary elements in the Sonship—quoting Luke i. 35, and Rom. i. 3, 4.

In support of the vague and uncertain character of the Sonship, I mentioned the fact that upward of thirty different opinions on this subject, giving rise to nearly as many sects, have existed in the professed Christian Church. With the editor's permission I would take the liberty to transcribe a jotting of these opinions I made some years ago. I feel confident it will demonstrate better than any arguments the futility of any attempt to dogmatize on this subject, in the way of making any view of it the article of a creed, or a first principle in salvation or Christian fellowship. It is well known that the doctrine of the Trinity, as it is called, is the fundamental point in the so-called evangelical creed of Christendom, as also of those of the Roman and Greek Catholic churches. Among the brotherhood in substantial agreement with THE RESTITUTION, the Christadelphians have made denial of the personal pre-existence of Christ an essential element of faith; while others, a very few, however, have gone so far in the other direction, as to make belief in pre-existence necessary to faith. While, as if to emulate the diversities of past centuries, a few others have declared, and maintained in printed documents, that Jehovah of the Old Testament, and Jesus of the New are one and the same person. This latter belief, held as it is along with belief in the reality of the death of Jesus, must surely be at a loss to account for the sustaining the universe during the time between the death and resurrection of its great Lord.

I now give the list of opinions and sects referred to, with the centuries in which they originated:

FIRST CENTURY.

1. Gnostics. Denied that Jesus Christ had come in the flesh—held that he was a purely spiritual or ethereal being, and not son of David, or Messiah.

SECOND CENTURY.

2. Nazarenes. Held that Christ was born of a virgin, and was in a certain manner united to the Divine nature.

3. Ebionites. Held that Christ was born of Joseph and Mary, but was a messenger from heaven, and partook of the Divine nature.

4. Sothites. Greatly honored Seth, and regarded him as the same person with Jesus Christ.

5. Serpentinians. Held that the serpent which deceived our first parents was either Christ or Sophia (wisdom) in the form of that animal.

6. Monarchians. Denied a plurality of persons in the Deity.

7. Patropassians. Held that the Father was so closely united to the man Christ his Son, that he suffered with him in his afflicted and ignominious death.

8. Artemonites. Nearly of the same opinion as the last mentioned, but formed a separate sect.

THIRD CENTURY.

9. Manicheans. Held that God created two beings of eminent dignity—one Christ, the other the Holy Ghost.

10. Nestians. Held that the Supreme God, the Father, absolutely indivisible, united himself to the man Christ, the Son, and was born and crucified with him.

11. Sabellians. Held that a certain energy proceeding from the Supreme Father, or a certain portion of the Divine nature was united to the Son of God, the man Jesus.

12. Beryllus. Held that Christ had no proper subsistence before his birth, or any other Divinity than that of the Father; in other words, that Christ had no existence before Mary, but that a spirit issuing from God the Father, superior to all human souls as being a portion of the Divine mind, was united to him at the time of his birth.

13. Paulians. Held that Christ was born a mere man, but that the reason or wisdom of the Father descended into to him at his baptism.

FOURTH CENTURY.

14. Alexander, Bishop of Alexandria. Held that the Son was not only of the same eminence and dignity, but also of the same essence with the Father. [Arius opposed this doctrine.] This seems to be substantially the doctrine of the creeds.

15. Arians. Held that the Son was essentially and essentially distinct from the Father; that he was the first and noblest of those beings whom God had created out of nothing; that, by his subordinate operation, God the Father created the universe; and therefore Christ was inferior both in nature and dignity.

16. Semi-Arians. Held that the Son was Homoiousios, that is, similar to the Father in his essence, not by nature but by a peculiar privilege.

17. Eunomians. Held that the Son was Heteroiousios, that is, unlike the Father, as well in his essence as in other respects—closely resembling the Arians, though a distinct sect.

18. Apollonarians. Held the Divinity of Christ, but maintained that the body which Christ assumed was endowed with a sensitive but not a rational soul. That the Divine nature performed the function of reason, and supplied the place of the spiritual and intellectual principle in man which we call mind.

19. Marcellus. Considered the Son and Holy Ghost as two emanations of the Divine nature, which having performed their respective offices were to return into the substance of the Father.

20. Photinus. Held that Jesus Christ was born of the Holy Ghost and the Virgin Mary; that a certain Divine emanation or ray, which he called the Logos or Word, descended upon this extraordinary man, and so Jesus was called the Son of God, nay, God himself.

FIFTH CENTURY.

21. Nestorians. Maintained a distinction between the Son of God and the Son of man; between the actions of the one and of the other. They employed terms which favored the notion of Christ being composed of two distinct persons. They denied the title frequently given to the Virgin Mary Theotokos, mother of God, and that she ought with more justice to be called Christotokos, the mother of Christ, as the deity can never be born or die, and consequently the Son of man alone could derive his birth from her.

22. Monophysites. Held that in the Son of God there was one nature, which, notwithstanding its unity, was double and compounded.

SIXTH CENTURY.

23. Aphthartodocetæ. Held that the Divine nature had so insinuated itself into the body of Christ from the very moment of the virgin's conception, that the body of our Lord changed its nature and became incorruptible.

24. Phthartolatræ. Maintained that the body of Christ before his resurrection was truly corruptible. Hence they were also called Corrupticolæ.

25. Agnoetæ. Held that to the Divine nature of Christ all things are known; but not so with the human.

26. Tritheists. Imagined three natures or substances in the Deity absolutely equal in all respects, and united by no common essence.

27. Damianists. Distinguished the Divine essence from the three persons, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. They denied that each person was God in itself abstractly, but affirmed that there was a common divinity, by the joint participation of which each person was God.

SEVENTH CENTURY.

28. Monothelites. Held that in Christ were two distinct natures which were so united without the least mixture or confusion, as to form only one person. That Christ was perfect God and perfect man, and that therefore his soul was endowed with the faculty of volition, and that this faculty of volition co-operated with the Divine will. And that in a certain sense there was in Christ but one will.

EIGHTH CENTURY.

29. Adoptians. Held that Christ in his Divine nature was truly and essentially the Son of God; but considered as a man he was only so (Son of God) nominally and by adoption.

30. Rosceliens. Held it inconceivable and impossible that the Son of God should alone assume the human nature, that is, without the Father and Holy Ghost becoming incarnate, unless by the three persons in the Godhead be meant three distinct objects or natures existing separately, though endowed with one will and acting by one power.

TWELFTH CENTURY.

31. Catharists, No. 1. Maintained that Christ being clothed with a celestial body, then descended into the womb of the virgin, and derived no part of his substance from her.

32. Catharists, No. 2. Held that Christ first assumed a real body in the womb of Mary, though not from her.

SIXTEENTH CENTURY.

33. Socinians No. 1. Held that Christ had no personal existence until born of the Virgin Mary—a man like ourselves, though endowed with a large portion of the Divine wisdom . . and in his resurrection from the dead to indicate the certainty of our resurrection. Allowed the miraculous conception and the worship of Christ.

EIGHTEENTH CENTURY.

34. Socinians. No. 2, or Unitarians. Differ from the last named in denying the miraculous conception and the worship of Christ.

35. Swedenborgians. Held that the Lord was conceived by Jehovah the Father and thus is God by virtue of such conception; also that he rose again with his whole body. Hence the humanity of the Lord is Divine. The Divinity and humanity constitute one person, as in the Athanasian creed.

36. Trinitarians or Athanasians. Held that there are three persons in one undivided Godhead, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, each equally and truly Divine—fully elaborated in the creed of Athanasius, used in the Church of England, and too long to be quoted here.]

I observe Mr. McCulloch alludes to Phil. ii. 5–7, and Col. i. 15–17, as apparently favoring the Trinitarian and Arian views. I would take the liberty to transcribe some memoranda on these texts lying by me for several years.

In Phil. ii. 6–8, it is evident to me that these three verses are run into one sentence instead of two, because it better suited the translators' ideas. But this could not be done without unwarrantedly interfering with the original. The word "and" in the sentence "and was made in the likeness of man," has no corresponding word in the Greek, and therefore that clause has no necessary grammatical connection with what goes before, as the interpolated word gives it. Hence this clause may begin a new sentence and belong to what follows. Again, the word rendered "was made," is a participle, and may be rendered "being made." Thus, without in the meantime suggesting further alteration, the two sentences would read thus: "Who being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God, but made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant. Being made in the likeness of man, and being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself and became obedient unto death." The only voluntary acts here are—1, taking the form of a servant while in the form of God; and 2, humbling himself and becoming obedient while in fashion as a man, or possessed of human propensities continually prompting to disobedience.

The only question here is, When was Jesus in the form of God? Is it absolutely necessary to date this prior to his birth? Was he not in the form of God when, at his baptism, the Spirit descended upon him, and a voice was heard saying, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased"? And was it not especially from this date that he "took upon him the form of a servant" in fulfilling the mission he was charged with to preach the kingdom of God, and to finish the work given him to do?

In Col. i. 15–17, it is remarkable that the enumeration of things created embraces only "thrones, dominions, principalities and powers." When the creation of the physical world is referred to, it is expressed in unequivocal terms—for example, in the fourth commandment, "for in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is." In Col. i., it is singularly different—"by him were all things created that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities or powers." This looks so like what he said to his disciples when he gave them commission to preach the gospel among all nations—"All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth,"—that it suggests the inquiry whether it does not exclusively refer to his present and future position on the thrones of his Father in heaven and his father David respectively. Although the phrase "all things" is used in this passage, I do not see how the detailed definition, limited to thrones, etc., can be extended so as to embrace the physical world, without charging Paul with a most unaccountable omission. The word rendered "created" also means instituted.

"The revised version omits the article, but manages to retain the construction I object to by rendering "were made" by the participle "being made." This construction is faulty inasmuch as it makes "the form of a servant" consist in "being made in the likeness of man" it is, moreover, not a necessary construction, as the one I have suggested is quite admissible.

JERUSALEM, July 16, 1883.

Editor Restitution:

As I see THE RESTITUTION and its readers are and have been misled concerning this people from America styled "colony." This conveys the wrong idea. They do not believe in "colonies," and have claimed nothing of the kind for themselves. They live as one family, inside the walls, say theirs is the house of the Lord, and that he requires them to do no work—simply study the Bible under the instruction of Spofford and his wife: the Lord furnishes them five or six servants so that they may not have any work to do. They claim that they are instructed of the Lord to tarry in Jerusalem till endowed, etc., then they are to go forth to the world.

Now all will see plainly that there is another kind of colony in all this to anything God would be pleased with. This, I hope, will be sufficient, and only refer to this people now—I hope for the last time—to [illegible] right before your readers. They [illegible] imply 'angels of light,' creatures in the hands of Satan, being trained by him for his last great struggle against truth prior to his thousand years of inactivity.

Now this is the kind of a colony we want to see from America: Horny-handed workers who can open up a sugar plantation, and give us sweets from native soil. Then we want one branch of this colony to raise fruits, tomatoes, etc., and run a canning factory, which will give employment to tinners, gardeners, and salesmen in different cities; and another branch to run a dairy and make butter which will sell readily at 40 cents a pound; also make cheese. This and the canning business will give our women a chance to roll up their sleeves and do something. In this colony we will need carpenters, blacksmiths, stonemasons shoemakers, farmers, schoolteachers, plain dressmakers, and many general workers who will be willing to take hold of almost any kind of work. This is only an outline, but this is business, and such a colony as this will not be a reproach to America; neither will there be any trouble about their being sent back at the government's expense; nor will they be found in debt, if properly managed. What this country needs is some of America's vim, enterprise and push, but none of her fanaticisms. We want to see an American furniture store here: nothing is to be had here save what is manufactured out of poor pine. Wood-seat common chairs, and rockers of all kinds would sell rapidly at a big profit; also bureaus. Then our nails, rope, locks, paints, clocks, oilcloths, kerosene oil, matches, lamps, boots and shoes, and many other things I could mention, are a long ways ahead of what we find here. And the earnest desire of the business men here is that a steamship line direct from Joppa to some American port will soon be established, that they may look to America instead of Europe. I think America has been losing a big trade here through muddle-headed government representatives in the past, men who cared only for their salary and self-aggrandizement. I saw three tailors this morning who each want a new sewing machine, the Howe preferred, for they have an old one of that kind, and they would be satisfied with it if there were a hundred others better and cheaper. A dozen machines for shoemakers could be sold now. This of itself would make a good business for a live Yankee. Several of our improved windmills, with grinding attachments, would sell here, and do a good business making bread-stuffs—natives will not use bolted flour. If a colony does come I hope it will bring this kind of an outfit for its own use.

The Jews now returning are principally from Roumania, and many of those have been coming for the past few weeks. The Lord knows what country he will start the next lot from. We can only look on, watch and admire his moves and different dealings with different people. Many of these now coming are stout young men who would be so glad to have a place to work among a colony of honest Americans. This kind of help would suit them better than charity and living in idleness. Who will be the first to organize this kind of a genuine charitable arrangement? Now, to conclude this colony talk, for the present, I want to ask, what would a body of Americans do without a newspaper in their midst?

Referring to what Mrs. D. has said of myself, I want to say that I am a native-born American, likewise my father. We spring from the old Pennsylvania stock (I judge from the name) of Israelites; but we have been inter-married with other peoples till the Jewish features are about extinct. Several generations ago, as our people began to get away from the restraints of Judaism, and to mingle with other people, the desire to lose sight of their nationality caused a change in the spelling of the latter part of the name, from stein to steen. However, the change was only in part, many of our connexion still holding to the original. My father took up the con. because he disowns his nationality. But I trust it will not continue so long. If he—poor old man—could see the bright future for his race that I do, he would not be long getting ready to come to the country that will soon fall into the hands of its rightful owners. Ours, if heirs according to the promise, as I have said before, being the seed of Abraham is not sufficient. Some advocate this, but it is a great error. But few of my father's relatives have made any profession. I thank God I don't spring from a family of hypocrites. They have been blinded, and are honest enough to confess it; my opinion is, to see one's own ignorance is the beginning of wisdom.

I have just received a merited rebuke. It came in the way of a fire-frame piece. This morning I took the purse, when I went to the market for our daily bread, and noticed that it was running low; and just for one moment I harbored thoughts of where the next was to come from. If God had once allowed that purse to run dry, then I might have some reason for uneasiness. But it has been replenished every time before it was needed. How hard Satan does try to get us to look back at Egypt. I want no better proof that I am not just where the Lord wants me, than for this increase of "oil and meal" to be cut off.

How I long for that season of genuine conversions to set in, when I, too, may become truly converted. Then these times of doubt and evil surmisings will be no more; then a new heart will be given me. About a year ago I imagined I had received that new heart; but that was a great delusion, for what I thought was a new heart proved to be no better than the old one.

Now my opinion is that false teachings have made more infidels than anything else. What we want to battle against infidelity is the truth. To tell men who are capable of thinking for themselves, about people of the popular churches having a different kind of heart from their own, is sheer nonsense, for it is easy to see that this is not true. Man's plan is to make it appear like it is nothing to gain the kingdom, and a careless disregard for these things naturally follows. But to teach truth, show the people that there is something instead of clouds and thin air) to be gained by hard, persistent effort. Then the difference will be visible. Sometimes I almost come to the conclusion that it will be necessary to just about exterminate the people from the face of the earth in order to get the world free from man-made creeds and doctrines. Everything is run into shallow formality.

I wish to call attention to the closing words of a splendid article that appeared in THE RESTITUTION of June 13, entitled "Prophetic Notes." If he makes a mistake in the way he quotes Daniel in referring to the Turk, it is a very common one, and one we want to get righted on. I read that text as he does, prior to coming here. Now we take the subject up by starting with the king of the north (Russia) whose his troops (100,000) are now stationed at Erzeroum. His march is here compared to a whirlwind. Americans ought to be able to understand what that means. Everything is overrun that comes in his track. From what I am able to see of the Turkish army, it and the Turkish power will be swallowed up by the Russians. The rank and file of the Sultan's army would gladly put themselves under the leadership of Ras tomorrow. They are "sick" indeed of this hand-to-mouth existence. Gladly would they accept of the proposition to go into Egypt and get a share of the gold and silver brought to view in v. 13. To suppose that when Russia comes into the Turk's country the Turk will gather his forces and march down into Egypt and bring England swooping down upon him, jumping out of the frying pan into the fire, is very poor reasoning, to say the least. But the indefensible part of this view of these kings is, the king of the north puts the Turk to flight, gets possession of the coveted prize, and then goes off and leaves it, for something troubles the Turk, and he gets tired of Egypt, and comes back, here to come to his end, which he certainly would do in Egypt if he should undertake such an exploit as is brought to view here. If it is the Turk who goes down into Egypt, and then returns here, please tell us what becomes of the king of the north. If these events as foretold by Daniel are ever to be recorded in history, they will be summed up about as follows: Russia overpowered the Turk, made an easy conquest of all his territory, enlisted his entire army as Russian subjects, took them to Egypt, and left his own troops to look after Palestine and the other countries taken. And his trip into Egypt was rather more than he contracted for, necessitating the recruiting of his army from the forces left at home. Then some other power takes St. Petersburg and his other strongholds. This news reaches him in Egypt, and he starts back more ferocious than before, gets as far as Jerusalem, receives word that Russia is gone, not recoverable, so he "pitches his tent here" and comes to his end. And what is more fitting than this? Why should not God bring this persecutor of his people into their land and destroy him, at the very time of their deliverance. Indeed, that deliverance will be a double one, and glorious. He followed this people last season after their shameful persecution, even here, and caused the Turk to pass a law forbidding them to enter here. He will follow them to his ignominious end, and may the God of Israel speed the time. Ezekiel xxxviii. and xxxix puts the finishing scenes visibly before the reader's eye.

I had a little conversation last evening with one of the newcomers from Roumania. He has a large family; says it is getting worse and worse for the Jews in that country; many are going to America, for they can only land here through a little strategy or "baksheesh," and this they cannot afford; but this man showed wisdom enough to suggest the idea that God was just as able to bring them here from America when his time comes, as he was to take them there.

Well, these are strange times, indeed. A time for all to find something to do in the furtherance of God's plans. A time when every weight should be laid aside. Time is short for us to "make our calling and election sure" in.

"There is no vacant place in the universe so suggestive as the empty grave of Jesus."—J. H. Pendleton. There is one thing more suggestive to my mind than this. That is, no man in the universe can come any nearer telling where the grave of Jesus is, than that of Moses. P. H. WINTERSTEIN.

Obituary.

DIED—Sunday morning, Aug. 19, 1883, in the thirty-first year of her age, Sister Sarah Purcell, beloved daughter of Jacob and Hannah Lemon, of Vicksburg, Mich.

Sister Sadie, as she was lovingly called, though for many months a great sufferer, bore her pain in patient, Christian fortitude, calmly and quietly talking of the change which she knew so soon awaited her, and anxiously urging all to come to that fountain that in this trying moment of her life yielded her such soothing balm, such rare peace, even the peace that passeth all understanding.

Through the untiring zeal and Christian life of her parents, she was early led to trust in their God, and five years ago was baptized "into the faith" by our much esteemed Brother Chesebrough. A few days before she died she expressed a wish to see the writer, and how great was our joy on visiting her to see such perfect faith and peace manifested in one who was yielding up her young life, leaving husband and child, parents, brothers and sisters, with the assurance that "all is well," "I know I shall have part in the first resurrection," was oft repeated from her lips. She sleeps in peace, waiting for the watchman's signal.

On Tuesday, at the residence of her parents, I spoke from the text chosen by Bro. Lemon, 1 Thess. iv. 13, 14, assisted by Bro. Chesebrough.

Yours in the Hope.

D. W. WOODWARD.

DIED.—At Hoopston, Ill., July 22, '83, Samuel Frankeberger, Sr. D., aged 67 years, 10 mos., and 14 days.

Bro. Frankeberger was a native of Virginia, emigrated to Indiana and was married to Rhoda Jane Smith, who survives him, in 1838. Began practicing medicine in 1845, which he continued for 33 years, till his infirmities compelled him to stop.

Bro. Frankeberger was the father of fourteen children, nine of whom still live. He was a firm and devoted believer in the faith once delivered to the saints. After living and holding a membership with the Christian Church for thirty years, he heard and embraced the hope of life and heirship in the kingdom through the Christ uniting with the Church of God in Warren Co. in 1869. A firm believer and devoted lover of the truth, its principles the controlling power of his life, and its promises his solace through a long and painful illness of eight or nine months, confined most of the time to his bed. He bore it without a murmur. Sweet sleep came to his relief, with the bright hope of awakening beyond the tears, and beyond the pain. His surviving companion and children mourn not as those without hope, but are comforted by the blessed promises given to those who are in Christ.

D. T. HALSTEAD.

As a tree from the forest is lost to our sight,
—Laid low by the ravage of time—
So our father he lies to death's withering blight
Has yielded with patience sublime.

With sickness and death he had battled through years,
And watched by the bed-side of pain;
To cure dire disease, to dry the sad tears,
And bring health to the suffering again.

A Christian in death, as a Christian in life—
He now sleeps 'neath the prairie's deep green,
Till past the grave's silence and the world's bitter strife,
Our father in glory is seen.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

The Annual State Conference is appointed to convene at Argos, Marshall Co., Ind., Friday, Sept. 7, 1883, at 4 p. m., and continue over the following Sunday. A general attendance and a good meeting are anticipated. Let us come together to exhort one another, and so much the more as we see the day approaching.

By Order of the Brethren.

The Lord willing the undersigned will meet and hold a series of joint lectures with John N. Cole, of the Christian Church, to continue four nights or longer, beginning Sept. 11, at the Green Mound schoolhouse, twenty-five miles southwest of Stockton, Kan. I would be much pleased to see Elder Finn or some other able brother there, to deliver additional lectures in the daytime.

JOSIAH M. FINK.

The Annual Assembly of the Church of God will, if the Lord will, convene at the house of the Brethren, in Winchester, Va., on Friday the 7th, before the second Sunday in September, and as it is to be a conference of committees, appointed by various churches in the East, in order to effect a more general union to work in the Lord's vineyard, all of the brethren in Christ, everywhere, who have not been conferred with, as well as all who have, are respectively invited, and all who cannot attend in person, are requested to represent themselves whether individually or collectively, by letter. H. V. Reed, J. W. Wilson, Samuel Wilson, and other able ministers of the Word, are expected to be in attendance. All coming by rail will be met at the Winchester depot, and conducted to the House of the Brethren, where they will be cared for as long as it may suit them to stay.

POSTPONMENT.

The Arkansas State Christian Conference will hold its next annual session with the Palarm church, 6 miles east of Conway Station, on the Little Rock and Ft. Smith Railway, to convene on Thursday night before the third Sunday in September, instead of August, as formerly announced. By order of the Executive Board,

N. B. ETHERIDGE, Sec.

The Lord willing, the Christian association of Iowa will hold a conference meeting at Glad Brook, Tama Co., Iowa, on the Toledo and North Western R. R., commencing Thursday, Sept. 13, 1883, and holding over Sunday or longer if the interest warrants. Churches are requested to send the usual number of delegates, and all preaching brethren throughout the state are requested to be present. By order of the Board.

JOHN FITZ, Sec.

The fourth session of Quarterly Conference of the 2d District of Arkansas, will meet with the Annual State Conference, with the Church of God worshiping at Palarm Church, six miles east of Conway, Faulkner Co., commencing on Thursday night before the third Sunday in September. It is desired that every church be represented in this meeting, and to bring a full report of the year's work done at each church, and the number of members. Those that cannot send delegates will please send a report to the secretary. Brethren, come filled with God's love, and strength to push the great work forward.

JOHN W. TEAS,
Box 58, Morrilton, Conway co., Ark.

There will be a meeting of days two miles southwest of Prescott, Kan., to commence Saturday before the 3d Sunday in September. W. J. Orem and John Foore are expected. All are invited.

By order of the Congregation.

WAITING.

L. C. ROGERS.

"Blessed are they that wait for him."

I am waiting for the coming
Of earth's long-expected Lord,
For the signs are now unfolding
That he gave us in his word:
I am watching, I am waiting,
For that promised glory-day,
Yet I do not cease my working—
I must work as well as pray.

Pray I for the grace of waiting,
For the grace to watch and walk,
That my heart may cease its throbbing,
Cease and strong for any task;
That my eyes may never sparkle
When a shadow passes by,
For the nearest half expecting
Then to hear the midnight cry.

Day and night the mortal knoweth
Off the advent of the Lord;
But the Master plainly showeth
In the teaching of his word;
That that day of days is nearest,
And the shadowy hours of night,
For the signals are appearing
In the earth, and sea, and sky.

I may die before the morning
Of that bright millennial day:
Short and sweet will be the sleeping,
In the twilight shadows gray,
Ere the midnight trumpet sounded,
Bringing through the cemetery's gloom,
And each Christian sleeper waking
From the Sabbath of the tomb.

I am waiting, I am praying,
For the promised glory-day,
And I read each promise saying
Christ is on his earthward way:
I can wait until the Sunrise
Flings my heart for any fear:
Come at noon, at eve, or morning,
I will meet him at the door.

Communications.

In my wanderings, seeking the hid treasure, I found a forgotten sheaf, also some rich olives, and a few luxuriant, ripe clusters of grapes from Israel's vineyard, which will be to you savory food—that which your soul loveth. The divine command to Israel was: "When thou cuttest down thine harvest in thy field, and hast forgotten a sheaf in the field, thou shalt not go again to fetch it: it shall be for the stranger, the fatherless and the widow, that the Lord thy God may bless thee in all the work of thy hands." Deut. xxiv. 19-21.

How strange this simple provision for the stranger under the law should so forcibly point to God's loving care for them in the gospel plan! Israel's unthought-of sheaf was according to God's purpose, designed for such as Cornelius, the first to receive the gospel from among the Gentiles, who was a just man, and one that feared God Acts x. 22. It was not enough for the hungry stranger to glean the corners of the field (Lev. xix. 9-10): a more abundant supply was Jehovah's reserve for them. The forgotten sheaf contained many ears bound together in one, not in an unripe state or condition but bending with golden fulness like a sheaf of wheat which ascendeth (margin) or cometh in its season (Job v. 26), cut down by Israelitish hands, but found by the stranger as the first fruits or ripe sheaf to be waved before the Lord when the sweet Sabbath began. Lev. xxiii. 16; Deut. xvi. 9. This sheaf left alone matured by Israel, therefore their portion if gathered; but should they fail to harvest it, then it became Jehovah's free gift to the stranger, (Rom. v. 15, 16). Israel was not to assist him in obtaining it, but he was to go over the same ground Israel had reaped, and when he found it, it was his lawful right to bear it away. Thus we see salvation is of the Jews, but through their fall salvation is come to the Gentiles. Rom. xi. Surely "the Lord preserveth the stranger," (Psa. cxlvi. 9), yea, loveth them in giving them food and raiment, and commandeth Israel to do the same. (Deut. x. 18, 19).

And when Jehovah entered into covenant relationship with Israel, he permitted the stranger to hear the words of life, in which there was a whisper of assurance to him also, saying, "Neither with you only do I make this covenant and this oath, but with him that standeth here this day before the Lord our God, and also with him that is not here with us this day. Read Deut. xxix. 14-15; Acts ii. 37. Have we not in this a figure of the true, a pattern of the heavenly things, beginning with Moses and ending with the body or substance, which is Christ? When Israel again enters the land of which it is written, It is mine, saith the Lord; thou shalt say in thine heart, Who hath begotten me these? seeing I have lost my children, and am desolate, a captive, and removing to and fro; and who hath brought up these? Behold I was left alone, these, where had they been? Thus saith the Lord God: Behold I will lift up mine hand to the Gentiles. Isa. xlix. 4-22. Let us not leave one grain of this incorruptible wheat unglean'd; it is our portion, even the fine flour, or the bread made new every Sabbath, called the shew-bread, or bread of faces, or doctrinal bread of intelligence, the antitypes—the wine was made of the fruit of the vine—the living bread which came down from heaven, which if a man eat he shall live forever. John vi. 51. Only the priest and his family could partake of the shew-bread.

We must always remember the forgotten sheaf cannot be obtained unless we go back and gather from the same field in which it was preserved by Jehovah for the stranger, then shall it be said of us as of the poor leper. "There are not found that returned to give glory to God, save this stranger." Luke xvii. 18. Paul testifies, such were we as Gentile strangers from the covenants of promise. Eph. ii. 12.

Shall Ruth gather this "sheaf of purpose" dropped for her by the reapers' kind hands, even Moses and the prophets, and not give a few golden grains to the household? Ruth ii. 15, 16.

"When thou beatest thine olive tree thou shalt not go over the boughs again; it shall be for the stranger, the fatherless and the widow." You will perceive the stranger is mentioned first, and who was permitted to gather from Israel's rich olive tree that which remained. Under the law the oil olive was for light. "And thou shalt command the children of Israel that they bring thee pure olive oil, beaten for light, to cause the lamp to ascend (margin) up always." Ex. xxvii. 20. Also a bin was used for holy anointing: anointing oil. Ex. xxx. 25. And the elders brought this as a willing offering (Ex. xxx. 23) of the root and fatness of this good olive tree—of which olive tree the poor, blind, Gentile stranger is permitted to glean; and as they feel in what they have gathered, they should not be ashamed. "Thou bearest not the root, but the root thee." Rom. xi. 18.

Israel's good olive tree was not beaten until fully ripe; and this by divine command could only be done once, therefore was not entirely stripped of its rich fruit, which produced light, and because some fruit remained—"His branches shall spread and his beauty shall be as the olive tree, and his smell as Lebanon." Hos. xiv. 6. What a wonderful scheme! Not only bread for nourishment but golden light was preserved for the seeking stranger—"To open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light." Acts xxvi. 18. To gather was not the only work. They must also beat the rich olives, or the light will not ascend up always. They must rightly divide—or impress the fruit with constant study. Thus, like Noah's dove, they will bear the olive branch in their mouth, gathering it, not from the old world but from the new—a branch from a green olive tree, fair and of goodly fruit. Jer. xi. 16. "A green olive tree in the house of God." Ps. lii. 8.

These beautiful spreading olive branches, full of golden oil, called in the margin "sons of oil," having golden pipes through which they empty the oil out of themselves. "These two branches are the two anointed ones that stand by the Lord of the whole earth." Zech. iv. 12. In Solomon's temple we read of olive doors or doors of light, called everlasting doors. Psa. xxiv. 7. The two cherubim within the oracle were also of the olive, representing the two anointed ones standing before the God of the whole earth. Rev. xi. 4.

Shall we not keep in Israel's beaten path, lest we fail in our search for the "light which was to lighten the Gentiles"?

"When thou gatherest the grapes in thy vineyard, thou shalt not glean it after thee: it shall be for the stranger, the fatherless and the widow: that the Lord thy God may bless thee in all the work of thine hands." Not only was bread given to strengthen man's heart, and oil so that his face may shine more than oil (margin), but wine also that maketh glad the heart of man. Psa. civ. 15. A free gift—if only the stranger "without strength" will enter Israel's vineyard and gather the rich clusters which "run over the wall"—even the "middle wall of partition." No bunch so fruitful and beautiful as that borne on the shoulders of Joshua, or "deliverer," and Caleb, the first fruits from the promised land, Num. xiii. 23, 24, in which was embodied the good report. Heb. xi.

The pure blood of the grape was Israel's food under the law (Deut. xxxii. 14), and it is written that Jesus did not manifest his glory until he brought forth at the marriage feast the good wine. Jer. ii. 1-14. This wine of the kingdom, called by Jesus the new wine, must not be put into old bottles, but renewed minds; then both will be preserved. Matt ix. 17. Isaiah said: Now will I sing to my well beloved a song of my beloved touching his vineyard. My well beloved hath a vineyard in a very fruitful hill (the horn of the son of oil—margin). Isa. v. 1. "This is the vineyard of red wine which the Lord doth keep and water every moment lest any hurt it. I will keep it night and day." Isa. xxvii. 2, 3. Of the fruit of this precious vine Jesus declared he would drink new with his chosen ones in the kingdom of his Father. Matt. xxvi. 29. When he cometh forth to serve girded with incorruptibility and immortality, then corn shall make the young men cheerful, and new wine the maids. Zec. ix. 17. No wonder the bride testified, "the roof of his mouth is like the best wine, when she beheld him going down sweetly, causing the lips of those (margin) who are asleep to speak." Sol. Song vii. 8, 9: giving them beauty for ashes. "The husbandman brought a vine out of Egypt. He called it a noble vine, wholly a right seed." Jer. ii. 4. He caused it to take deep root, and it filled the land, the hills were covered with the shadow of it, and the boughs like the cedars of God. (margin). Psa. lxxx. But the Pagan boar did waste it, and the wild beast of the field did devour it, so that it became a degenerate plant of a strange vine: therefore it was let out to husbandmen for the fruit thereof was to bring a thousand pieces of silver (see Song viii. 11), or the fruits of righteousness; it was something they could buy, but never sell.

We have a type of this vineyard owned by Naboth (or one unit of prophecy), and fruits, which wicked Jezebel (or woe to the dunghill) robbed him of and turned it into a garden of herbs. It was beautiful for situation, being near Jezreel—which signifies the seal of God, or the brightness of the Lord. She not only took away his vineyard, but by her false testimony she destroyed one "full of fruits, blasphemed God and the king;" therefore they killed the last one without the city. Time is not marked; what she sowed, that also she reaped. 1 Kings xxi. 1.

Can we not exclaim with Paul, Oh, the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out! Blessed be God who hath declared, I will not be unto the residue of this people as in the former days saith the Lord of hosts; for the seed shall be prosperous; the vine shall give her fruit, and the ground shall give her increase, and the heavens shall give their dew, and I will cause the remnant of this people to possess all things. Zec. viii. 11, 12. And the sons of aliens shall be Israel's vine-dressers. Isa. lxi. 5. If we abide in the true vine—the vine which giveth a good smell—we shall bring forth fruit, and glorify our Father which is in heaven.

ISRAEL'S CASTING AWAY AND RECEIVING.

The subject for our consideration this evening is "The Casting Away and the Receiving of Israel," as stated by St. Paul, Rom. xi. 15. It is impossible to exaggerate the importance of an earnest, prayerful study of Israel's history, past, present and future, as recorded in the Word of God with extreme liberality of detail. Israel is the key wherewith to unlock the storehouse of prophetic truth. Israel is the door of entrance to many of God's revealed purposes concerning the human race in ages yet to come. Thus a knowledge of the divine dealings with Israel throws a flood of light upon many of the "deep things of God," and helps to assure us that, having accomplished so much in the past, the Lord will not fail eventually to fulfill all the glorious predictions of the future. The history of Israel in the past is grand and interesting, the condition of Israel in the present is mournful and sad, but the history of Israel in the future is brilliant beyond description. The gorgeous language of Eastern metaphor is well-nigh exhausted in setting forth the blessedness and glory of the period when Israel shall be first of the nations upon earth, and when "the Lord of hosts shall reign in Mount Zion and in Jerusalem gloriously."

Thus Israel is the true key to prophecy, and the divine dealings with Israel are an important clue to the right understanding of the purposes of God as regards the world at large. The Bible is mainly a record of Israel's history. Gentile nations are brought into prominence only as they help to elucidate Israel's position and career. The history of the church is to a large extent parenthetical. But Israel falls into the background, and the Church of God comes into prominence, and continues in the same, even to the present day. Nevertheless the time is at hand when Israel and the Church—that is, Jew and Gentile—shall be manifestly one in Christ, and the Jerusalem of earth shall be in happy accord with the Jerusalem of the heavenlies. Yet this is only preparatory to the period when all distinctions of race and nationality shall be abolished, when the kingdom shall be delivered up to God, even the Father, and God himself, shall be all in all.

Man, though created in the image and after the likeness of God, proved to be a failure as regards obedience and homage to Jehovah. Adam failed in Eden; he yielded to temptation and fell. The antediluvian race failed, and the Lord scattered them abroad. Then God called Abram to make of him a great nation, to bless him and make him a blessing, and to give to him, and to his seed after him, all the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession. Israel, Abraham's seed and posterity, failed, filling up the measure of their iniquity by rejecting the Messiah and crucifying the word of life and glory. Nevertheless the Church of God was established on the foundation laid in Christ Jesus, and although the Church has grown and extended, indeed by the divine habitation of God in the Spirit, yet having regard to her high vocation, exalted position, and consequent responsibilities, the Church has failed to recognize and fulfill the claims of him who bought her with his own blood.

Thus regarded from the human standpoint, all is failure. Man has failed, the Church has failed. But have God's purposes failed? Assuredly not. Has truth failed? Have the promises failed? Will the same word of prophecy fail? Will the hopes and aspirations of the faithful followers of the Lord be frustrated? Will man be left to sin perpetually in distant disobedience to God? Will Israel be cast off forever in wicked rejection of her true Messiah? Will the Church always be poor, feeble, disunited body she now is? Most assuredly not. (Rom. vi.) God forbid! Man, redeemed, resurrected, and glorified, will yet come up to the ideal of the divine and perfect standard. Israel, restored, converted, saved, will yet accomplish all the divine purposes and plans. The Church, one with her risen Lord, will yet fulfill her high and exalted destiny and, in loving obedience to her great Head, will continue ceaselessly to make known the manifold wisdom of God according to the eternal purpose which he purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord.

Thus much for glowing introduction to the solemn deliberate and spirit-stirring statement of the apostle Paul: "For if the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be, but life from the dead?" It will be useful to look a little at the context, and to connect this fifteenth verse with portions of the verses 1, 2, 11, 15, 25, and 26, of this eleventh chapter of the Epistle to the Romans. "I say, then, hath God cast away his people? God forbid. God hath not cast away his people which he foreknew. I say then, have they stumbled that they should fall? God forbid; but rather through their fall, salvation is come unto the Gentiles, for to provoke them to jealousy. Now if the fall of them be the riches of the world, and the diminishing of them the riches of the Gentiles, how much more their fulness? For if the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be, but life from the dead? Blindness in part is happened to Israel until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in. And so all Israel shall be saved, as it is written, There shall come out of Sion the Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob."

Now, linking these passages of Scripture with all the previous Divine declarations concerning Israel, begins with the three-fold promise to Abraham elaborated through the ages, the Hebrew nation rising to its height in the early days of Solomon, and then, at first gradually, but afterwards rapidly, declining, until its dispersion and utter breaking up of the nation and policy, we shall assuredly see that the Divine plan has been steadily pursued throughout. God has not been foiled: Satan has not really triumphed; the purposes of Jehovah have not been frustrated. For observe, when Adam failed in Eden, the promise of deliverance came, as recorded in Gen. iii. 15; when the antediluvian generation failed, Noah and his family were taken into the ark, when the sons of Jacob failed, then God sent Joseph before them to preserve life; when Pharaoh thought to kill all the male children of the house of Israel, then the babe Moses was preserved alive; when the Hebrew monarch Saul failed, then was David anointed to be king over Israel; when Nebuchadnezzar burnt the house of God, broke down the wall of Jerusalem, slew young and old, and carried away the remnant to Babylon for a seventy years' captivity, at the end of that period the Lord stirred up the spirit of Cyrus to make a proclamation for the captives to return to Jerusalem to rebuild the temple.

And when the last and final overthrow came, and the Roman nation, with its martial prowess, burnt, destroyed, and utterly uprooted and dispersed the nation, then came the time and opportunity for God to extend the riches of his grace to the Gentiles. The Word was made flesh, the Lord Jesus poured out his soul unto death, and the door of mercy and reconciliation was opened wide. Israel is rejected, but not cast away; Israel is fallen, diminished, it is true, but there is to be fulness hereafter. The branches are broken off because of unbelief, but they shall be grafted in again, for God is able to do so. Jerusalem is trodden down of the Gentiles until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled. Blindness (or hardness) in part is happened unto Israel until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in. But all Israel shall be saved; there shall come out of Zion the Deliverer, and saved Israel shall be the heralds of salvation to the world at large; they shall declare God's glory among the Gentiles, and the healing of the nations shall be as life from the dead. "O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out!"

The receiving of Israel to the Divine favor and love, with all what it involves—national restoration, conversion, salvation—is as clearly revealed in the Word of God as the scattering and dispersion. This may be more difficult to realize, because the scattering of the nation is before our very eyes; but God's Word is true, his promises sure, he will not fail, "for he is faithful that promised," "who also will do it." The dealings of Jehovah with Israel, under the similitude of the marriage relationship, as enumerated by the prophets, forcibly and beautifully set forth the Divine purposes in the future. Jehovah proclaimed himself as a husband to the house of Israel and the house of Judah; but the wife was unfaithful, she went after other lovers, she was divorced from her Divine husband, and, instead of repenting, she played the harlot, and a degenerate progeny was the result. But the love of Jehovah is unchanged, and the time comes when Israel repents, returns with weeping and supplication, and once more becomes manifestly the beloved of the Lord, the faithful wife.

Restoration is not conversion. It is important to distinguish between the restoration and the conversion of the Jews. The restoration takes place in unbelief, the Messiah being still rejected and unacknowledged. The conversion is a true turning to the Lord, looking to him whom they have pierced. It may be regarded in the two-fold aspect of individual conversion, the "remnant according to the election of grace," and national conversion, when "Israel shall be saved in the Lord with an everlasting salvation." It is to this latter the apostle refers in Rom. xi. 15, the passage under consideration. The promises and predictions in God's Word concerning the restoration and conversion of Israel are most distinct and emphatic: Jer. xxxi. 10; xxx. 3; Ezek. xxxix. 28; Amos ix. 15; Hos. iii. 5; Jer. l. 4, 5; Zech. xii. 10; xiii. 9; Rom. xi. 26, 27; Rev. i. 7.

Now the result of this wondrous restoration and return on the part of Israel to her lawful King, Lawgiver, Husband, and her acknowledgment of him who is the true Messiah, even the Lord Jesus Christ, is glorious in the extreme. The effects thereof will be so deep and widespread, the blessings to the nations of the earth so vast, the moral influence upon the waste places so genial and beneficial, such rejoicing in the wilderness and solitary places, such an opening of the eyes of the blind, an unstopping of the ears of the deaf, a leaping of the lame, a singing of the dumb—as full shall the earth be of the knowledge of the Lord when the Light of Israel is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon her, Gentiles and kings coming to the brightness thereof—that the apostle, female though he be in descriptive power, finding no language adequately to describe in prosaic words all the fulness of blessing, breaks forth into a metaphor as bold as it is beautiful and expressive—"life from the dead." It is, indeed, a moral resurrection, a counterpart of Ezekiel's vision, "In the midst of the valley which was full of bones; and lo, they were very dry." But when he prophesied as commanded, the breath came into the slain, and they lived, and stood up upon their feet, an exceeding great army.

Oh, the blessedness of the millennial reign and kingdom, when antichrist and all his followers are utterly destroyed, and Satan is bound for the thousand years, deceiving the nations no more; when out of Zion goeth forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem, when the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills, and all nations shall flow unto it! Oh, the happy, glorious millennial period, when the grand temple for Jehovah's worship, as delineated by Ezekiel, shall be erected on Zion's highest hill-top, when the holy city, the new Jerusalem, shall have come down from God out of heaven, with the glory of God to lighten it, and the Lamb the light thereof; when the nations of them which are saved shall walk in the light of it, the typical meaning of Jacob's ladder of intercommunication being fully understood, and heaven and earth in happy, loving accord!—Dr. Anderson, in Israel's Watchman.

SCIENTIFIC ACCURACY OF THE BIBLE.

Dr. Samuel Kinns, the author of "Moses and Geology," has for some little time past been giving a series of lectures in the drawing rooms of the aristocracy of England on "The Marvellous Scientific Accuracy of the Bible." The last took place at the Earl of Shaftsbury's, and was attended by a large and select company. Dr. Kinns in carrying his audiences through a course of reasoning described the various geological strata and the story told by the fossil plants and animals of the earth's condition during the various epochs of its history. He especially interested them, however, in his description of fifteen creative events which he showed were placed by Moses in the correct order of sequence according to the latest discoveries in science. These events, which are very concisely stated in "Moses and Geology," were summarily described in the review of "Moses and Geology," which appeared in the Record of March 22, 1882. Dr. Kinns then proved that the number of changes that can be made in the order of fifteen things is more than a billion—viz., 1,307,674,368,000—and, therefore, if Moses placed fifteen important creative events in their proper order without the possibility of traditional help, as most of them happened millions of years before man was created, it is a very strong proof of his inspiration, for group them as one way, and take off a further percentage for any scientific knowledge possessed by him, still the chances must be reckoned by hundreds of millions against his giving the order correctly without a special revelation from God. To lead his auditors to appreciate this, Dr. Kinns mentioned that a clock beating seconds would take over 30,000 years to tick a billion times; and that if any fifteen different events could be written down in ten minutes, it would take twenty-four millions of years to write all the variations that could be made in their order, writing them day and night without intermission, and to further illustrate it, he distributed slips of paper for each to write down the first fifteen letters of the alphabet in an order known only to himself, something in this order:

g m h d a j b k o f e n i o l and not one correspondent with his. He told them that if all the people in the world were to try to imitate his unknown order, there would be still a thousand chances to one that the whole twelve hundred million chances would be incorrect.

Or, in other words, if all the people in a thousand worlds, each having a population equal to our own, were to try, there would still be a probability that not one list would agree in sequence with the unknown list. After this he asked, How will the sceptic explain the marvellous, nay miraculous, accuracy in sequence of the Mosaic cosmogony?—London Record.

BRITISH PHASE OF THE EASTERN QUESTION.---No. 39.

Prelude—British Empire—Her Eastern Policy Further Examined—Will She Allow the Ottoman Empire to Fall?—The Divine Purpose in Extending the British Empire Eastward—To Furnish a Home for Returning Judah—To Aid them to Return—To Protect Them in Their Infant Nationality.

Prelude—Eastern policy of the British empire further examined. Any one familiar with the movements of the British empire eastward during the present century, will readily see that the fall of the Turkish empire, at this time, would be a great calamity to England. The Ottoman empire, as a nationality, is the British shield—her rampart—her Chinese wall extending from the Danube to the Euphrates; keeping back the Northern empire. When the Turkish empire falls, it will be absorbed by the victors. The conqueror will be Russia or England. In either case it would, at present, be a great calamity to England; for the fall of the Ottoman empire must bring on a general war. Such a consequence would be unavoidable. Should England now be forced into a conflict with Turkey, all Europe would declare war against her at once. Such a contest she is not, at present, prepared to sustain. Russia cannot attack the Ottoman empire, without a terrible conflict with England. In either case such an event would now be premature—a terrible calamity to the returning Jews. Had England been driven out of Egypt, Jewish colonization of Palestine would have been ruined.

The British empire must, therefore, sustain the Ottoman empire till she is ready for an open movement against the king of the north. This event is hastening but it is not yet.

We affirm, therefore, that the fall of the Turkish empire at the present, would be a serious calamity to the Jews, as well as to their protector, the British empire. Whatever England can do to gain power in the Turkish empire, and control over it, without provoking a general war, we shall expect her to accomplish. Her interest in the Orient requires it; but to absorb that empire, or to allow any other nation to overthrow and remove the Ottoman empire, would be a radical error, one that would retard if not defeat her Eastern mission. What would be the result if Russia's southern boundary took in the Turkish empire? Palestine, in her hands, and she the ancient, as well as modern enemy of the Jews? We cannot regard such an event, at this time, in any other light than that of an utter subversion of all hope of a near-coming Jewish nationality. We do not hesitate to affirm (what may appear strange to many) that Dan xii. 1, is now in its first period of accomplishment. That we are living at the "time of the end," there can be no doubt. The running to and fro, and the increase of knowledge, fully sustain that position. Michael is now standing up, and he is evidently at this very time the invisible guide of the British empire on her Eastern mission. If Gabriel and Michael were actors in the affairs of Persia and Grecia, (see Dan. x. 13-21), why not more active in that nation which is the chosen national protector of Daniel's people, the Jews? Such is our deliberate conclusion.

God controls nationalities through angelic agency. Though the visible powers appear to act freely, and are thus described in profane history, the Bible teaches that they are under the supervision of a higher power. It required seven years for Nebuchadnezzar to learn that Jehovah rules in the armies of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth. God called Cyrus by name, and stated to Isaiah his mission two centuries before he was born; and yet profane history gives us the birth, education, and military exploits of Cyrus as one acting out freely his own personal character. He was raised up to do a special work for God's people, and the Almighty calls him his shepherd--"That saith of Cyrus, (He is) my shepherd, and shall perform all my pleasure: even saying to Jerusalem, Thou shalt be built; and to the temple, Thy foundation shall be laid." Isaiah xliv. 28. (See Isaiah xlv. 1-5.) Cyrus appears to do it all, and yet God says, "I will go before thee, and make the crooked places straight, I will break in pieces the gates of brass, and cut in sunder the bars of iron. I will give thee the treasures of darkness, and hidden riches of secret places, that thou mayest know that I the Lord which call (thee) by thy name (am) the God of Israel. For Jacob my servant's sake, and Israel mine elect, I have even called thee by thy name; I have surnamed thee though thou hast not known me." God's supreme control is very distinctly enunciated in vs. 1: "Thus saith the Lord to his anointed, to Cyrus, whose right hand I have holden, to subdue nations before him; and I will loose the loins of kings, to open before him the two-leaved gates; and the gates shall not be shut." Jehovah accomplishes his purposes by an invisible agency belonging to the angelic or messenger world.

To this end read 2 Kings vi. 17: "And Elisha prayed and said, Lord, I pray thee, open his eyes that he may see. And the Lord opened the eyes of the young man; and he saw; and behold, the mountain (was) full of horses and chariots of fire round about Elisha." Here is Elisha's angelic bodyguard. When Elijah went up, "a chariot of fire and horses of fire (light—W.) and parted them both asunder; and Elijah went up by a whirlwind into heaven." 2 Kings ii. 11. One chariot was sufficient for Elijah. Kings, for show, must have a multitude. "The angel of the Lord encampeth round about them that fear him, and delivereth them." Psa. xxxiv. 7. "The chariots of God (are) twenty thousand, (even) thousands of angels; the Lord is among them, (as) in Sinai, in the holy place." Psa. lxviii. 17.

See the horsemen in Zech. i. 8, 9. Also the chariots and horses in Zech. i. 8, 9. Also in various other places. When any interpretation is to be given Gabriel is sent; if any conflict, Michael is selected. When Michael is sent forth, his angels are sent with him. Under Pagan Rome there was a terrible conflict that continued through centuries. "Michael and his angels fought against the dragon; and the dragon fought and his angels." Rev. xii. 7.

The most distinct enunciation of God's government of the nations by angelic agency is found in Dan. x. 13-20, "But the prince of the kingdom of Persia withstood me one and twenty days; but lo, Michael, one of the chief princes, came to help me, and I remained there with the king of Persia." ....'Then said he, Knowest thou wherefore I am come unto thee? and now will I return to fight with the prince of Persia; and when I am gone forth, lo, the prince of Grecia shall come." Such testimony abounds in all parts of the Divine revelations. And, as the Bible teaches that God interfered with the national governments of Babylon, Persia, Grecia and Rome, Pagan, may we not conclude that he will manage the nations till his Son commences his reign? The prophets, by the power of Jehovah, have described the future. No being can tell the future except the one that has dominion over it. All those Gentile monarchies that have had to do with the Hebrew commonwealth have been under the special supervision of Jehovah. The metallic image symbolizes those Gentile monarchies. The stone becoming a mountain and filling the earth, represents the results of the direct agency of the Almighty.

The conclusion we thus state: If God controlled the great monarchies that held Judah and Israel, so as to accomplish his purpose in their captivities, shall he not equally control the modern nations relative to their return and final union? Such a result he has directed his prophets to enunciate, and such it will be. What nation but Great Britain, is in a position, and is competent to that great work? She controls the seas; has her family of nations conveniently located for the work, and has the will for its accomplishment.

Secular history, in sketching the rise and progress of the world's great nationalities, deifies human agency; the Bible, however, reveals a governing power behind their thrones. That power is supreme. The difference between sacred and profane history is, that the latter traces the visible agents, while the former follows the footsteps of the great Invisible. The secular historian narrates facts as seen and heard; the sacred historian confines his history to the sayings and doings of the Supreme. Modern history carries forward the narration of those national movements found recorded by the inspired prophets. We see in these sacred records, among others, a sketch of the British empire, its rise, growth and mission. In that history we recognize a people answering to God's enunciation of the destiny of the sons of Joseph, more particularly Ephraim. We have followed that empire in its movements towards the Orient, as it gradually planted its colonies over the East, absorbing Eastern nationalities, and holding the control of 8,000,000 square miles.

We are forced to enquire, What has God to do with and for the British nation? Why is he pushing that mighty empire Eastward, on the belt of the ancient empires? those empires that overthrew Judah and Israel? Why has that power become the protector of the Mohammedan empire? Why has Egypt been thrown into her arms for protection? Why have the Eastern highways been placed under her control? All these problems, with many others, demand a rational solution. These we now propose to investigate. What mission or work has Jehovah for the British empire in the East? The time has come for a remnant of Judah and Israel to return and form one nation upon the mountains of Israel. No other nation but England is able, prepared, and willing to accomplish that work.

Come, and let us reason together, upon this vital and most interesting topic. But few persons will dispute the future of Dan. xii. in its final results. The standing up of Michael, the great national troubles; the resurrection of a people; the return of Israel and Judah, and Daniel's standing in his lot. The eleventh chapter of Daniel in the Old Testament is like the 24th of Matthew and the 21st of Luke in the New Testament. It contains the plain, literal history of events connected with God's people and Daniel's people, from the days of Cyrus, or Darius, to the resurrection and union of Israel and Judah after the standing up of Michael.

That period is called "Time of the end." The time of the end belongs to the "latter days" (Dan. xi. 14) of Daniel's people. This great vision prophecy was sealed to the time of the end. That seal was to be broken by the increase of knowledge; that knowledge was to be the result of missionary efforts, and by lectures on all subjects, prophetic more especially. Events have brought about that wonderful period; the day of the Lord's preparation. This is our undisputed location in the world's history. It marks the end of papal rule (civil) and brings to light that infidel agency (the French empire under the great Napoleon) selected by the "Ancient of days" (Dan. vii. 9,) to commence its execution. If that work belongs to the time of the end. Then, truly that time has come. Where now is the pope's civil power? Ended.

Read the following: "To Citizen Joachim Pecci, by trade or profession a pope, conducting business at the Vatican Palace, Rome." He paid his taxes and took a receipt like any other private citizen. Compare the temporal authorities of the present popo with those of the 12th and 13th centuries.

GEOMETRY AND THE ARABIC NUMERALS--THEIR AGE AND ORIGIN.

In a previous article I traced the probable origin of the Arabic numerals in their relation to geometry. I now purpose to still further trace the origin of the system of Arabic notation by series.

I have endeavored to show in previous articles that there being but nine integers any one series must be full with the use of the nine. The principle involved here might be illustrated still further by reference to the well-known mathematical rule of "casting out the nines." But I forbear for want of space. I have also shown that the so-called number ten and every multiple of it in its symbolic significance is merely indicative of a conjunction—a conjunction, namely, of an already completed series with a new series begun. In the symbolic characteristic expressions 10, 20, 30, 40, 50, etc., therefore the 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, etc., merely numerate the series of nines employed, and indicate the number and order of the conjunctions formed.

In my last article on this topic I endeavored to show as clearly as I could without diagrams (not an easy task) how the nine Arabic digits were merely the symbolic characteristic expressions originally designed to represent geometric ideas beginning with the simplest cosmic concept of a straight line, each new figure or numeral symbolically representing the number of cosmic lines used to form its appropriate individual cosmic figure. Beginning with the straight line, whose Arabic symbol is 1, by a natural formative process developed with the nine digits and the cosmic forms constructed with the number of lines which they each respectively represent all the essential principles and data used in plane trigonometry, namely the straight line, the bisected circle, the quadrated circle, the equilateral triangle, the bisected equilateral triangle, the square and four right angles, the eight points of the compass, arcs, sines, etc.

I also showed the significance of the 10 as symbolic of a conjunction formed between the completed old series and the new series begun or rather about to be begun. The reader will please bear in mind that the 1, 2, 3, etc., of 10, 20, 30, etc., merely number these times or facts of conjunction. Now beginning where I left off, namely, with the ninth cosmic figure complete, the first and simplest conjunction of a cosmic line with this completed cosmic figure would be a tangent to the left hand extremity of its horizontal diameter—at the left hand for the same reason first given—that the Arabic notation is from the left-hand toward the right. The simplest and most natural symbolic representation of this conjunction performed is by our so-called number 10. The next simplest cosmic figure possible in the direction of the new series is to draw a circle at right angles to the original cosmic circle and through the extremities of one of the diameters. We have taken one positive step forward then in the new series, have outlined sphericity, and have used eleven cosmic lines in doing it, that is we have used a complete one of the 1st series and a partial one of the new series, fairly represented by the Arabic symbolic expression 11 after indicating one conjunction.

In the same manner draw circles through the extremities of each of the three remaining diameters for the 12, 13, 14. From the point of conjunction of these four circles, draw straight lines to the four corners of the quadrilateral and drop a perpendicular from said point of conjunction to the center of the quadrilateral and we have the pyramid inscribed within the sphere and have obtained the radius or semi-diameter of the sphere, having used nineteen cosmic lines and completed the second series ready for the second conjunction at twenty. From the point of conjunction of the four circles opposite the first point of conjunction draw a straight line to one of the corners of the quadrilateral which serves as the base of the first pyramid and so indicate the conjunction of the two hemispheres and the natural representation of this conjunction would be the so-called Arabic number 20. Complete the second pyramid by drawing the remaining three straight lines to the remaining three corners of the quadrilateral, drop the perpendicular as before and we have now the spherical diameter as well as all the other parts essential to spherical trigonometry complete with twenty-four cosmic lines and with these additional principles and data are enabled to accurately determine weight as well as measures of extension. The reader will perceive that as the twenty fourth cosmic line represents the completion of the polar diameter of the sphere we have here a natural and probable reason for twenty-four being a number symbolic of cosmic completion. It may also suggest to students of weights and measures why we have twenty-four grains in a pennyweight, and (probably twenty-four inches in a sacred cubit, the arm-measure from the shoulder to the tip of the little finger), and twelve inches in a foot, the half of it corresponding to the radius or semi-diameter of the sphere. We have even named one of the bones of the lower arm the radius.

What more natural than that the Creator who demands and commands just weights and measures, should have divinely revealed to the race in its infancy such invariable standards as these hinted at above, namely the polar diameter of our earth for a standard of linear measure and the spherical density of the earth as a standard of weight. Let us have further and more searching investigation of "The Great Pyramid" and see if these facts are not unmistakably recorded there for our instruction in these last days of degeneracy and apostacy. We have found that the typical periods of time find their completion in this symbolic 24, and it seems to me that the weights and measures which we have inherited point by their subdivisions to this number as their cosmic integer.

In view of the fact that history is silent as to the origin of geometry and the Arabic notation, who will give a more reasonable and natural solution of the problem and the cognate questions involved.

The reader will remember that we found the pyramid within the sphere became complete at the nineteenth cosmic line and number and that it was completed with the semi-diameter or radius of the sphere. Now let me call the readers attention to a numerical coincidence which is at least singular, namely, the number of the chapter and verse of a Scriptural prophecy which is usually interpreted now-a-days to point to this wonder of the world, "The Great Pyramid." The 19th verse of the 19th chapter of Isaiah reads as follows in the Septuagint version:

"In that day there will be an altar to the Lord in a province of the Egyptians and a monumental pillar at the border of it to the Lord."

The 24th verse reads,

"In that day Israel will be third among the Egyptians, and among the Assyrians blessed in the land;

25. Which the Lord of Sabaoth hath blessed, saying, Blessed be my royal people which are in Egypt and which are among the Assyrians, and my inheritance Israel."

I quote the other two verses not so much for any numerical significance as to call the reader's attention to the variation from the King James version and its remarkable significance in the light of historical facts as they now exist.

SELECTED MISCELLANY.

Students all over the world await with impatience further information in regard to the manuscripts found by Mr. Shapira in the East. The name of Mr. M. W. Shapira, though comparatively unknown in the United States, carries a great deal of weight with it in England. The following letter shows in what high esteem Mr. Shapira is held by the British museum:

BRITISH MUSEUM, Aug. 1, '82.

Dear Sir: As you are now on the eve of departure for the East, on your mission of research for rare works of Oriental literature, I wish you to know that the trustees of the British Museum highly value the advantages derived from your services in enriching their collections. The many important acquisitions of Hebrew and Arabic manuscript you have enabled them to make, cause the trustees of the museum to interest themselves very strongly in the success of your present enterprise. You bring to bear on the difficult work of collecting rare manuscripts, and archæological objects special knowledge, and you incur formidable risks in prosecuting your inquiries. The trustees are sensible of this, and they trust you will never fail to obtain assistance and support from all concerning themselves in the successful formation of the museum collection.

Faithfully yours,

EDW. A. BOND,

Principal Librarian and Chief Sec., etc.

To M. W. SHAPIRA, Esq.

Mr. Shapira lives in the holy city of the Jews. Mr. Shapira, who is a Russian, married the sister of a well-known lady in Brooklyn, whose husband lately occupied one of the positions of highest trust this city can confer.—Brooklyn Union.

TOOLS USED ON THE PYRAMIDS.

During a residence of two winters in a tomb at Gizeh, Mr. W. M. Flinders Petrie collected evidence showing that the tools used in working stone 4,000 years ago were constructed with a jewel at the cutting edge. He stated his reasons for coming to this conclusion in a paper read before the Anthropological Institute, a resume of which is published in a recent issue of Engineering, of London. Solid and tubular drills, straight and circular disk saws, and lathe tools were made with jewels set in metal. The lines of cutting on a granite core made by a tubular drill form a continuous spiral, the grooves being of a uniform depth and width throughout, showing that the cutting point was not worn as the work advanced. The regular taper of the core would indicate that jewels were also set upon the outside and inside of the drill, thereby facilitating its removal. In some specimens of granite, the drills sank one-tenth of an inch at each revolution, and the pressure necessary to do this must have been from one to two tons. The skill of the workmen and the capacity of the tool are illustrated by the clean path through both soft and hard material—no difference in the groove being perceptible, although it passes from a soft substance into quartz, subjecting the tool to an enormous strain. In plane surfaces the depth and width of the cuts indicate the successive strokes of a saw, and the use of a circular saw is proved by the regularly curved lines. The forms of the tools were the same that experience has sanctioned at the present time. The scarcity of the diamond and the lack of strength in the sapphire and beryl lead to the consideration of corundum. Nothing has been found about the metal of which the tool was made or the method of setting the jewel.

NEW LIGHT ON OLD TEXTS.

In the year that Tartan came into Ashdod (when Sargon, the king of Assyria sent him), and fought against Ashdod and took it.—Isaiah xx. 1.

As Sargon is mentioned only this once in the Bible, with some it was for a long time doubtful who he was, and in what relation he stood to the other kings of Assyria. Some thought that he and Sennacherib were one and the same person, under two different names; some, that he was Esar-haddon; some, that he was the same as Shalmaneser, while some suppose he was thus mentioned because his reign was probably very short, and his expedition against Ashdod was the only occurrence that brought him specially to the notice of the Jews.

But here, as in so many other cases, the exploration of the ruins of the ancient capital of Assyria makes plain the meaning, as well as confirms the incidental statement of the prophet. A cuneiform inscription, found at Khorsabad, gives the name of Sargon, and also a record of his exploits; and tells how he fought against and subdued Ashdod, seizing its treasures, and carrying the people away captive. This account and that of Isaiah mutually explain and supplement each other, the inscription giving the occasion, and time and circumstances of the expedition, while the prophet tells us that it was not the king himself, but Tartan, one of his generals, who was in command; the exploits of the commander of the army being spoken of as if done by the king himself.

From these long-buried but now exhumed records, it appears that Sargon was one of the greatest of the Assyrian kings, holding the throne for more than fifteen years; and that he was not merely a successful warrior, but also built up towns, erected palaces, constructed important public works, and advanced both the useful and ornamental arts. He prosecuted extensive schemes of conquest, against Babylon on the south, Medis on the east, Armenia on the north, and Palestine, Arabia and Egypt on the west; his conquests in the directions last mentioned leading to the mention of his name by Isaiah.

This is but one of the very many instances in which the uncovered ruins of ancient cities are confirming and throwing light on the statements of the Bible. Apart from their inspiration, such statements of the sacred record have, of course, the full weight of any other authentic history. But it is a satisfaction to find that, the more fully the records of antiquity are unfolded and made known, the more fully they confirm and illustrate the statements of the Bible—the inspired word of God.

Brevities.

The loftiest active volcano is Popocatapetl—"smoking mountain"—thirty-five miles southwest of Pueblo, Mexico. It is 17,784 feet above the level of the sea, and has a crater three miles in circumference, and 1,000 feet deep.

An Egypt exploring society has been formed in England, to explore the remains of the cities mentioned in the Scriptures, and there can be little doubt that if this work is adequately performed, many interesting relics will be discovered. The explorations of ancient Babylon and Nineveh have yielded most valuable fruits in the way of confirming and illustrating the Scripture narrative.

The Politischr Correspondens states that the Egyptian census, which was begun last year upon the recommendation of Sir Auckland Colvin, has just been completed. The total population is given as 6,798,220, of whom 3,393,-918 are males and 3,404,312 females. Cairo has 368,108 inhabitants; Alexandria, with its suburbs, 208,776; Port Said, 10,560; Suez, 10,813; Tantah, 33,726; Damietta, 34,040; Rosetta, 16,071; Mansurah, 26,784; Zagazig, 19,840. The statistical arrangement of the information obtained in connection with the census has yet to be made.

Our great astronomer, Mr. Lewis Swift, of Rochester is confirmed in the belief that he discovered some years ago two small planets between Mercury and the sun; or at all events one that was of a bright red color. Professor Trouvelot, a member of the French expedition to observe the last total eclipse of the sun, who was charged with the special duty of watching for intra-Mercurial planets, reports that he saw two stars within the Corona which were white—a proof that the red star seen before was a planet reflecting the sun's light. M. Trouvelot also saw a very red star close to the sun, and it was seen by one of his assistants at the same time.

The National Railroad Company, of Japan, incorporated with a capital of $20,000,000, under the auspices of the Japanese Government, two years ago, has adopted the American system of building railroads, and is now constructing the main line, which extends from Tokio to Aderazo, the northern seaport of Japan, a distance of 400 miles. A part of the main line, about fifty miles in length, has already been finished, and will be open to the public this month or next. The terminus of the line is the commercial center of a province where silk culture is the principal occupation of the people. The silk raised in this province is highly esteemed in foreign markets, and is exported to America as well as to Europe in large quantities every year. It is expected that the whole line will be finished within three years.

It is a curious fact that so firm in texture is the paper of a genuine Bank of England note that burning alone can hardly destroy it. The authorities have in a little glazed frame the remnants of a note which was in the great fire of Chicago. Though completely charred and black the paper still holds together, and the printing of the note is said to be sufficiently legible to establish its genuineness and to warrant its being cashed. There are some other notes at the bank which were cashed after having gone down with the "Eurydice" a few years ago, and reduced to little better than pulp. Indeed, the scraps and fragments which sometimes come into the bank to be cashed have a really ridiculous appearance.

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, Sept. 19, 1883.

Our State Conference at Argos closed on Monday. There was a good representation of brethren and sisters from abroad. The preaching was of a character well calculated to confirm the believer and instruct the inquirer. While to the social meetings all will look back as to sunny spots in life's pilgrimage through the vale of tears.

THE present year may be written down as the year of calamity. In the natural world we have floods, tidal waves, cyclones, plagues and earthquakes; in the political world we have social upheavings that are only the precursors of the Armageddon conflict. Reckless hands are tearing the parchments on which old superstition has written her creeds, to pieces and flinging the scraps to the winds. The chair of state has been suddenly jerked from under the old Papal despot at Rome, and left him seated in the dust. Strong hands are grasping for the throne of the Ottoman tyrant, and ere long he will share a sordid seat with his western brother. We are realizing the force of Bible expressions, "Perils of the last days," "Shaking of the heavenly powers." The rapture of the church is really imminent. Watch and pray.

Communications.

JERUSALEM, July 20, 1883.

Editor Restitution:

I come to you this morning with a sad heart. Poor Sister Davis was run over last evening by a horse ridden by a reckless young man of the city. She left our room on the Joppa road after dusk to return to the city. We had all been out among the rocks before dusk gathering flowers. And as Mrs. Wintenstein takes to the card-making business very cleverly, Mrs. Davis was returning with her flowers, full of hope for the future in copartnership with Mrs. W., both in earning money and disposing of it, when all at once her meditations were cut short. As my daily custom is, I went into the city this morning, and called first at her room, which, fortunately, is in a house with very kind people. I saw by the actions of the servant of the family, who let me in, that something was wrong. But as usual I went on and entered her room, expecting to find her doing up her breakfast dishes or settling down to her table of flowers and work. But instead of this she was lying on her bed, bruised and blood-stained, with her face covered with cloths saturated in alcohol. She has received some pretty bad bruises about her face, chest and arms. Just how badly she is hurt I cannot say. She does not believe in accidents. She says it is all right; that it is for good; and she does not believe—nor do I—in a God who is not able to prevent Satan from doing anything to his children that is not in some way for their good. Paul says, "All things," etc. And I believe it.

July 22.

Since writing the above we have been almost without hope of her getting well; but this morning our hearts are lifted up. She is much better. Two weeks ago she met with an accident that was pretty severe, but she got over it in a day or two; but that, with having a day or two of fever occasionally, had weakened her so that this trouble came to her at a time when there was not much physical strength to build on. The accident referred to was the falling from a stone wall or fence. She got a pretty hard fall, and was laid up for a day or two, but it was only a drop in the ocean, to be forgotten when this calamity came.

July 23.

Mrs. Davis is still improving. Have just returned from her rooms, and am now satisfied she will recover and soon be ready for—the dear Lord only knows what! I told her last night that I expected the next thing she undertook would be to butt the bull off the bridge. She said she thought quite likely. The young man who was riding the horse when she got hurt, was in this morning, and she, in a jestingly way, asked him if it hurt the horse. His people are very kind, and propose to pay the doctor bill and other necessary expenses. They have invited her to go to St. Johns for a week's holiday as soon as she is able to travel.

I can see now wherein some things I have written since coming here have been stated in such a way as to mislead. I desire not to do anything of the kind. Now, for instance; in writing about that little strip of land near the pool of Siloam, called the valley of Jehoshaphat, I spoke of it as blooming like the rose—not Palestine; the time has not yet come for that. Again, concerning the great improvements, fine buildings, and planting of vineyards outside the city. Some say they'll look upon this as permanent, but I do not. On the contrary, I believe the work now going on is a fulfilment of the word which says they shall build and not inhabit, and plant and not eat of the fruit. And I look upon those things which are to be permanent as yet future. We are approaching a time of war, of destruction, persecution and sore trouble for God's people such as the world has never seen. And it is only those who are striving to enter in at the straight gate that will be able to stand in these times. Those who are being drilled and prepared for such a warfare as Jesus fought; those who are humbling their hearts before God; who can stand everything without resentment—these alone will be able to stand the flood of evil that Satan is preparing for the last terrible conflict, for he knows his time is short, and that Christ will soon come, and that his coming means the breaking of the power of the evil one. I believe his coming is all that is necessary to bind Satan. Then the prince of this world is finished, his power gone, for then Christ in person will be here, and he is King. It would be impossible for Satan to move a muscle for "the earth will be filled with his (Christ's) power and glory." Satan and his followers at that time will fall down before him and confess that he is Christ the King. Not because they are among the saved, but it has been so written and must come to pass. See Luke viii. 28.

Some may think I have changed my mind since my first letter to THE RESTITUTION, about Americans coming here. Well, in a certain sense I have. I have changed my mind a good many times, since God began to deal with me; and I thank him that he has kept me where he could teach me. Two years ago I was as ignorant of the teachings of his word as a new-born babe is of the ways of the world. Now I see that there will be many people besides Israel and Judah, as a nation, return to, or rather come to this land prior to the coming of Christ and the resurrection. But for anyone to make misrepresentations about the country, in order to induce people to come, is not in harmony with God's way of doing. True statements will bring those equal to the work, and keep the faint-hearted away. Pictures of fields of beautiful flowers and mountains groaning under their load of fruit, and great plains of waving grain, would do to hold up before those who are weak in the knees, who would only be a burden to the true burden-bearers. However, it is plain to my mind that the reports of certain ones in the past about the obstacles to be encountered, "big giants," etc., have been just the thing, and will keep away those who would be continually looking back to America (Egypt), murmuring and complaining, and lusting for the things left behind. Reader, if you are one of those who have been thinking of crossing the "big waters," make sure before you undertake it, that you are willing to sacrifice everything. This means no reserves whatever. Just say, "Now I am ready to step out into the hand of God, and let him set me down on top of Judah's highest mountain, where there is but rocks, neither shrub nor inhabitant," believing that God is able to send you food by the angels, or turn the stones into bread if necessary. If you can do this, come; if not, pray stay where you are; none others will be able to do the work. Such as those will bring down the rains from heaven, and cause these mountains, that are now comparatively barren, to bloom and yield their fruit to his people "that are at hand to come." Once more I repeat, if you are ready to take hold of the promises of God, believing them, and believing that there is no other God beside him, and that he is able to drive out all things that are opposed to the setting up of a righteous kingdom on earth—then again I say, come; but on the other hand, if you believe in something besides his promises, and have got your faith founded on traditions and the commandments of men, please stay away. That kind of faith, though as large as the tree on which the mustard seed grows, would not accomplish anything, unless you are beyond being taught, and are confident in yourself, and will come anyway. In this case, just pass into the city by the Damascus gate, and take up your abode with our "American friends," where you can live like a prince, and from the top of the house look into the mouth of the cave where Jeremiah lived and wrote his Lamentations, and really believed that even this cave was more than he deserved! Yes, in this house you can live, take your rest, enjoy life, and live so holy and good, as it is claimed, that God protects them from the fleas and mosquitos. While I think of it, I want to say that the old lady and son referred to in one of my letters as being among those of the "Lord's house," have come out of it, and have concluded that the time has not yet come when they can—according to the Bible teaching—eat bread without working for it.

I have just returned from Frank Brinton's garden, and brought home with me some peaches. The strip of paper I enclose is the measure of one of them, and this is no more than half as large as some he will have when ripe. This is one of those juicy, light-red cling-stones. Just over his door hangs a bunch of grapes two feet long, and they are two weeks short of maturity. This bunch will weigh from four to seven pounds when ripe. Yesterday and to-day we have been feasting on the first ripe grapes, and they are simply delicious, large white and solid. As my wife said this noon, the largest made a mouthful. [The length of the paper measuring round the peach was seven and four-tenths inches in length, and the one round the grape three inches and six tenths.—ED.]

The mountain region of this country was, in my opinion, only intended for fruit; and even now, if it the first hands would entertain any other country; and under favorable conditions we have only to look at the bunch of grapes brought by those who went to spy out the country from the valley of Eschol, to see what the land is capable of doing. I intend—if permitted to do so—to visit that valley which is at or near Hebron, week after next, and will write you concerning that place of note, its productions, prospects, etc.

I give you one item copied from the Egyptian Gazette, published at Alexandria, July 23, '83:

"According to a telegram from Damietta dated the 11th inst., at 9 p. m., Mr. Goodall had succeeded in burying, up to that time, upwards of four hundred carcasses."

I don't know but what you get more news from that unhappy land than we are able to get here, but I send this because it comes handy, and is so horrible to think of. No doubt many of them laid for days exposed to the atmosphere. Today we hear the cholera has broken out in Cairo and Alexandria worse than ever; and many people are coming up to the "hill country" from Joppa, thinking it will visit the port Jonah sailed from.

P. H. WINTERSTEIN.

THE CLIMAX—THE LOGOS.

I. "The logos" is the word in all languages, Hebrew, Greek, Latin and English. It is a Greek term of the Greek New Testament, 200 times; and in the O. T. 1100 times. Then we read of the Life, the Light, the Way, the Truth and the Life, the Wisdom, the Shepherd and the Bishop of souls, the Savior, the Redeemer, the Deliverer, the blessed and only Potentate, the Judge, the First-born, the Son of man, the New Man, the Second Man, the Lord (to be king) from Heaven! There and other terms are enshrined in "the Record that God gave of his Son" "with signs and wonders" and Holy Ghost, untold times. Question, If one be (by whatever authority) a pre-existent, personal, "Divine Being," why not some or all these other titles of Jesus? Answer echoes: Why?

II. Jesus, the only begotten of the Father, prayed: "Glorify thy Son that thy Son also may (in the future) glorify thee." John xvii. 1-21. He groups his apostles with all believers in their word (the logos) and invests them with his own glory (then in prospect) that the world may know "God's love to him and them!" Dan. vii. 13, 14, 18 and 27.

This sustains the seven-fold facts (before given) on which his Divine Sonship rests. Matt. i. 21; Mark i. 1-11; Luke i. 26-35; John i. 1-5; Gal. iv. 4; Heb. i. 1-9; ii. 1-14; John i. 1-7. It also opens up "The joy set before him" for enduring the cross, and obtaining "the name above every name in this world and that to come." Heb. xii. 2; Phil. ii. 5-11.

He came as the Pentecostal blessing and our gospel calling came from God. He came on the line of the ages of promise and as sanctioned by all the thousand-fold miracles by Moses and the ancient worthies! He came as "the only begotten Son!" He came so as to fulfill a whole hundred prophecies, all of God! He finished the work given him to do, and went to God, his "Father and our Father." John xvi. 28; xx. 17; Acts i. 1-11.

III. What more can an intelligent faith require than the Almighty God in his creation? What more than the patriarchal promises, his mission to Moses, and himself in his Son Jesus for redemption? Dan. vii. 13, 14; Matt xxviii. 18, John v. 18-27; xiv. 6-10; 2 Cor. v. 19, Heb xii. 11.

In this "light from above" please read, "He that transgresseth (breaks over the doctrine of the Father and the Son) and abideth not in the doctrine of Christ hath not God. He that abideth in the doctrine of Christ, hath both the Father and the Son," 2 John 9; Matt. xi. 27; xxviii. 18-20; 1 John ii. 22-24; iv. 15; v. 5. The presumed "Pre-existent One" not begotten, not born, not our "near of kin," for redemption finds no possible place here! So we are shut up to "the one God, the Father, and one Lord Jesus of the seed of David, the man Christ Jesus, who together fill the gospel horizon. Hence it is, "Christ the first fruits, afterward they that are Christ's at his coming! The harvest of those "begotten again," and one in him are accounted "the children of God and joint heirs with Christ." But they have no relation at all to another theoretic non-humanity before himself as Jesus called the Son of God!" Luke i. 35; Gal. iv. 4.

Truly God's purpose of grace is "His external purpose which he purposed in Christ Jesus before the world: but is now manifested by the appearing of Jesus," and the gospel calling of the church—his Bride. Eph. iii. 11; v. 32; 2 Tim. i. 9; 1 Pet. i. 19-22; 1 John i. 1-7.

When obstacles abounded and the question was raised, "Is there anything too hard for the Lord?" for at the birth of Isaac, a crisis in Israel, or at the birth of the Lord Jesus) the answer followed: "with men this is impossible, but not with God, for with God all things are possible." Gen. xviii. 14; Jer. xxxii. 17 and 27; Luke i. 37. Nothing here is required beyond "the record" for faith "unto victory."

We reach the climax then by faith. "The first man Adam was made a living soul, the figure of him to come. The second man (Jesus) is the Lord from heaven." 1 Cor. xv. 45-48. This gives God's order. It is chronological and historical as to both time and event. This seals the truth of all Bible on this subject of "The Logos," from "first to last." Matt. i. 1-21; Mark i. 1-14; Luke i. 25-35; John i. 1-14; Gal. iv. 4; 1 Pet. i. 19-21; 1 John i. 1-7. Here the case may reverently rest. No man before "Adam, the first man!" Of course no Christ before "the second man — the last Adam—Jesus the Christ; amen and amen!"

Let us leave him, his pre-eminence, his triumphs over world, flesh and devil, his well-earned titles of divinest honor, his angel anthems of glory to God and good will to men, his robes of glory in the visioned kingdom, his indwelling Father Almighty, and the voice from the excellent glory, "This is my beloved Son; hear ye him!" In him all fullness dwells.

Yours for truth and grace,

J. B. CHIK.

ANGER.

PROV. vii. 9: Be not hasty in thy spirit to be angry, for anger resteth in the bosom of fools.

Anger is a violent passion of the mind, and is excited by some real or supposed injury. It is usually accompanied with a desire for revenging one's self. The passion of anger is not necessarily sinful, but like all passions of the mind, it may be perverted and produce sin. Anger in a noble mind is simply the indignation felt against a wrong act, whether against the individual or some other person. The same passion in a base mind degenerates into rage, and frequently into acts of violence. Hence the command, "Be ye angry and sin not." Or if you are angry, do not commit sin by some overt act. The same idea is found in the text chosen, "Anger resteth in the bosom of fools;" in other words, it is allowed a resting place in the bosom of fools.

While each unbridled passion produces sad effects, that of anger is certainly most to be dreaded. Each day's history records some deed of violence that fills the mind with horror, or witnesses some angry unkind word that goes crashing into some tender, gentle heart, lacerating until it bleeds (for hard, unkind words cut like knives), and leaves a wound that festers during life. O think, when you are about to use some unkind word, of how pleasant the recollection of gentle words will be.

"If I are known a word more gentle
Than the breath of summer air)
In a lasting heart it nestled.
And will dwell forever there.
Not the bestling of the prince
Could disturb it night or day;
Only with the heart's last throbbing
Will it ever fade away."

How common to hear of persons who are said to have an "ungovernable temper," when the trouble is, they have a temper that is ungoverned. They are slaves, and that, too, to the most unreasonable of masters. Why not rebel against the tyrant? The victory is assured. Oh, what inducements are held out to him that overcometh! Exemption from second death; the new name; power over the nations; the white raiment and the name never erased from the book of life: and the high privilege of being associated with the Ruler of all the earth. Besides all this the moral grandeur of the victory is truly great. "He that is slow to anger is better than the mighty, and he that ruleth the spirit than he that taketh a city."

The world goes wild over some great victory gained upon some blood-stained field of battle. When Napoleon's battle-scarred veterans marched steadily into the blazing batteries at Waterloo where the iron hail cut down whole regiments at a single discharge, the world applauds their bravery. But a greater moral hero is he that can face a battery of angry words as they leap fiercely from the angry lips of some human magazine of hate. Have you, dear brother or sister, any such victories to celebrate? Or did you, at the sublime moment, when the recording angel waited to write victory for you, did you basely desert your post, and let your temper overcome you? Do you tell me the world calls you a coward? Remember you are not to be judged by the world's standard. The world will not assist us in the formation of that character that will stand the test of the Divine standard.

The rules for the formation of character that God will approve, are found only in the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus. There we are told to "let all bitterness, and wrath, and anger, and clamor, and evil speaking, be put away from you, with all malice, and be ye kind one to another, tender hearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you." A beautiful picture, is to be pushed upon the canvass at once. It is the result of patient toil, and if we attain to this high standard of moral excellence, it will be by patiently adding to faith all these beautiful adornments of Christian character. How have we succeeded? Remember, abundant entrance into the kingdom is promised where these things abound.

Yours, in hope.

Conference Report.

The brethren met in accordance with the announcement at Argos, Saturday at 2:30 p. m., meeting was called for business, D. S. Dwiggins was chosen Chairman, and A. R. Underwood Secretary. C. C. Ramsey of Chicago being present, reported the progress of his mission work in that city as quite encouraging, and a committee consisting of I. G. Roberts, B. T. Halstead and Robt. Railsback was appointed to draft resolutions as the expression of the Conference toward this good work. Committee reported as follows:

WHEREAS, A few brethren, strong in faith, but of quite limited means, having lately opened a mission in the city of Chicago, known as the Mission of Blessed Hope, and are struggling hard to maintain the same as a means of sounding out in that great city the glad tidings of earth's restitution and millennial glory at the coming of our blessed Lord; and

WHEREAS, Our worthy brother and able proclaimer C. C. Ramsey is with them, already at work with good success, and a fair prospect of making it soon self-sustaining if a little financial aid were given it now in its infantile struggle. Therefore,

Resolved, That we deem the enterprise important to the cause of truth and worthy of the consideration of the Brotherhood at large, and would therefore recommend that as stewards of the Lord's money, if bestowed in this behalf it would be a faithful use of the means, and therefore well pleasing to the Master. Funds for this purpose may be sent direct to Brother C. C. Ramsey, 259 Randolph St., Chicago, Room 20, or to Brother S. A. Chaplin, editor of THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Ind., as may best suit the convenience of those sending.

Report of this committee was adopted unanimously.

Brother Woodward of Michigan was with us and reported good work done in the Master's vineyard in that State.

Brother Oppy of La Paz, Ind, gave good news of his work the past year.

Brother Myers of Illinois attended and reported the Brethren in his locality, though not increasing in numbers, as alive and holding the fort.

At the meeting in June at Antioch, Ind., the Directors of the Publishing Company were appointed a committee to see to the preliminary arrangement regarding the compiling of a Church Hymn Book, and have made arrangements with Brother Platt McDonald of Plymouth, Ind., to outline a book of this nature, and report at our next Quarterly Conference, which will be held at Plymouth at the time of the Annual Meeting of the Stockholders of THE RESTITUTION in November.

Many brethren and sisters were present from different parts of the country and to name all would be impossible. Speakers present confined themselves to their teaching to good, practical, gospel lessons, that we all love to hear.

Meeting closed by gathering around the table of our Lord, presided over by Brother Chaplin in his usual pleasing style, and partaking of the emblems of his broken body and shed blood.

MARSHALL, Ill.

Editor Restitution:

I have been requested to write for help. There are a few in this vicinity that believe the glad tidings, but none except myself have been baptized since believing the gospel of the kingdom. Now the kind of help we want is some one that can set forth in an able manner the things concerning the kingdom of God and the name of our Lord Jesus Christ. I am informed through THE RESTITUTION that there will be a conference held shortly at Argos, Ind. I suppose that perhaps you would be there, and that several of the speaking brethren also would be present, and not knowing the addresses of any I have thus written to you. Now if you will do us the favor, and I do not doubt it, confer with the brethren and see who can come and hold a meeting for us. We are poor in this world's goods, but we will not let any go empty away. Can not you come, Brother Chaplin? Our place is some six miles southwest of Marshall. Do what you can for us, and accept our thanks.

THE EASTERN QUESTION — RUSSIA'S DESIGNS ON BULGARIA.

CRACOW, September 10.—A large number of Russians, evidently military officers, are crossing the frontier en route to Bulgaria.

LONDON, September 10.—The Post's Berlin special says: The agents of the Czar in Bulgaria are acting in a thoroughly revolutionary manner, and do not even disdain coalition with Nihilists. It is feared their action will bring about a crisis which will lead to the reopening of the whole Eastern Question.

The Telegraph's Vienna special, referring to affairs in Bulgaria, says it can be positively stated that the object of Russia is to get rid of Prince Alexander and place its own nominee upon the throne. None of the Powers will, however, tolerate the usurpation of the throne of Bulgaria by a Russian pretender, even though he should prove to be the Grand Duke Sirgius or the Grand Duke Paul.

The Standard's Berlin special states that the joining of Roumania in the alliance with Austria and Germany is the answer to the Russian coup d' etat in Bulgaria. He adds that the relations now existing between Germany and Russia are more than cold, and says it is reported that Russians are concentrating an armed force north of the River Pruth, between Roumania and Bess-Arabia.

Agram, Croatia, and vicinity was the scene on Saturday of serious rioting, several houses occupied by Jews being attacked. The military fired on the mob, killing and wounding many.

Hicks Pasha, with 5,000 troops, started from Khartoum on Sunday along the left bank of the White Nile on a campaign against the False Prophet. The latter is reported resolute, and decisive fighting is expected by the end of the month. The rebels have crossed the road from Berber to Suakim.

Special Exposition Excursion to Chicago, Wednesday, Sept. 26, 1883.

A special cheap excursion will be run via the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne and Chicago Railway to Chicago, on Wednesday, Sept. 26th. Tickets will be good returning until Friday, Sept, 28th inclusive.

The Exposition and the numerous other points of interest in the great city were never more attractive than now. You had better go. It is the pleasantest time of the year for a trip. Apply to agents of the company for information as to time of trains and rates.

UPHELD BY JESUS.

When heart and flesh despondent sink,
And from life's war we fain would shrink,
One upward glance brings heavenly cheer—
Upheld by him I smile at fear.

When troubles like a mountain rise,
And comfort from my bosom flies,
To him I run for sure relief—
Upheld by him I smile at grief.

When life appears a sea of woe,
And all its waves my soul o'erflow,
I to the mercy-seat repair—
Upheld by him I smile at care.

When earthly treasure fails and fades,
And chilling poverty invades;
He every needed good will grant—
Upheld by him I smile at want.

When faith grows dim, and from its sight
My star of hope would veil its light,
Grace bids a beam of joy shine out—
Upheld by him I smile at doubt.

When wasting anguish and disease
Upon my suffering body seize,
My murmuring lips will not complain—
Upheld by him I smile at pain.

And if 'tis mine ere time shall close
To slumber in the grave's repose,
With joy I yield my failing breath—
Upheld by him I smile at death!

THE MAN OF SIN. 2 Thess. ii. 1-8. Number II.

In previous articles I have referred to some terms used by the apostle in this remarkable passage, and pointed out several possible senses in which they may be used. I have also indicated my preference for a particular sense in each case, and briefly given reasons for such preference arising out of the known facts of history, and the main scope of the passage as well as apostolic usage. I have also, in the form of answers to several questions, affirmed that the bishop of Rome answers to the description given by the apostle of the personage termed "the man of sin"—especially as to his "exalting himself above all that is called god (or ruler) and sitting as a god in the temple of God."

Several of the apostle's descriptive terms in this passage call for a little farther illustration. The first I shall refer to touches the very center of the question, namely, the term "sin" in the appellative phrase "the man of sin;" with the specific definition the apostle gives of it by his use of two other terms of a far more definite signification. I refer to the term "iniquity" in the phrase "mystery of iniquity," and to the term "wicked" in the appellative phrase "that wicked." The term "iniquity" is represented in the Greek here by anomia, a noun which literally signifies "lawlessness," from nomos a law and a privative—without law. The term "wicked" is an adjective represented by anomos being from the same roots as the noun, and signifying "lawless." It should be deemed satisfactory evidence on this point if I quote the Revised Version of the New Testament. In both instances that version sustains the literal sense I have given. "The mystery of lawlessness," and "the lawless one," are the renderings respectively given by the English company and which are not called in question by the American committee. I may mention also that in the common version, 1 Tim. i. 9, anomos is rendered "lawless;" in 1 Cor. ix. 21, it is three rendered "without law;" and in 2 Pet. ii. 8, "unlawful." Dr. Macknight renders it in 2 Thess. ii. 8, "that lawless one;" while in Beza's Latin version it is represented by the word exlex, literally "out of law." It should be noticed here that an adjective with the article prefixed has a noun or pronoun understood; hence "the lawless" (one).

It must be evident from these remarks that the term "sin" in this passage is of very vague and general import, and that nothing more definite is derived from the English words "iniquity" and "wicked" given as the rendering of anomia and anomos respectively, by the translators of the common version. But it will also be admitted that the renderings I have suggested give a specific signification to the term "sin," as the characteristic of him who "exalteth himself above all rulers." It is the spirit of rebellion against a righteous lawgiver, exercising his administration through good and just laws; that disposition of self-will which asserts its authority to act upon its own ideas of self-interest, ambition and self-love.

This spirit or disposition of lawlessness as a characteristic feature of "the man of sin," is in entire harmony with those overt acts described by the apostle in verse 4, and minutely dealt with in the articles already published. Who but one of lawless spirit would oppose and exalt himself above all that is called god (or ruler)—and "as a god (or ruler) sit in the temple of God, showing himself that he is a god (or ruler)?" The spirit and the acts entirely agree, the one directly leading to the other; and the fact that they both unite so unmistakably in the papacy, is a strong evidence of the accuracy of the interpretation I have attempted to illustrate.

While "lawlessness" is thus a very definite quality of "the man of sin," it does not of itself determine the question whether it is Divine or human law that is disregarded by this personage. But no dubiety is left on this question by the description given by the apostle of the overt acts committed by this "lawless" one. It is clear from this that it is both Divine and human law that is set at nought. "Sitting in the temple of God as a god (or ruler) showing himself that he is a god," is a direct violation of the law of God as enunciated by our Lord and his apostles, besides being a flagrant infringement of the liberties possessed by Christian disciples in the first century, both by the individual disciple, and by individual churches. Equally is it an infringement of the Divine law when the province of the civil ruler is invaded by any ecclesiastical body, or by any official representing such; because nothing is more plainly enjoined both by Christ and his apostles, than obedience in all civil matters to "the powers that be," whether these be heathen or professedly Christian. "Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's," is the dictum of our Lord himself, and is echoed by his apostles in such language as this—"Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers"—without exception of presbyter or bishop; "Put them in mind to be subject to principalities and powers, to obey magistrates." "Submit yourselves to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake; whether it be to the king as supreme; or unto governors as unto them that are sent by him," etc." The above quotation (Titus iii. 1,) from Paul must be understood to include bishops or elders, for Titus had been left in Crete by the apostle for the purpose of selecting and appointing such officials. And the first bishops of Rome were not exempt from the obligation here imposed on all Christian disciples.

The usurpation of the civil power by the ecclesiastical, under any pretext is equally a setting at nought of human law, inasmuch as the law and constitution of the State is thereby set aside. This power was claimed by the papacy in virtue of the alleged vicariate of the pope as the vicar or deputy of Christ. It is based on the idea that the Headship of Christ "over all things to (or for) the church," is exercised in the present age in some open and visible manner as the Divine kingdom over the nation of Israel of old was administered. If it were now the millennial age, there might be some show of reason for such an idea; for Christ's Headship over the nations will then be exercised in the most open manner. "But now we see not all things put under him;" and it is only a vain attempt to anticipate the future reign of Christ and his saints by what can never be anything but a caricature of it in the present. This seems to have had a kind of prototype among the disciples at Corinth which called forth a rebuke from the apostle—"Ye have reigned as kings without us, and I would to God ye did reign that we also might reign with you." The popular doctrine that the kingdom of Christ is the church lies at the root of the pretensions of the papacy, from which it is but a step for church officials to claim political authority.

These manifestations of "lawlessness" are simply a sinful exercise of human self will in opposition to the Divine will, obedience to which was inculcated and exemplified by him whose vicar the bishop of Rome professes to be, and is really nothing short of high-handed rebellion against the majesty of heaven. Christ said—"My meat and my drink is to do the will of him that sent me." For this self-abnegation "in the days of his flesh," his lordship over all was bestowed upon him. (Phil. ii. 8, 9). A portion of this authority he delegated to his apostles, and coupled it with sanctions involving great responsibility on the part of all such as professed his name. He said to his apostles, "He that receiveth you receiveth me, and he that receiveth me receiveth him that sent me." Matt. x. 40; John xiii. 20. This authority the apostles exercised. Peter refers to it thus—"That ye may be mindful of the words which were spoken before by the holy prophets, and of the commandment of us the apostles of the Lord and Savior." He does not say "the commandment of me, Peter the prince of the apostles," as the Romanist would wish, but "of us the apostles," including all as possessing equal authority in the prosecution of their mission. For example, in relation to Cornelius and his friends, Peter "commanded them to be baptized in the name of the Lord;" and Paul, in the case of the damsel possessed with a spirit of divination, said to the spirit, "I command thee in the name of Jesus Christ to come out of her." In such respects as these the apostles are absolutely without successors; while in all the imitable qualities they manifested they may have successors in the humblest disciples.

But our subject requires that we notice a farther transference of a portion of the authority possessed by our Lord, namely, to the bishops or elders of the churches. "He (Christ) gave gifts unto men."...."And he gave some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers." These last "pastors and teachers," are evidently identical with the bishops or elders—the terms "pastors and teachers" denoting the functions they performed. (1 Tim. v. 17; Heb. xiii. 7, 17, 20). These bishops were selected and appointed by the apostles or by delegates specially authorized by them, such as Timothy and Titus. Those bishops exercised their authority or "rule" in the churches, and "labored in the word and doctrine" (or teaching), but this latter not to the exclusion of liberty to teach on the part of other brethren in the church. And there being a plurality of bishops in each several church, (Phil. i. 1; Acts xiv. 23; Titus i. 5), it follows that the so-called bishop of Rome derives his ecclesiastical pedigree not from the first bishop of Rome, (who, by the way, is, without proof, alleged to have been the apostle Peter), but from one of a plurality, all possessed of equal authority.

All this authority exercised by apostles and bishops, as well as the power by which they were enabled to perform supernatural acts of healing, etc., was vested in and distributed by Christ himself. "All power was given to him in heaven and in earth," but the exercise of it in the interval between his ascension and second appearing was limited, so far as facts recorded in the New Testament show us that these special endowments of his apostles and others, which have just been alluded to. And it is to be noted in connection with this, that while the endowment of the apostles was direct and immediate, as on the day of Pentecost, that of elders and all others was indirect and mediate. A marked instance of the latter is found in the case of the disciples at Samaria recorded in Acts viii. Philip (the evangelist, Acts xi. 5, and xxi. 8,) had "preached [the] Christ unto them. The people with one accord gave heed to the things which Philip spake, hearing and seeing the miracles which he did.....When the apostles who were at Jerusalem heard that Samaria had received the Word of God, they sent unto them Peter and John, who, when they were come down, prayed for them that they might receive the Holy Ghost; (for as yet he was fallen upon none of them; only they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus). Then laid they their hands on them, and they received the Holy Ghost." Here, although Philip performed miracles, and preached and baptized, there was no communication of the Holy Ghost to the disciples in Samaria, till Peter and John were sent by the apostles from Jerusalem; and this was effected through prayer and the laying on of hands. Paul makes allusion to the same prerogative of the apostles in his epistle to the Galatians. Referring to his own personal intercourse with them, he says, "He therefore that ministereth to you the Spirit, and worketh miracles among you." See also Acts xix. 1-6.

While these extraordinary endowments were a veritable reality in the early church, and were patent to the observation of all, it becomes an important question whether anything approaching to them is possessed in the present day, or since the apostles and first generation of elders fell asleep, either by the hierarchy of Rome, or by any other religious institution in the world. If this question be answered in the negative as I conceive it must, some may be disposed to ask if there is therefore no authority to preach, baptize and minister to the spiritual needs of Christian disciples. This is quite a different question, and happily admits of a simple answer, but one which effectually disposes of the claims of all pretenders to be the successors of the apostles. Paul's comprehensive injunction—"Do good to all men, as ye have opportunity, especially to the household of faith," affords ample warrant for making known what Christ and his apostles preached for salvation, and also for ministering to the instruction and edification of believers, as well as for the performance of deeds of benevolence of a mere material order. But it affords this warrant to every one who can in the humblest way contribute, by tongue, pen, or otherwise, to the objects named, equally with the most nobly gifted, most highly educated, and most solemnly ordained officials.

We have thus seen that a large measure of real authority and power was conferred upon the apostles, and that a portion of it was communicated to the elders of the churches—without taking into account other Christian disciples who may also have been so endowed. That this authority, moreover, possessed by elders and others, was communicated solely through the instrumentality of the apostles, by means of prayer and the laying on of hands. While all this is undeniable, there is no evidence that the elders had any authority to retransmit their powers to others, or in fact that there was any provision whereby such powers could be communicated to their successors in office or to any others. Notwithstanding these plain facts, however, the bishop of Rome, in virtue of being, as he alleges, the vicar of Christ, the successor of the apostle Peter, first bishop of Rome, and the prince of the apostles, claims to have inherited all the power possessed by the twelve apostles, which is now all concentrated in himself. There is not a particle of Scriptural authority for such an assumption, and it lacks historical facts to sustain it, and can therefore only be viewed as a glaring instance of that "lawlessness" which the apostle has twice recorded as the most prominent characteristic of "the man of sin."

In this aspect of "lawlessness" (that of claiming authority in the church) there is a shade of difference from that which exalts itself above all rulers. It is plain that "lawlessness" has two varieties of signification—violation of positive law, and being simply without law, and therefore presumptuously acting as if there was a law sanctioning such action. (In the contrary Christ himself holds his office only by express divine authority which becomes really the law in the case. Thus the apostle Peter said to the assembled Jews on the day of Pentecost, "God hath made Jesus both Lord and Christ." And regarding his priesthood (also claimed by the Pope) it is written, "Christ glorified not himself to be made an high priest, but he that said unto him, Thou art my Son, today have I begotten thee. As he saith in another place, Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec." And this is in accordance with divine rule (or law) as the apostle affirms, "No man taketh this honor upon himself but he that is called of God as was Aaron." But all such rules are set at nought by the bishop of Rome. He does not scruple to take the honor upon himself, although it certainly cannot be said that he has been called of God as was Aaron." And if the Christ himself only received his honorable office in virtue of the divine call clearly expressed, much less can the bishop of Rome arrogate to himself such pretentious claims as he has usurped in the professed Christian church.

Allusion was made in a former article to the use of the term "Father" as a title by certain officials of the Roman Catholic Church, and notably by the bishop of Rome under its Latin form Pope. This is a most glaring act of "lawlessness," and calls for a little farther notice in the present article. The words of Christ are clear and emphatic, and although without the formality of the Mosaic law are in reality a law to his disciples. They are these, "And call no man your father upon the earth, for one is your Father, which is in heaven." These words are substantially identical with those in the Douay or Roman Catholic version, namely, "And call none your father upon earth, for one is your father who is in heaven." The publishers of this Roman Catholic version were evidently impressed with the necessity of inserting, in a foot-note, a defence of the practice of styling the bishop of Rome Pope, and the use of the term Father as a title for priests, monks, etc. They say, "The meaning is, that our Father in heaven is incomparably more to be regarded than any Father upon earth.....But this does not hinder but that we are by the law of God to have a due respect both for our parents and spiritual fathers. (1 Cor. iv. 15.)" This is a most ingenious way to blink the real point of the question. It is not the applying the term father to one's immediately paternal ancestor that is the question here. Nor yet is it speaking of the disciple who has been the instrument in the hand of God in leading one to the belief and obedience of the gospel, as one's spiritual father. Those to Corinth who owned Paul's instrumentality in preaching the gospel to them, though they might have, as the apostle says, ten thousand instructors in Christ, yet had they not many fathers, for in Christ Jesus he had begotten them through the gospel. In this sense they had only one father, and that was Paul, but every Roman Catholic has ten thousand Fathers in the unwarrantable sense. It is well known that it is not to this Pauline relationship that the title Father is used in the Roman Catholic Church. The Pope is addressed by this title by thousands who sustain no such relationship to him, and priests are called "Father" by all and sundry Roman Catholics in the same general manner. For this usage there is no law, and yet in the foot-note quoted, "the law of God" is referred to as a warrant for "due respect" he had "for our spiritual fathers." Thus the law of Christ expressed in plain words is set at nought on the plea that "the law of God" is a warrant for so doing.

Let us look a little more closely at the context of Christ's injunction. It is remarkable that it was given in connection with the very same kind of assumptions on the part of the Scribes and Pharisees as we have seen to be claimed and used by the Bishop of Rome and the priests of that communion. In verse 2 he says, "The Scribes and Pharisees sit in Moses' seat..... Vs. 5, and love the uppermost rooms at feasts, and the chief seats in the synagogues, and greetings in the markets, and to be called of men, Rabbi, Rabbi. But be ye not called Rabbi: for one is your Master, even Christ; and all ye are brethren." And then follows the injunction we are noticing, "And call no man your father upon the earth." Can there be any doubt here as to the special sense in which this prohibition is to be understood? It is directly opposed to the use of the term father as a title of honor among the disciples of Christ. In view of what has been here advanced, I submit that this is an instance of the most flagrant "lawlessness" that could be conceived as possible by any one professing the name of Christ. It seems almost prophetic of the usurpation by the papacy of supremacy over "the church of God" by the adoption of a title which, in a religious relationship, belongs to God alone. It is rather remarkable that our Lord in this passage adds, "And whosoever shall exalt himself shall be abased." This is the very act predicted of "the man of sin," by the apostle, "who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called a god" etc. But this is mentioned only by the way, it may be no more than a coincidence. The fact of "lawlessness" in the instance given is abundantly manifest, and of itself stamps the papacy as the power predicted by the apostle.

In another paper, if opportunity offers, we shall consider "that which letteth" (or hindereth).

My husband and I are very desirous to go from this place to a place where we can have the privilege of hearing the gospel preached. Also where we can get work. My husband is a mason by trade but would do anything honorable to gain a livlihood. He has suffered much persecution in one way and another from the masons and others in this place, mostly because of the difference in his faith, they taking every means to keep work away from him. We have talked and prayed much concerning the matter and have finally concluded that God may want us to go from here or there would be a way opened up for us to live here. Is Plymouth a good place for a poor man to live in? Could work be got in the winter? We meet but few people of our faith here (Brother Sheridan and a few others), and seldom have the privilege of attending preaching. We feel as though it would be best to get among people of our faith if possible. Will you please be kind enough to write to me, or if your time is too fully occupied have some of the brethren or sisters write and tell me what chance there is in that part of the country to gain a livlihood. Yours in hope of the soon coming of Christ,

Virginia Moon.

I send a few more lines to know whether you received the dollar I sent you about the last of June. I received a letter in July from my sister in England and she had received the paper and was very well pleased with it. I wish I could afford to keep on sending it to her. I have not heard from my brother to know if he received his paper. I sent two dollars last winter to pay for my paper and also theirs and I think that is long enough for them to know whether they like it well enough to pay for it. As soon as I can I will send more and have it sent to some of my other friends. I love the paper and grieve because I can not get more to read it, but they don't find time and are afraid of the truth. I do wish some of my children or some one near me would see the truth and I could have some one to converse with. It is hard to be alone so everyway. I don't see why people can't all believe alike. I do wish I could have some one to help me feel as Mrs. O. F. Hall feels. I love her and her pieces; I wish I could see her. I hope I shall see her piece on "Abide in me," or "What it is to be in Christ." The Lord has been my helper and is so good and kind to me; I can see his goodness to me all my life. But I have had a great deal of darkness, and would have liked to have been a great deal wiser. But I hope to have patience to wait for the salvation of the Lord and trusting his time will be the best for me. I would like the privilege of visiting some conference this fall; if I can hear of one near enough to go I will go. I think of going back east this fall and when I send you the change of address, I will try and send the money I spoke of. How is the best way to send it? I would like to know if Conference will be held in Illinois at Antioch, Dixon or Adeline this year. And I am very thankful to find a friend to write for me as my writing is so poor. Pray for me that I may have more light and faith. I remain your loving sister in Christ,

Mrs. Mary Clark.

I trust you will pardon me for taking this liberty, as I am a stranger to you. I, however, am getting (regularly) your most valuable paper, The Restitution, and find it to be the most interesting and instructive paper that I ever read. Now I have a statement to make and a question to ask you, and in answering the question you will very much oblige a seeker of the truth.

I formerly was a Methodist, was baptized by a Methodist preacher; I believe in immersion and no other mode. After being a Methodist for several years (in good faith as I thought) fortunately, it seemed to me, I got to hear a Campbellite preacher, and, to my satisfaction, found them to be far ahead of me in the truth, so much so that I joined them, holding to my former baptism, seeing that the Scriptures teach one faith, one Lord and one baptism. And now in the last year, I might say, I have been more thoroughly converted into a knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus by the Church of God. I have a half-brother that belongs to that church, namely, R. A. Humphreys, and through him and The Restitution I have gained much valuable knowledge.

Question: Shall I hold to my former baptism? Now Jesus says, "Take my yoke upon you and learn of me." Oh sir, have I done it? Please answer as soon as possible, either through The Restitution or a private letter; I would rather have it in The Restitution, thinking that it may benefit others in my condition. If so, and you insert my letter, please correct grammatical errors.

Some friend has sent me your paper The Restitution and I value the paper much more highly than any religious paper I have ever taken. I am a Presbyterian but like the views of the paper on eternal life and everlasting death as stated in The Restitution. You also teach the doctrine of the millennium which was taught fifty years ago by the most orthodox Presbyterians, but now they tell us it is a temptation of the devil to believe in Christ's second coming being at hand. It would seem as if they had lost all faith in Christ's promise that he would ever return to this earth again, at least they don't teach it any more. When I attended an academy fifty years ago, old Doctor Calvin Yale, our teacher, used to tell us students daily that many of us would live to see the beginning of the millennium in 1866, as that was the time when the orthodox teachers set for the commencement of it. Now they teach that the world will keep right on growing worse and worse till the end of time, which don't seem to me much like Christ's teachings. Neither is it the teaching of the apostles or the apostolic fathers, for they certainly taught as does The Restitution on that subject.

I have a book published by Robert Fleming of London, England, in 1671, called an Epistory discourse concerning the rise and fall of the papacy, etc., which teaches the same doctrine with The Restitution. Fleming was a Scotchman and a very learned preacher of his day and generation. If you have never read it I think you would be glad to have a reading of it. On account of its anachronisms perhaps you would like a perusal of it; I will send it to you if you desire it. When he wrote and preached it was dangerous to vary from the Episcopal or established church, and he preached it at his peril, for they then persecuted heretics to the death. Yours in Christian fellowship.

I cannot refrain from wishing that all the brethren scattered abroad might know what a feast of good things we have of late enjoyed. If a stranger were to travel through our country, they would be very likely to pronounce us a very poor people, and in fact our sand ridges and marshes do not indicate a very great amount of wealth, such as is termed riches by the world; yet we some way manage to get a living and a little to spare. But if that same traveler could know all, methinks he would be apt to change his mind, and think that some at least had obtained the pearl of great price. The third Sunday of last month came Bro. Willis and Leonard Logan among us, and Brother Willis gave us several discourses, and at the close of the meetings we felt that much good had been done here, and regretted that the parting time had come. Brother Willis gained a place in the affections of the little band here that would not be easy to erase. He preaches the plain, straight-forward truth, such as all ought to hear, and none but prejudiced minds would reject. He left us all hoping to see him back again. May the choicest blessings of God be with him wherever his lot may be cast.

On Friday last we again had the pleasure of having our dear Brother, John Winee, among us. He held meeting over Saturday and Sunday and many were made to rejoice at the glorious prospects held up before them. On Sunday morning we held meeting in a beautiful grove. Oh! what a joyful time for those who were present! The social in the morning was all it could be, many speaking of the glorious prospects awaiting them when Christ shall come. As the sweet music from many voices arose in notes of praise through the otherwise silent grove, it seemed that we were in closer communion with God than ever before, and there were many strong resolutions made to lead a still higher life, to more fully prepare for immortal glory. In the afternoon three more precious ones came forward, presenting themselves for baptism. After services we adjourned to the water to help administer the holy rite. There we were detained some, but the time was well employed in singing songs of praise and devotion to our great Creator. Everything during the entire meeting was all as it should be, and at the close all felt to say, "It was good for us to be there." There were none there but were benefitted and would have been glad to continue, but we had to part, but parted that feeling although poor in dollars and cents, yet in the riches of God's inestimable money, we were growing richer every day.

We have regular preaching commencing on Saturday before every third Sunday, and we would be glad if brethren from abroad would meet with us. We are at present laboring under a great difficulty, being obliged to meet at our school house which is insufficient for our wants; but we are now making an effort to build a house of our own in which to worship. Our financial matters are such as will probably hinder us some, but 'tis said where there is a will there is a way, and we have started the matter to work, sending solicitors through our own surrounding neighborhood to get assistance, and from what I have learned of the matter it is quite encouraging. Brethren from other organizations have promised us some assistance, and any person feeling willing to donate any sum toward the building of such a house at this point may be assured it would be thankfully received. We are in sad need of a house, but it is going to try the brethren sorely here if we have to do it all ourselves. Therefore we ask for those who can to help us, if ever so little, in the name of the Lord, that we may be better situated to further the good work and the upbuilding of God's holy truths. Any amounts may be sent at any time to either or all of the Trustees, namely, Jacob Reed, George W. Fairchild and L. B. Cochenour, who are authorized to receive all subscriptions and receipt for them. Eagle Creek church is 2½ miles from Knox and any one coming to our meetings by rail, please address the undersigned and they will be met at the station. Yours in Christ,

George W. Fairchild.

SEA MIST.

The long mist waves upon the golden sands
Are rolling in,
Steady their throb, as best of heart that stands
At peace within.

There are blue hills beyond the tide, but they
Are shrouded now;
The sea mist, streaking all across the bay,
Hangs thick and low.

Yet sits they there. The fisherman who steers
His boat, brown-sailed,
By compass true, dreads not, nor trembling fears
His errand failed.

There are blue hills beyond life's restless tides
At times we catch
Faint glimpses of their beauty, such as chides
Our faithless watch.

Why strain our eyes to pierce the mist that hides
Our picture dim?
We have a Pilot who commands the tides:
Trust all to him.

MOUNT TABOR AND THE VALLEY OF JEZREEL.

Surely as I live, saith the Lord, as Tabor is among the mountains, and as Carmel by the sea, so shall he come.—Jer. xlvi. 18.

Tabor is the traditional "Mount of Transfiguration." Were it the real scene of that event, it would yield in interest to none of Palestine's "Holy Places." But the tradition is questionable, and sacred topography is opposed to it. Yet it can lay claim to a venerable antiquity, for Jerome, in the fourth century, when making his pilgrimage with the saintly Paula, says, "She ascended Tabor, on which the Lord was transfigured." Jerome's words and monkish superstition have canonized the mountain. Churches have been made to it, and for fifteen centuries, it has been honored as one of the shrines of the Holy Land.

But independent of apocryphal tradition and monkish superstition, Tabor holds rank among Palestine's celebrated mountains. Gilead and Pisgah, Olivet and Carmel, Tabor and Hermon, are all honored names in sacred story. In olden days of Canaanitish Baal-worship Tabor was a "high place;" and the northern tribes appear, in this case as in many others, to have forgotten the divine command, "Ye shall utterly destroy all the places wherein the nations which ye possess served their gods, upon the high mountains, and upon the hills." Deut. xii. 2; compare 2 Kings xvii. 9–12. They appear to have erected altars and images upon Tabor; and hence the force and pointedness of Hosea's accusation—"Hear ye this, O priests; and harken, ye house of Israel; and give ye ear, O house of the king; for judgment is toward you, because ye have been a snare on Mizpah, and a net spread upon Tabor." Hosea v. 1. The people were there deceived and ensnared by the idolatrous practices of their leaders.

And Tabor was the gathering-place of the northern tribes in time of danger or war. For this, as I shall show, both its position and its natural features admirably fitted it. Here Deborah ordered Barak to concentrate his army to oppose Sisera: "Go and draw toward Mount Tabor, and take with thee ten thousand men of the children of Zebulon." Judges iv. 6. Here, too, some of Israel's warriors had been attacked and slain by the hosts of Midian, before Gideon's victory. Gideon asked Zebah and Zalmunna, "What manner of men were they whom ye slew at Tabor? And they answered, As thou art, so were they; each one resembled a king." Judges viii. 18. Even before the conquest, it would seem that the great Lawgiver's prophetic eye had been fixed upon Tabor, when he said of Zebulon and Issachar, "They shall call the people unto the mountain; there they shall offer sacrifices of righteousness." Deut. xxxiii. 10.

ASCENT OF TABOR.

It was on the 8th of May, at noon, in a flood of glorious sunshine, I first approached the northern base of Tabor. At intervals, during the two preceding days, I had seen it from the heights of Naphtali and the banks of the upper Jordan. Now that it was before me, I was disappointed. There is nothing of majesty in its elevation, nor of grandeur in its scenery, that would at all make it rival Hermon or Lebanon. Its shape and partial isolation are striking but nothing more. The point from which I got the most pleasing view was beside the ruins of Khan et-Tujjar, two miles to the north. The intervening ground was table-land with a gently undulating surface, and belts of plantation, and clumps of trees, and vistas of green turf bordered with shrubbery, like an English park. Over it, to the height of twelve hundred feet or more, rose Tabor; in shape a segment of a sphere; its sides and regularly curved top all sprinkled with evergreen oaks and terebinths. It is undoubtedly the most symmetrical hill in Central Palestine—not from its altitude, for there are others much higher, but from its isolated position, unique shape, and unfading verdure. When first seen from the north, as I saw it, its curved outline breaks the dull monotony of the hills of Galilee. When first seen from the south, it is still more imposing. Then it swells up like a vast dome, from the plain of Esdraelon; and in the richness of its foliage, and delicate green of its forest glades, it presents a pleasing contrast to the brown rocky summits of Ephraim, and the bare white crowns of Judah.

My path led through a wide-spread camp of Nomads, "children of the east," who had come here in early spring, like the Midianites of old, to devour the luxuriant pastures of Palestine. They were a wild and lawless race, and I felt that to pass them in safety would require some little tact. I rode boldly to the nearest tent, and asked for water. A large bowl of milk was handed to me by an Arab girl; bread, too, was offered, of which I ate a small quantity. I was now their guest, under their protection, freed from all danger of attack on person or property. I demanded a guide, or rather an escort, for the way was plain enough to the foot of Tabor. The girl conducted me to the tent of the sheikh, which was pitched under the shade of a noble oak. He was not at home, but his son, a fine looking boy of fifteen, leaped on the back of a beautiful mare that stood ready saddled, and seizing the spear which was stuck in the ground at the tent door, told me to follow him.

My little guide led me to the western base of Tabor, within sight of the village of Deburieh, which nestles in a quiet nook on the side of the great plain. There he wheeled around, waved a polite adieu, and was out of sight in a moment. I turned my horse's head up the zigzag path that leads to the top of the hill; but soon, wearying of the windings, I left my horse in charge of my servant, and clambered up straight to the summit. It was a rash act. On my way I saw several jackals, and heard sundry barks and growls in the jungles as they scampered off, which made me feel somewhat uncomfortable. The summit is broad, strewn with ruins, and covered with thickets of dwarf oak and prickly shrubs. I entered a narrow opening, and was proceeding along a beaten track, when I was startled by a loud snort; and a huge boar, with head down and mane erect, brushed past me and was followed by a sow and a litter of young. I scarce knew what to do. The place was quite different from what I had expected. As yet I could see nothing but thickets of ilex and heaps of ruins. I was thirsty, and thirst compelled me to run the risk of more encounters with the denizens of the jungle. After some time and trouble I discovered water at the bottom of a large dark vault or cistern. A rude staircase once led down the side, but it was now in a great measure destroyed. I was resolved, however, to reach in some way the tempting fluid. Holding by an overhanging branch, I began the descent, when suddenly a panther bounded out from an obscure corner, and turning round, growled at me from the opposite side. I could do nothing except look steadily at the beautiful but dangerous creature. Gradually it shrunk back, and at length disappeared in a thicket. I was a good deal relieved when I heard the voice of my servant, and still more so when he came up and handed me my gun.

In all that painful, fearful desolation on the top of Tabor, the finger of God was visible. Prophecy was fulfilled before my eyes. Every object I saw was an emblem and a result of the curse—ruins, thorns and thistles, wild beasts, a deserted stronghold. What a commentary upon the words of the ancient prophets! "I will destroy your high places.... I will make your cities waste, and bring your sanctuaries unto desolation.... Upon the land of my people shall come up thorns and briars, yea, upon all the houses of joy in the joyous city; because the palaces shall be forsaken; the multitude of the city shall be left; the forts and towers shall be for dens." Lev. xxvi. 30, 31; Isa. xxxii. 13, 14.—J. L. Porter.

As the Turkish authorities at Constantinople continue to withhold from the Palestine Exploration Fund permission to continue the geographical survey and exploration of Eastern Palestine, its committee have resolved to undertake the geological survey of Western Palestine, one of the original aims of the fund until now wholly neglected. By October it is expected an announcement may be made as to the formation of the party; the program is full of the proposed work, its objects, the problems sought to be solved, and the Biblical aspect of the undertaking with an estimate of the probable cost. Practical suggestions have been made to the Fund by Sir Charles Wilson, and negotiations have been opened with a geologist of great eminence.—The Independent.

Golden Days.

Loving Words.

Loving words will cost but little,
Journeying up the hill of life;
But they make the weak and weary
Stronger, braver for the strife.
Do you count them only trifles?
What to earth are rain and rain?
Never was a kind word wasted,
Never one was said in vain.

When the cares of life are many,
And its burdens heavy grow
For the ones who walk beside you,
If you love them, tell them so.
What you count of little value
Has an almost magic power,
And beneath their cheering sunshine,
Hearts will blossom like a flower.

So, as up life's hill we journey,
Let us scatter, all the way,
Kindly words, to be as sunshine
In the dark and cloudy day.
Grudge no loving word, my brother,
As along through life you go;
To the ones who journey with you,
If you love them, tell them so.

Acts, looks, words, steps, form the alphabet by which you spell character!

Kind words produce their own image in men's souls: and a beautiful image it is. They soothe and comfort the hearer.

Beautiful lives have grown up from the darkest places, as pure white lilies, full of fragrance, have blossomed on slimy, stagnant waters.

Found Out.

On the top of hill was an orchard, and on one of the trees was a boy stealing apples; another boy was at the bottom of the tree, on the watch to see that nobody found them out.

Nobody was near that they could see; but that did not prove that nobody saw them; for, seven miles off, Professor Mitchell, the astronomer, was examining the setting sun with his great telescope, and the hill happening to come within its range, the actions of the boys, the very tell-tale looks on their faces, attracted his notice. He saw what they were up to. He found them out. There was no escaping the great eye of his telescope looking full upon them. They little thought of such a thing.

But there was another eye upon them, a greater eye and a sharper eye, and the eye followed them. It was God's eye, and his eye is on us. It sees near, it sees afar off. It sees in the day, it sees in the night. It sees out of doors, it sees in doors. It sees our actions, it sees our hearts. It sees us too by name. Prof. Mitchell did not know the boys. God knows.

Remember They are Children.

How easy it is to forget that the little folk are only little folk after all, and to treat them as if they were grown up and ought to know as much about behavior and self-control as ourselves. The plea for the children that follows ought not to be necessary, but what parent can conscientiously say it is not?

Don't expect too much of them; it has taken you 40 years, it may be, to make you what you are, with all your lessons of experience; and I will dare say you are a faulty being at best. Above all, don't expect judgment in a child or patience under trials. Sympathize in their mistakes and troubles; don't ridicule them. Remember not to measure a child's trials by your standard. "As one whom his mother comforteth," says the inspired writer, and beautifully does he convey to us the deep, faithful love that ought to be found in every woman's heart, the unfailing sympathy with all her children's griefs.

Let the memories of their childhood be as bright as you can make them. Grant them every innocent pleasure in your power. We have often felt our temper rise to see how carelessly their little plans were thwarted by older persons, when a little trouble on their part would have given the child pleasure, the memory of which would last a life-time. Lastly, don't think a child hopeless because it betrays some very bad habits. We have known children that seemed to have been born thieves and liars, so early did they display these undesirable traits, yet we have lived to see those same children become noble men and women, and ornaments to society. We must confess they had wise, affectionate parents. And whatever else you may be compelled to deny your child by your circumstances in life, give it what it most values, plenty of love.—Dawn of the Morning.

As our young readers will all like to read Mrs. Davis' narrative, we have concluded to abridge her Journal, as given more fully in the Age-to-Come Herald for August. And we have also concluded that our older readers would like to learn something about her present home, as well as many other particulars which later letters have not explained so much in detail. Hence we have concluded to use a part of our Youths' Column for this interesting Journal. Later letters from Brother Winterstein appear from time to time in other columns of our paper.

From Jerusalem.

LEAVES FROM MY JOURNAL.

JERUSALEM, Nov. 14, 1882.—I have just moved into my new home, and am all alone tonight. By midnight the city of the Great King is silent as the tomb, save the occasional ringing of bells and the barking of a few Jerusalem dogs.

The house I have moved into was for several years the residence of the American Consul. Of late it has not been occupied. I can look out of my window, toward the east, directly upon the Mount of Olives and the Mosk of Omar. The view is very fine. I can sit in my room and paint the lovely mountain. On the west, just across the open space, and near the Jaffa gate, is David's Tower, now used for barracks for the soldiers. I like the situation, and hope to draw inspiration to write on this elevated position.

Nov. 17. The American Minister at Constantinople, Gen. Wallace, is here. Our American citizens went out to escort him into the city upon his arrival, and we were invited to meet him and his wife at the consulate. All who have the pleasure of his acquaintance speak of him in the highest praise.

Nov. 22. Gen. Wallace continues to be the lion of the day. Last Saturday a German Prince arrived and no one seemed to take much notice of him. But in the afternoon several hundred persons gathered at the hotel to greet Gen. Wallace as he returned from the Jordan. As he rode up they began to sing a welcome. In the evening he dined with the Pasha, while the band played; and that quarter of the city was illuminated. No guest could receive greater honors.

I presented two large bouquets of flowers to Mrs. Wallace; and in her letter of acknowledgement she says: "Your charming present of flowers are much the best and largest groupings we have seen. As often as I look at them I shall think of the delightful visit we have had here, and the friends we have made, whom we shall not forget and by whom we hope to be remembered."

Nov. 29. I like my new home very much. When I awake in the morning I can look out of my window, as yet destitute of curtains, and view Mt. Olives, and think of the ascension of Christ from its summit, or near it; and of the day when his feet shall again stand upon it (Zech. xiv. 4). Brother Fuller thought the windows in Jerusalem were too small to need curtains. I thought of it this morning, and counted sixty-two panes of pretty good sized glass in this one room. So you see I shall not want for light and sunshine and may need a few curtains.

The Greeks are building splendid shops in the city. There has been nothing like them since the days of Solomon. Surely, Jerusalem is rising from its ashes and dust, and will soon put on her beautiful garments and strength.

Dec. 13. It is very pleasant and warm. The farmers are plowing and sowing grain. The grass is quite green, and the flowers are springing up everywhere. I had never dreamed of such a splendid climate. How could it be improved? The wheat is of the finest quality this year, and it makes most excellent bread.

Dec. 20. We are now preparing for Christmas. It is much the same here as in America. There are so many to help and so much to do that I have but little time to write. It is now one o'clock Wednesday morning. I have been trying to finish a card of flowers to send to Chicago, but must retire and finish it later in the morning.

Dec. 25. Christmas eve. I feel like writing to my dear friends in America and tell you how much I love Jerusalem. No, I cannot tell you how much I love Jerusalem; that is impossible. I can enter into the spirit of the Psalmist where he says: "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning. If I do not remember thee, let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth—if I prefer not Jerusalem above my chief joy." Psa. cxxxvii. 5, 6. The love I have for Jerusalem, while in its gloom, is really marvellous. All the dear friends here feel the same.

I have been making Christmas presents for the children, and I think I have enjoyed it as much as I ever did in making for my own.

I can hardly realize that I am so busily at work in God's Holy City. It is almost too much to believe. How good the Lord was to bring me here! If our love for this Holy Hill increases as its beauty, righteousness and glory increases, our capacity to love must also be increased, or we shall not be able to contain it.

Dec. 26. We are now having a terrific storm; thunder, lightning, rain, hail, and the wind blowing a perfect hurricane.

The old-school missionaries here are some troubled, I think, by what the American new-lights are doing. I tell them not to be alarmed. "If it is of God it will stand. But if it is of man it will come to naught."

The Sultan has now given permission for the Jews to come to Palestine and buy as much land as they please. Three months ago he refused to allow them to come. It remains one of Pharaoh. He has also sent a firman allowing the wall around Jerusalem to be removed.

Dec. 27. The storm increased all night and is still raging. Thank the good Lord, my rooms are dry. The streets of the city are washed clean by the rain and the air seems purified and sweet. Let the filth of the city, above and below, once be cleaned out, and proper sanitary measures be introduced and observed, and there could be no healthier place upon the face of the whole earth. And why should it not be? Can it be supposed that God would select a place second to any other place on earth in any respect for his dwelling place among the children of men? "This is my rest forever," he says, "here will I dwell, for I have desired it."

No one can fail to understand that these abundant rains are the fulfilment of prophecy. See Joel. ii. 23–27. The prophet gives the result of these great rains: "The floors shall be full of wheat, and the vats shall overflow with wine and oil." Then will his people "eat in plenty and be satisfied, and praise the name of the Lord.... and never be ashamed."

The wells are full of water, the almond tree is beginning to blossom and the farmers are beginning to sow their grain. The rain seems to give new life and vigor to everything. There is a tree in the garden of our Illinois friends already white with blossoms. This is seldom seen so early.

Jan. 1, 1883. This is New Year's eve. I have had a little tea-party today. All was pleasant. Our love for dear Jerusalem increases. The weather is very fine and we have plenty of rain too. Many good gifts from "the Father of Lights" is being bestowed upon us.

There are many Jews coming now, since the Sultan has given permission for them to settle here. Twenty-five came overland, all the way on foot, from Russia.

Jan. 2. A terrible storm is now raging, and it is so dark that no one cares to venture out. But all are happy to see so much rain. The market is full of fine vegetables. Oranges and lemons are abundant and cheap.

Old systems are fast giving away before the rapid march of improvement, especially in Jerusalem.

Jan. 3. The storm is over and the weather is fine. All nature seems to be revived. Many orders are now coming in for flowers. I am glad the people are interested, even in the beautiful flowers. But I hope they will not let the interest stop with the flowers. Growing in Jerusalem, they are highly prized by those who love Jerusalem. But with all her beautiful flowers, Jerusalem is still under the feet of the Gentiles, in a desolate state for the overspreading of abominations, in the dust and in gloom. Let all who make mention of the Lord, keep not silence, and give him no rest, till he establish and make Jerusalem a praise in the earth.

Jan. 8. A rumor has reached us that the Russians are coming. The English consul, who is now in Egypt, has been telegraphed for. There may be something in the rumor. Many of the people here are expecting war, and they will not be taken by surprise if it comes. It is said the Arabs would welcome the Russians or any other power which would give them a new government. It seems they would be willing to risk anything for a change.

The Jews are still coming; the rain is still falling; and the prospect is now that an abundant harvest the coming season will greet the returning exiles.

I was never so busy before. My hands are full, I have scarcely time to think. The hours fly swiftly, and the day is gone when it seems that it has but just commenced. I cannot do half that I wish to do. My room is warm and very pretty, for a city in gloom. I awake in the morning and look out upon the Mount of Olives and the Mosk of Omar. Near my window is a beautiful tall palm tree.

The great rains continue. It is busily at work in God's Holy City. It is almost too much to believe. How good the Lord was to bring me here! If our love for this Holy Hill increases as its beauty, righteousness and glory increases, our capacity to love must also be increased, or we shall not be able to contain it.

Jan. 17. It has been as warm here today as a common June day in New England. The grass is beautifully green, and the grain looks well. Several of us walked to the excavations, which are extending over a large area, and the ruins are very beautiful. It seems from an inscription found that this large structure was completed in the year 1500. The Jews believe there are large treasures buried in Jerusalem—especially in the tombs of the kings.

Is it not wonderful that Jews, Catholics, Greeks, Mohammedans, and all others, have been too superstitious to hunt for treasures in Jerusalem? I tell them that is the way God has kept the treasures so safely. Superstition, as well as error, often does good service.

CIRCULAR.

To the Students of Prophecy throughout the World:

The undersigned proposes to issue from the press, either in Chicago or in New York City, as circumstances may decide, the following works, to-wit:

I. The Coming Age—Its Nature and Proximity. In the first division the nature of the Coming Age is fully discussed, as to its physical and moral character: 1. That the earth itself has a crowning age, in which it shall be perfectly adapted to be the residence of man in his highest type; 2. That man, in that resurrection state, will be under the endless reign of the Personal Messiah; 3. In establishing the proximity of that age, the prophecies of Ezekiel, Isaiah, Daniel, Zechariah, Christ, Paul, Peter, and the Apocalypse, are critically examined, relative to its rapid approach.

II. The second work will be devoted to the investigation of the various phases of the Eastern Question:—1. The Egyptian phase. 2. The British phase. 3. The Russian phase. 4. The Ottoman phase. 5. The Hebrew phase. 6. The American phase. 7. Lesser phases of the Eastern Question. 8. The location of each of the Great Powers in the coming contest. 9. All nations marshal under the banners of the dragon, the beast, and the false prophet. These powers are traced in history to the present time. All the great national issues are fully investigated.
